The walls of the ball-room were decorated with the banners and colours of the regiment, tastefully grouped; and the court-room adjoining was set apart for the reception of the civic chiefs. Towards ten o'clock, the company had arrived in great numbers, and the ball-room presented a fine spectacle, nearly all the gentlemen being in military costume and the ladies elegantly attired. Dancing then commenced, and was kept up with spirit until a late or rather early hour. The Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, and several other distinguished personages were present. Supper, with an abundance of the choicest wines, was served in excellent style, under the direction of the committee, in an adjoining apartment. There were upwards of 300 present, and the affair altogether went off with great éclat. Indeed, so great is the satisfaction afforded by this annual meeting, that it uniformly leads to the enrolment of a number of highly respectable "recruits."

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FIGURES.

No. 1. A coiffure composed of lace, embroidered with gold. A crape dress, over pink watered silk.

No. 2. A satin hat. A silk dress, open and laced down the front of the corsage and skirt. Two black velvet bonnets.

Balls and fêtes succeed each other in Paris without intermission; the most brilliant has been that given for the benefit of the members of the civil list under the ancien régime. The ball took place in the vast saloons du Casino, which were filled with an immense crowd of fashionables. There was scarcely room to move from eleven o'clock until one; eighteen hundred tickets were issued; the arrangements were, however, so excellent that there was every convenience for dancing, and more particularly for waltzing, for the waltz has again come into great favour with our compatriotes. The greatest luxury was displayed in all the toilettes. Diamonds were in great profusion; the head dresses were more varied than ever. It was, however, observable, that hair coiffures were more numerous than any other. There were fewer petit bords (dress hats) and turbans than of fancy coiffures. The most elegant were composed of coloured velvet covered with tulle, embroidered with silver pea spots, and fringed with silver; others were composed of scarfs of different colours, embroidered with gold or silver, and fringed with the same; the crowns of these were composed of gold or silver net. Other coiffures were entirely composed of gold or silver net.

For Ball Dresses the corsages are busked or pointed, and ornamented at the top with lace or a crape bertha. The short sleeves, which have hitherto been so short as scarcely to be seen, are now brought half way down the upper part of the arm. The skirts are mostly open in front, and fastened on the sides with cords and tassels, bows of ribbon or flowers.

The Albanian corsages. Those open down the front, and laced with black velvet, are in great favour.

For morning visits, high corsages are adopted. They are ornamented at the top with brandebourgs (embroidery of silk gimp, or braid.) The skirts are ornamented to correspond.

Velvet Hats are more in vogue than ever; they are either black or of dark colours, and are usually ornamented with feathers.

PRINCESS' THEATRE.

Some few years since, we imported from the West a quadruped whose name was Tom Thumb—on Wednesday evening last at this house a biped of a similar baptism, with the military prefix of "General," appeared, and enacted several drolleries. He strutted about like a miniature Napoleon, and afterwards represented what are called the "Grecian Statues;" but it is to be hoped that the little fellow will not always remain in statu quo, his height being somewhat like Horace's "ab imo ad summum totus modulo BIPEDALIS." The production of this little monster affords another melancholy proof of the low state the legitimate drama has been reduced to!

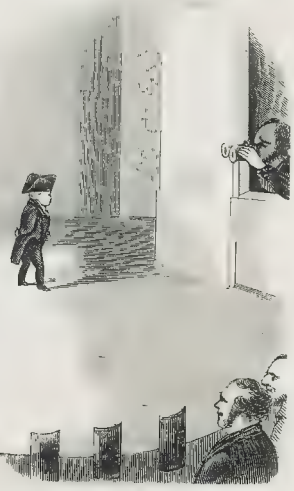
This extraordinary minikin man, Charles S. Stratton, known in America as "General Tom Thumb, junior," is stated by his exhibitor to have weighed 9lb. 2oz. at his birth, somewhat more than the average weight of a new-born infant. At about five months old, he weighed 15lb., and measured 25 inches in height; since which time he has not increased in stature; and his present weight is but 15lb. 2oz. He has light hair and complexion, has a fresh colour, and is uniformly cheerful. He is stated, in a pamphlet printed at New York, to have been born Jan. 11, 1832; but of this we are somewhat sceptical. He is, however, a little man in all save his voice, which is still pitched in "childish treble." He has been exhibited in New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Baltimore, Charleston, &c., where his miniature palace, furniture, and equipage, excited considerable curiosity. When he embarked at New York for England, he was escorted to the packet by not less than 10,000 persons.



THE AMERICAN DWARF, AS NAPOLEON, AT THE PRINCESS' THEATRE

One of our illustrations shows this extraordinary dwarf parodying the walk and manner of Napoleon, upon the stage of the Princess's Theatre; and the performance had a most ludicrous effect.

Renewal of the Bank Charter.—Among the more prominent matters brought forward on Saturday, when the deputation, consisting of a large number of the representatives of the Joint Stock Banks, had an interview with Sir Robert Peel, in anticipation of the resolution to be propounded for the Renewal of the Charter of the Bank of England, were the following:—The power of accepting bills having six months to run; the right of being sued, and the power to sue; and the right of clergymen to hold shares. Mr. P. Stewart was the only spokesman on the occasion, excepting, of course, Sir Robert Peel, who was alone in the first instance, but was joined afterwards by Sir James Graham. To limit the discussion, the deputation, in their letter to the Premier, seeking the interview, mainly rested on the principal grounds for concession, as we have above given; but "other" points were referred to, and Sir Robert requested that those "other" points should be furnished in detail as soon as possible. In this Sir James acquiesced. The Premier promised that the most earnest attention to the representations of the deputation should be paid by the Government. The deputation then retired.

King's College, London.—Monday being the day appointed for the presentation of a piece of plate to the Bishop of Lichfield, the late principal, on the part of the professors, lecturers, masters, and other officers of the college, in testimony of their deep respect for his talents and attainments, as well as of their grateful sense of the invariable urbanity, zeal, and judgment which he had manifested in the discharge of his duties, a meeting of the subscribers took place in the college library. On the entrance of the Lord Bishop, the present principal, the Rev. Dr. Jelf, addressed his Lordship in very feeling terms, and presented him with a superb silver urn stand, the pedestal of which bore an appropriate inscription. The Bishop received the testimonial with no little emotion, and testified the high gratification which he derived from so substantial an expression of the goodwill and affection borne to him by those over whose successful efforts it had o long been his happiness to preside.

SCENE FROM "USED UP," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

The very pleasant trifle, "Used Up," continues its prosperous career at this theatre; and the attraction of the performance is not soon likely to be at the point denoted by its own title. It is an adaptation of the French piece "Le Blasé," not by Lord Ranelagh, as has been stated, but, we are informed, by Mr. C. Matthews and Mr. Bourcicault. The morale reminds us of the little Lord Linger of our schooldom: it is an admirable sketch of a young man on whom nature and fortune have lavished their bounties with an unsparing hand, and, at the same time, forgetting to endue him with the power of enjoying in moderation all the pleasures and luxuries which his wealth and high station placed within his reach; at last the disappointed baronet finds himself, at the early age of thirty-three, sated with all and everything, tired of himself and all around him—man delights not him, nor woman either; in short, restless and discontented, continually haunted by the fiend ennui, he becomes completely blasé, or, in the modern argot of this great Babel of ours, he is "used up."

The hero, Sir Charles Coldstream, is one of Mr. C. Matthews's most finished personations; his drawing non-chalance, and thorough-bred aristocratic bearing, are inimitable. Our artist has chosen an admirable illustration of the indifference of the roué, in which he is making arrangements for marriage with Lady Castleback. A blacksmith rushes in, claims the baronet's fresh fiancée as his runaway wife, and accompanies his claim by some far from flattering remarks upon the domestic manners and customs of a man of fashion Sir Charles "invites him to retire;" Vulcan refuses, and the baronet takes off his coat, and commences a practical application of the lessons which he has received from the "pet of the fancy." The smith and the baronet come to close quarters, and in their struggles they both fall out of the window, and into the river, and the curtain drops on act 1. The blacksmith (Irondrawer) is capitally played by Mr. Howe, whilst nothing can exceed the coolness of the recreant baronet, and the perfect indifference with which he receives the threats of the stalwart son of Vulcan.

On the Use of Envelopes.—Some observations of a very important character were made yesterday by Chief Justice Tindal, in the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Fraser v. Bagley, as to the obstacles which so frequently present themselves in courts of law by the use of envelopes in the mercantile community. "It often occurred (said his lordship) that material documentary evidence was shut out in consequence of communications being enclosed in envelopes, and the difficulties that arose in identifying the enclosures with the superscriptions." Mr. Thesiger, Q.C., and Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, fully concurred with the learned judge, and remarked that in the course of their experience they had abundant proofs of the justice of his lordship's observation.

Rise in the Price of Bread.—The bakers throughout the metropolis raised the price of bread on Tuesday last. The first-rate bakers at the west end now charge 9½d. and even 10d. per four pound loaf; the second-rate, 8d. and 7½d. Notwithstanding that there is a plentiful supply of wheat in the country of English growth, no less than 9220 quarters of foreign wheat has been received during the last week in the port of London; 1300 quarters of which were from Dantzic, and 1050 from Odessa; 20,000 quarters were entered on Monday last at 19s. duty. The price of wheat at Mark-lane varies from 48s. to 60s. per quarter, and flour of superior quality from 46s. to 50s., second ditto 40s. to 45s. per sack.

FARRINGDON-STREET, NORTH.

LONDON IMPROVEMENTS.—FARRINGDON-STREET, NORTH.

One of the most beneficial results of the removal of Fleet-market has been the formation of a new street in continuation of Farringdon-street, the site of the market; and, from its direction, named Farringdon-street, North. We recollect the clearing away of the filthy old market, and the cutting of a street northward, to have been a favourite project with Alderman Wnithman, many years since; and, probably, few improvements in the metropolis were longer agitated than this new line of road.

The sanatory influence of the change need not be insisted on. Fleet Market, and its dirty shambles, have been swept away; and the work has altogether resembled the cleansing of the Augean stable. A fine Italianized market has been erected as a substitute for the old market; and, although the financial results of the change are not so flourishing as could be wished, its effects on the public health are not to be disputed. Then, "the well-known Fleet" has become tenantless; and there is no longer "begging at the grate;" and, where the little river Fleet formerly ran, and was rendered navigable, you have now a fine paved roadway, probably one of the most spacious thoroughfares in the metropolis. If the reader doubt this change, he has only to refer to the names of a few of the off-shoots from Farringdon-street; as Seacoal-lane, so called from the barges that landed coal there; and Turnagain-lane, at the bottom of which the unadvised passenger found himself compelled by the water to retrace his steps.

The engraving represents the street now in course of erection, from the point still known as Holborn-bridge. The houses have elevations of a somewhat ornamental character; and, as the improvement is in the hands of a Committee of the Corporation of London, we trust that the entire line will be an embellished convenience to the City; and aspire to better taste than "walls with holes in them," as our streets have been somewhat satirically designated. As this new street will be one of the arteries of the metropolis, by all means let its architectural character partake of corresponding importance.

THE

BY

MISS LOUISA STUART COSTELLO.

The cause of Mr. Ashe having left Paris so suddenly on the evening of his protegé's successful debût, was the receipt of a letter which summoned him to Rouen, to visit a person who had been severely injured by a railroad accident, and who, lying at the point of death, had caused a letter to be written entreating to see him on a matter of the most serious interest to himself. An allusion to certain circumstances, understood at once by Mr. Ashe, excited his curiosity and anxiety to such a degree, that the instant he received the appeal he hurried away to the place where his correspondent was to be found. He found him in great pain but perfectly sensible, and able to give the following statement —

"It is now eighteen years since my wife and I lived with you at Surinam, and had the care of your two children to bring to England after your wife's death We embarked, as you know, at rather a bad season, but as the fever raged you desired that these poor babes should escape the scourge which had carried off their mother, and of which you were lying ill at the time, and as I afterwards heard, though the report was false, died. Well, our voyage was tolerably prosperous half way over, and, indeed, till we were almost within sight of the English coast, when a furious storm came on and we were beaten about without mercy for some days, and at last the vessel was cast a wreck on the shore with only a few of the crew and passengers alive. Amongst these were your two infants and myself; the boy I saved in my arms, the girl was washed on shore safe, clinging to the dead body of my wife

"We were taken in by some benevolent persons of Liverpool and there we staid, until I recovered from the wounds and bruises I had received, which were very dangerous. Some months I lay between life and death, and when I got up again it was to hear news of your having been carried off by the fever, and of an earthquake having destroyed great part of your property. I did all I could for the children, I informed a respectable merchant of Liverpool of their forlorn position, and he undertook to find out your family in England. A letter, however, came to him from your half-sister, Lady Lucy Vane, telling him that my statement was untrue, that the children were illegitimate, and that she was the heir to whatever property you might have left. The story was believed before mine, and I had no redress I could not abandon the children, however, but worked for their support for some time, when I married again an excellent good woman, who though, they were both my own, as I did not like to tell her the truth, as I saw no chance of their ever coming to their rights, and I thought she would love them better if she believed they were mine. I soon after got employ on board ship, and went several voyages, none very lucky; and while I was gone, my wife and the children, for we had several others now besides, went to live in her native village in the Peak of Derbyshire.

"It is now about ten years since I made the unlucky voyage which kept me away from my wife and family so long. I went through hardships in the north seas which I wonder I live to relate. I returned to America, and fell in with the savages, and got so used to their life, that I consented to stay with them, till, tired of that existence, and repenting of not making an effort to return home, I got away, and, taking a voyage from America to the Spanish Main, I accidentally heard that it was a false report of your being dead—that you had been long returned to England, and that you believed your children lost.

"I resolved, on this, to try and find you out, and, on my return to England, I followed your traces wherever I could find a glimpse of you; and, strange enough, lighted at last on the village where my wife was still living with our own boys, but your two children I found gone—one with you, and the other with that very half-sister who would have deprived them of their birthright. I now told my wife the truth, and by her directions followed you abroad; I was, however, only preparing to go to Paris, when this fatal accident, which occurred from my own eagerness to cross the railroad at a wrong moment, overlook and stopped me.

"By an extraordinary chance, a servant whom you had dispatched to England happened to stop at the place where I was lying sick, and coming to relieve a countryman, by his means I discovered where you were, and got him to send you the letter which has brought you here to hear my narrative. Thank Heaven I have at least lived to tell it you."

This singular revelation made a great effect on the mind of Mr. Ashe. Thus then, after years of regret, which had rendered him unlike his fellow-men, and had estranged him from society, he found the cause removed, and he had all his wishes realized. His children lived; he had seen them both, had seen their beneficator, had rescued his son from a lowly station, and given him the means of attaining fame and fortune; he had discovered in him all the virtues and good qualities he could desire, and, without being aware of their connexion, he had intended to make Edward his heir; but, alas! his heart sunk within him as he recollected that of late he had observed not too plainly that a fatal malady was preying on the young gentleman; that, after every temporary triumph of his genius, the progress of decay appeared more evident, and he was without doubt becoming a victim to an incurable disease, which "Grew with his growth, and strengthened with his strength."

"I shall tell him he is my son only to bid him an eternal adieu! His nerves are weak, his fee ings are acute—the joy, the shock, would overcome him. He lives her whom he calls his mother with a child-like fondness; why should I bet him cease to look on her but as a nurse? I have lived enough for myself; it is time I thought on others, and what is anything to me now in comparison to his preservation? Why did I indulge him in this passion for the dangerous instrument which has fostered the seeds of decline in him? Alas! it was I who encouraged, developed his fatal genius which has destroyed itself. And my daughter, my poor Ellen! I have left her to languish in no obscure village; all was so fair that I did, to gratify my own caprice and passion, to bring her to my dwelling, or I should have at once provided for them all without seeking to derive gratification from his talent. How shall I repair all the injuries I have done?"

This musing, the benevolent but somewhat selfish resolve to proceed to Paris, having wasted to see the last duties performed for poor Swain, who died in a few days after he had communicated the important intelligence which had so changed the current of his thoughts.

He found Edward very ill; the agitation of the late events, joined to the excitement of his recent success, had produced much fever, which he had in vain hoped would decrease, and thought that by exertion he should shake off, but in vain; his father, still unknown, saw with agony his flushed cheek, and felt his burning hand

"You shall play no more, Edward," said he, taking from him the flute on which he was still practising when he came into his room; "your health must be attended to before all other consideration."

"But I have engaged to perform to-morrow at the Tuileries," said Edward; "I must not fail—I shall be called capricious, ungrateful."

"Let them call you what they please," exclaimed Mr. Ashe. "What has a performer's skill to do with gratitude, and what do the public care for but your pay? Does one of those persons who press into an incredibly small space, half-stifled, half-stunned, to hear you play, care whether you expire beneath the sneers, after he has been gratified? Is it for your benefit or his own pleasure he endures heat and fatigue? What have you to do with the public? You shall play no more—it is killing me. You are my heir; I have already made my will in your favour; you are no independent man, Edward, and can provide for your family without exerting a talent which is fatal to you. I am to blame for having excited it, and on me is the consequence."

"Dear Sir, said Edward, with tears in his eyes, "to you I owe everything I possess - genius, fame, fortune: what had I been without your fostering care? Nothing. But to speak of gratitude to you is useless; I can only talk of affection, which makes us at once equal. But you have raised a spirit which you cannot lay again. The love of fame, the weak longing for applause [illegible] it is now too strong within me to be resisted; and not even your commands can equal that passion you have so long fed. Besides, I am not really ill, it is but a passive indisposition; you have not heard its origin, and I have much to tell you of what has happened in your absence. My sister Ellen is in Paris."

Mr. Ashe trembled violently, as he exclaimed, "Ellen!—where? Let me see her instantly! Explain!"

Edward smiled. "How often," said he, "have you child me for impetuosity, dear Sir; yet I am quite calm, even although I am not allowed to see my sister."

"Who shall prevent it?" questioned Mr Ashe

"Lady Lucy Vare," replied Edward, "with whom she resides."

"With that woman! with that unnatural sister, who disowned—disclaimed—persecuted my children! with her, who thought to benefit by my death—but whom I have already disappointed. But this, to you, is raving. Explain how Ellen comes beneath her roof"

Edward, consiserably surprised at the vehemence of his friend, related as clearly as he could all that had happened.

"And I was then in the box with her, and did not recognize her! Yet her face seemed familiar; but she is much changed—so beautiful, so refined—though she always looked superior to her station as you did yourself, Edward. She must come to us at once. Lady Lucy had some motive for carrying her away, depend on it. Is my nephew to be depended on? He is the son of an artful, selfish woman."

"I feel confident in him," said Edward warmly "He is, I am sure, honour and truth itself."

Before many hours had elapsed, Mr. Ashe had sought an interview with Sir Lionel, whom he found alone, in great agitation, from a recent interview with his mother, who had returned to Paris, having left Ellen at an establishment at Enghien.

When Sir Lionel found that she had placed her protegé out of her brother's reach, from motives of pride, his indignation could not be restrained.

"Mother," said he, "we have probably both done wrong in bringing this young girl from the obscurity in which she was born, but she has now claims upon us which are imperative. We have no right to deprive her of her friends, to debar her from seeing her relatives You have adopted her for her qualities; you have anything you find in her which has made you regret your generosity?"

"My dear Lionel, you talk like a child," said Sir lady. "You must know that I took her away from that savage retreat in which she was bred because I thought it would amuse me when you were away, for I could not have you always with me. As for her good qualities, I had found her disagreeable, of course I should have sent her away long ago But, I confess, the discoveries we expected she would have made more conquests; she has no ambition, and never ask me in any of my plans, so that she no sooner gets a lover than she loses him, and I have to begin again."

"She is no schemer, certainly," replied Sir Lionel, somewhat bitterly, "and her merits warrant her attaching many who would not be caught by a snare."

"Why, Lionel," said his angry mother, "one would say you were in love with the little mimaid yourself."

"Lady Lucy! my dear mother!" answered Sir Lionel, thrown off his guard "have you then really perceived the truth? Have you seen my heart, and can you pity its weakness?"

Lady Lucy's face became as an instant deadly pale; she gasped for breath, and with difficulty faltered:—

"So this is the end of my folly and indulgence! You dare to tell me to my face that you love a little beggar whom I took up out of charity. But you do not mean to insinuate that you could have thoughts of marrying her"

Sinee I must speak plainly, Madam," returned he, "I have even gone so far as to imagine that might be; but I fear her affections are engaged, and I should plead in vain."

"You will never see her more, Lionel," said his mother sternly. "I have been imprudent to a degree I had not calculated on; but I can repair my error. Ellen shall be sent back into her original obscurity, and disturb my peace no more

"You will not be so unjust. I have no hope—no thought of her," exclaimed Sir Lionel. "I will absent myself; I will do anything, dear mother; but you must not injure her. I never intended to betray this secret: forgive me. I would not vex you for the world, and will take no further step without your consent."

"That you shall never have to such a match" sobbed his mother: "never let me hear her hateful name again."

As she uttered these words she retired, closing the door with violence, a few moments only before Mr. Ashe came in by another.

Sir Lionel was so much moved by the late scene, that he had no power to calm his perturbation on the arrival of his uncle, who, entering at once on the subject of Ellen's removal, and insisting upon seeing her, the student of his misfortune came him, and he could not refrain from recounting to him what had just passed

"It was my purpose, my dear uncle," said he, "to have sought you out, expressly to relate to you the very circumstance which I would now fain conceal. I loved Ellen from the first moment I beheld her, but I had no reason to think myself otherwise than indifferent to her. I was afraid of any other attachment. I fear now that such exists, and all my vain imaginings fade to nothing I had intended to throw myself upon your generosity; to tell you my story, and to have entreated your assistance. I did not then know that Ellen was your brother was your protegé, and, as I since learn, your heir. I must resign her, and every prospect of happiness which I was idle enough to cherish."

"Lionel," said the uncle, after a pause, "I did you an injustice in disinheriting you for a stranger. I have wronged you in my thought since, but I can, perhaps yet repair my fault. If you are mistaken—if Ellen does not, in fact, love another would you still desire to call her your wife?"

"I have told you I love her," said the young man; "and I could even now cling to hope, but my mother is not, I fear, to be propitiated."

"Let me see Lady Lucy, without delay," said Mr. Ashe; "perhaps some arguments I might use will have their effect."

The interview which he demanded was granted, and a long conference ensued, which, on its ending, left the nephew in a state of great humility and despair, and, to her son's amazement, she exclaimed, as Mr Ashe brought her into the room to him, as she threw herself into his arms -

"Lionel, your uncle is the most generous of men: he will give our dear Ellen a large dower, and make us both happy. I have now no reason to withhold my consent."

To increase her son's surprise, he heard her make an engagement to go the next day with Mr. Ashe to Enghein, to engage a beautiful house there, close to the fine lake and baths, where Edward could have the benefit of them, and where Ellen was to go at once and reside with her brother, in order that they might joy each other's society.

In a short time Mr Ashe and his invalid son, now obliged, by the physician's command, entirely to relinquish his favourite employment, were established in a pretty villa on the banks of the picturesque little lake of Enghein, on which a boat is always to be found, to afford delight to the occasional visitors who stro] thither from their excursions to Montmorency and its celebrated shades. Many hours of the summer day might the philanthropist and his two children, neither of them conscious in what a close degree of relationship they stood to their benefactor, be seen gliding in the fairy pinnace amongst the small reedy isle of the lake, on whose bosom the warm sun shed its tempered rays; and thus did the benevolent but singular being make himself acquainted with his daughter's mind, until at length she hesitated not to confess to him that she no longer cherished an attachment which would interfere with the addresses of Sir Lionel, although of his love she was still in ignorance

"Had I remained in my original position," she said, "uneducated and uninformed, content with rural pleasures and devoted to rustic occupations, I could have been a fitting partner for Arthur Connor, whose worth and character I still estimate; but I feel now that a great change has come over my mind, and I am quite unworthy of him; I could not share his labour and minister to his wants It would, perhaps, have been better for me if I had remained obscure, for I should then have been his wife, and rendered him happy as well as myself I have, however, been introduced to a different world, and to return to his, for which I am unfit would be wrong in every way. He will think me right also a few years, and I shall pass the remainder of my life in attending on my dear Edward, and endeavouring, by my devotion to you, to repay, in some degree, our great debt of gratitude. But my brother and I have both a plan, when he is well enough for us to accomplish it—you will not, dear sir, oppose it, I am convinced. We must return to our dear mother, your generous care has given her an independence" Edward and I will live with her in former Turner's cottage, and your's shall be that adjoining, where you lived when a happy destiny brought you to our village. Here how blest we shall all live, in tranquility and content; Edward will recover his native vigour, and shall play his flageolet again as in days of yore, before we knew sorrow or suffering

Mr. Ashe delighted in hearing her form these pictures for the future, and his own imagination following, hurried her on to hope that the son of Derbyrne, in which Edward had grown up from childhood, would really restore him to health and strength. His anxious wish to see his mother was so often expressed, and the probability of his again needing counsel so much to revive him, that he appeared to receive benefit even from the very prospect. The pure air of Enghein, and the baths, had also considerable effect, and he was, in a short time, able to undertake the journey to England

Lady Lucy meantime had lost her occupation—her schemes had failed, her manœuvres had been abortive, and a secret consciousness of her own unworthiness forcibly represented to her by her brother's generosity, and by the impression of her that he was aware of her base desertion of his children; all tended to render her unhappy and discontented The sensitive delicacy of Sir Lionel had caused him to assent implicitly to the request of his uncle, that, in leaving Paris, he should be seen agreed upon between him and his uncle, that should it appear likely that the affections of Ellen were free, he should be summoned to join the party, wherever they might be. He had been informed by his mother of the real birth of Edward and Ellen, but a secret was to remain undivulged until it was the pleasure of Mr. Ashe to declare it.

"And after all, miladi," said Count d'Orfeuille to her one evening at the opera, "that pretty English girl whom you took us all in with, was an adventuress; they tell me she and her brother are both engaged at St. Petersburgh for the next season how came you to be so deceived?"

"Oh! I am so tender-hearted," said she; "a tale of distress easily moves me, and I understood she was the deserted orphan of a man of rank. I have provided for her poor thing, and sent her off with Signor Rinaldo, who will appear no more in Paris this season. My son is gone to Rome, and I am left desolate. Adieu! there's a ballet to commence directly; she has no one to support her, and when one has possessions too—entirely in one's power—it is so easy to be generous. One becomes even more perplexing. I wish Lionel would marry, that I might endow him with all I have, and retire from the world: but he will be rich enough without me It is a sad life.'

Upon this hint, Count d'Orfeuille spoke, and having clearly ascertained that Lady Lucy had a very fine fortune of her own, par Prance, independent of her son, he took his opportunity, which her ladyship was not averse to allowing him and proposed. She accepted him, although his years were not many more than those of Sir Lionel; and the party at Enghien reserved to their astonishment a circular informing them that the nuptials were shortly to take place. As Ellen and her brother had both dropped their fictitious appellation s, the bridegroom was not aware to whom the disappointing lark. The cause of his approaching felicity.

Sir Lionel heard of the event with extreme vexation, but no representations on his part could change the resolve of his mother, whose whole soul was now absorbed in preparations for her wedding: her fondness for dress and display having now an excellent opportunity of indulging itself, and a new object being allotted her frivolous mind required

Edward being considerably strong to bear the journey, Mr Ashe and his sister set out with him on their return to Derbyshire. With infinite delight they recognised their old accustomed haunts as the carriage took them from the Chesterfield side-gate of the Derbyrne park, down the hills, the avenue of trees, the brawling river foaming over its artificial bourne, the herds of deer, the fine sands, and the blue peak in the distance, all interested them by turns, and when they wound round the road, and caught a glimpse of their pretty village nestling in the woods, the brother and sister wept for joy.

"How could we ever find pleasure anywhere but here? exclaimed Ellen; "my mother sees us now—she must hear the sound of the wheels, little Jacob will run to open the gate: all the village will be looking for us."

And as she said, so it was: they were soon received into the embraces of Betty Swain, and Jacob, grown tall, and awkward boy, ran smiling and hallooing towards them.

The first words, however, that the old woman uttered proved to Mr Ashe that his secret was known, and the shrinking appearance, in spite of their welcome, of the neighbours, told the same tale.

"You be over good to come welcome," said Betty; "I've been looking out for the whole day to see Master and his children once again—we be very lonely without them."

"What a change!" said Edward, "famous and favourite Bakewell cakes, of great repute in the neighbourhood, and everything else that is good, and Betty acquitted his domicile the day before. His landlady, now his housekeeper, for he had bought the cottage, received with her usual friendly greetings, but Mr Ashe, fearful lest a premature disclosure should too strongly affect Sir Lionel, drew old Betty aside, and enjoined her to be cautious on his account.

"Swain was a very good man, and died very happy," she said, "and I was too much agitated to inquire: I have been imprudent in deferring the information to my children, and it must now be done with caution.

"Dear souls, they know their own mother, doubtless, then!" said she; "well, I never told them even when I thought they were Swain's children by his first wife—for you see I can keep a secret."

Mr. Ashe soon found it necessary to communicate the circumstances of their birth and their near relationship to himself and Ellen, who, astonished, and scarcely able to define her feelings, undertook to break the news to her brother.

"My dearest Edward," said Ellen, "to have left you both still in ignorance, and that the secret should have remained undivulged till my death, when the facts would have come to light but everything combines to render it necessary now and my own feelings are the most gratified, should I dread the effect on you both."

"Our affection could scarcely have been increased for you, nor can it diminish to our tender mother, for such she has indeed been, answered Ellen; "and for Edward I will answer for his bearing the joyful intelligence calmly. He will recover—for his eyes are brighter, and his cheek more healthy of late—do you not think so, father?"

Mr. Ashe concealed his tears, for he too had marked a change in Edward; but, alas! he thought it not for the better. He [illegible] and during a fortnight's [illegible] they passed [illegible] Sir Lionel [illegible] Mr. Ashe [illegible] Edward [illegible] Ellen [illegible] Betty Swain [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

TOOTH BRUSHES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, in answer to some complaints from the country, that Tooth Brushes purchased at their manufactory have turned out inferior in quality, beg to inform them that Brushes supplied by them to country shops are only warranted if their name is stamped on the back. Cheap-priced Tooth Brushes are not only unpleasant, but much dearer in the end than a good Tooth Brush, as they do not last half the time; and, indeed, this applies to Hair Brushes, and every other description of Brush. The Tooth Brushes sold under the same are the best that can be made, both in the material and workmanship, and if it happens, which is very rare, that they do not suit any change them, or the money back; but are obliged to the purchaser for the information. They are sold in al. variety of patterns, at, is. set in bone, at 1s. 6d., 2s., 2s. 6d., 3s., 3s. 6d., 4s., 4s. 6d., and 5s. each, and for fineness, quality, for exportation, with the usual allowance.—No. 24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.

COMBINATION, ECONOMY, and QUALITY, VERSUS EXPENSE and INFERIORITY.—Messrs. VINCENT and PUGH, Distillers and Brandy Merchants, of New Park street, Borough, claim the attention of the Public to their article of BRANDY. The two essentials, QUALITY and PURITY, are hereby combined in the manufacture. The spirit having been purchased in the above-named establishments by the first analysing chemists of the day, testimonials of which can be produced to prove its perfect quality in the highest degree. The duty imported, the Proprietors can confidently defy competition to produce its equal. For the convenience of the country it is supplied in bottled a large quantity, both PALE and BROWN, in handsome bright glass bottles, covered with a neat matting, capable corks, and labelled "Vincent and Pugh's Choice Pale Champagne and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities of not less than two gallons, equal to one dozen in bottles, 45 6s. per dozen, bottles included. Agents, MESSRS. FM. SAY, Wine Merchants, No. 18, Porter-street, Newport Market, and No. 1, Great Newport street, Leicester-square.

ROYAL PATENT CARPETING, manufactured without seaming or weaving.—This CARPETING having now obtained the universal approval of Royalty and Nobility, the Proprietors of the PATENT WOOLLEN CLOTH COMPANY, who are the sole manufacturers, apprise the trade that their Patterns for the Spring in the most novel and elegant designs, are now open for their inspection, at the Company's Warehouses, No. 27, Wood-street, Cheapside. In consequence of the increasing demand for this article, several parties have attempted to imitate the Patent Carpeting, but which, on inspection, will be found to have all the disadvantages of a common druggot. The Public, therefore, are cautioned against being imposed on by such inferior goods, therefore is far superior to any article hitherto produced for the same purposes. The Company have also a large assortment of Window Curtains and Table Covers, embossed and printed, in new and elegant patterns, and in all sizes; Floor Cloths, Wastcoatings, and numerous other goods of their manufacture. Agents have been appointed for the sale of their goods in all the principal towns in the United Kingdom.

THE TEA MARKET, No. 8, Ludgate Hill, London.—The NEW YEAR opens with more encouraging prospects for the TEA Consumer than for many previous seasons. War, ruinous, and impolitic, have given place to peace and friendship. The glories of the Celestial Empire are no longer veiled in mystery to the Western Hemisphere. An extended field is opened to the energies of the British Merchant—we trust for successful enterprise. Our Agents have just arrived from Canton—Mr. Gutzlaff necessarily overcome the rooted prejudices of thousands of years; and the ingenuous Millions who populate the vast territories of China will hail the event that opens to their industry the commercial freedom of the civilized world.

One of the many advantages of Peace over War to the country is best shown by reference to the comparative value of Tea in 1840 and 1844.

Value of Common Congou, (exclusive of duty) in February 1840 ..... 2s. 8d to 3s. and 3s. 6d. per lb.
Value of Common Congou, (exclusive of duty) in February 1844 ..... 1s. 2d. to 1s. and 1s. 2d. per lb

Making a difference of Two Hundred per cent, or thrice the value of tea in the time of War, over the present rates.

We recommend Families to pay, for a Common Breakfast Tea, 3s. 4d. per lb., for a Strong Full Bodied Congou, 3s. 8d. or 4s. per lb.; for the Finest Congou Imported, 4s. 8d. per lb. and for the most delicious Souchong, 5s. 6d. per lb. The two latter Teas are of very rare quality.—SIDNEY and HALL, the Tea Market 8, Ludgate-hill, London.

Thou End of Carnival! which means Farewell
To food of flesh for some good forty days,
And e'en to merriment as well,
At least among the folk who dwell
Where Tiber's yellow wave still strays
Through the Queen-City of long-vanish'd years—
That yet appears
Most beautiful of all we know,
As her decadent,—lovely ruins show!
I hate thee, Shrove!
Not but I love
Carnivorous feeding well as other—
But in good truth,
As if thou wert my brother,
From very earliest youth,
I never yet could smother Feelings like resentment, when I heard amongst the holiest men,
That Gluttony for once a year*
Should lay us out his best of cheer,
And then with antinomial diet
For six weeks keep our stomachs quiet!

The New Poor-law Amendment Bill.—A copy of this bill has just been printed by order of the House of Commons. It is entitled, "A Bill for the further Amendment of the Laws relating to the Poor in England," and contains as many as 61 clauses. Sir J. Graham and Mr. H. M. Sutton, M.P., are intrusted with the conducting of this measure through the Lower House of Parliament. No existing orders, nor pending proceedings, are to be affected by the passing of this bill. No order, however, made before the 14th day of August, 1834, will remain in force after the 1st day of January, 1849. By another set of clauses, the Poor-law Commissioners are empowered to define and regulate the various trades, premiums, &c., of parish apprentices, as also to prescribe the duties of their masters towards them, and the terms and conditions to be inserted in the indentures; any master who may refuse or neglect to fulfil the terms and conditions so inserted is rendered liable to a penalty of £20. Compulsory apprenticeship is abolished by the repeal of certain portions of the acts of the 43rd of Elizabeth, cap. 2, 8th and 9th of William III., cap. 3, and other general and local acts of Parliament which bear upon the subject. The existing scales of voting for the election of guardians are repealed, and an entirely new scale substituted.

The Xanthus Expedition.—The following is from a private correspondent at Malta:—"Her Majesty's steam-vessel Medea, Jan. 20.—Mr. Fellowes and party, from the British Museum, have been very successful in their last survey on the banks of the Xanthus, for which purpose they embarked on board the Medea, at Malta, in November last. One of the most valuable traces of antiquity of which they have possessed themselves, is that of a Chimere tomb, the discovery of which is contrary to the general opinion of antiquaries, that such a thing could not be found in Asia Minor. It is composed entirely of marble, and the tomb is covered with figures of men and women, and several animals. One of the figures attached to it is supposed to be Bellerophon taming an animal, called by the ancients a Chimere, formed partly of a goat, lion, and other animals. This animal is said in fabled history to represent the volcanic mountain of Lycia. 'On the top of it are lions, in the middle pastures, with goats, at the root of it serpents; whence it was called a monster spitting fire, with the head and heart of a lion, the belly of a goat, and tail of a dragon, said to be slain by Bellerophon, because he made the mountain habitable.' The whole of the tomb is as perfect as when first excavated, which must have been some thousand years since. The Devastation steam-vessel has arrived from Constantinople to convey several of the specimens to Malta, taking them from the Medea. We are lying about thirty-five miles from the Xanthus now. We shall run up there on the 12th of March, as after the 16th of that month all the party engaged in the discoveries, who are at present in huts or houses on shore, will keep on board the Medea, the change of climate about that time being very injurious to those sleeping on shore, rendering such precaution necessary to avoid the severities which were experienced by the expedition engaged in the survey in March last. By the first week in April Mr. Fellowes and party will have completed their speculations, and when we have embarked the produce of their labours, we shall start with them for Malta, touching at Rhodes on our way thither. After that we shall be for England."

CHANTREY'S STATUE OF GEORGE IV., TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.

CHANTREY'S STATUE OF GEORGE IV., IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.

This magnificent bronze statue has just been placed upon a pedestal at the north-east corner of Trafalgar-square, (that nearest to St. Martin's Church), and has attracted much attention. It is an admirable work of art, worthy of Chantrey, and one of the noblest ornaments that the metropolis has received of late. The dress is at once characteristic and elegant; the rider is well placed in the saddle, and has an air of dignified ease; the left hand holding the bridle loosely, and the right grasping a baton, which rests upon the thigh. The dress is nearly of the modern costume, such as any gentleman might ride out in without being conspicuous; at the same time, it is made subservient to the principles of sculpture; and it forms a good example of what such dress may become in the hands of an artist of real taste. In contradistinction from those artists who, to avoid the obsolete error of dressing their statues in Roman costume deem it necessary to go into the opposite extreme of imitating all the offensive minutiæ that may happen to belong to the absurd fashion of the moment; cocked hat, epaulettes, pig-tail, &c. The drapery has been termed by a clever contemporary, "a conventional compromise between modern and classic costume;" the only semblance of the latter is the mantle or cloak, which "covers the upper part of the figure, on which it hangs in light and graceful folds, that sufficiently express the form beneath." "The horse stands firmly in a natural attitude of rest, all four feet being placed on the ground. This is a novelty in equestrian sculpture; the horse being usually represented ambling or curvetting. The change is for the better, and will, doubtless, be followed by other artists. The head of the horse is finely animated, the chest ample, and the limbs muscular and finely formed; and the hair is well treated throughout."

This statue was originally intended to be placed on the marble arch in front of Buckingham Palace; and its cost was included in the estimated expense of that structure. The commission was given to Chantrey by the express command of King George IV.; and was not left to the medium of Mr. Nash, as were the other sculptural decorations of the Palace. Mature consideration, however, suggested that the attic of the arch would not serve as a fit pedestal for the statue; and, moreover, an alteration was made in the plan of the arch, by which that location would have been still less appropriate. Its present position would have been much to the satisfaction of Chantrey, who was always anxious that the statue should have its own pedestal, and so become a central object in itself, instead of a part of a larger whole.

The statue was completed about the year 1833; since which time it has remained standing in the yard of the sculptor's foundry, waiting a location, owing to the above cause. The height from the feet of the horse to the head of the rider is upwards of 13 feet; the weight of the whole is about 7 tons; and Chantrey is believed to have received for his masterly piece of bronze statuary, the sum of £9000.

RELINQUISHMENT OF TAHITI BY THE FRENCH.

The apprehensions which have been entertained for some time past of a misunderstanding taking place between this country and France, in consequence of the seizure of the island of Tahiti by the French, have, we rejoice to say, been dissipated within the last few days. On Tuesday a second edition of the Times announced the gratifying intelligence that the French Government had restored the island in question to Queen Pomare, and that Louis Philippe means to adhere to the treaty of September the 9th, 1842.

Sir Robert Peel, in referring to the conduct of the French Government in reference to the affair of Tahiti, pronounced a well-merited encomium on Louis Philippe. The restoration of the sovereignty of Tahiti to Queen Pomare has not been the result of any menaces or remonstrances on the part of our Government, but is his own voluntary act.

The simple fact that Louis Philippe should, of his own free will, have thus relinquished territory which one of his officers had taken possession of in the name of France, shows that Louis is not the ambitious and grasping monarch which so many persons represent him to be. It, moreover, affords conclusive proof that he is desirous in reality, not in appearance only, of maintaining a friendly intercourse with this country. He knew that his retention of Tahiti must have led to serious misunderstandings with England, and that Lord Aberdeen must have commenced the work of remonstrance without delay. He has saved Lord Aberdeen the unpleasant task. He has superseded the necessity of all reference on the part of our Government to the unpleasant matter, and thus increased his claims on our friendly feelings towards himself and his Government.

The English public cannot be sufficiently gratified at this happy termination of what threatened, a few days ago, to prove a very unpleasant affair. In the beginning of the week the annexation of Tahiti to the Crown of France was the subject of universal conversation; and everywhere the greatest fears were entertained that it might lead to a rupture between the Court of the Tuileries and that of St. James's. Need we say, that any serious misunderstanding between these two Courts would, at the present time, have been one of the most disastrous occurrences that could have taken place? The peace of Europe is dependent on the continuance of the existing amicable arrangements between France and England. A quarrel between these two countries would involve the whole of Europe in squabbles and quarrels, the evil effects of which it would be impossible to calculate. Happily the calamity has been averted; and not only so, but the disinterested and pacific conduct of France cannot fail to strengthen and perpetuate the amicable relations which subsist between the two countries.

The war party in France are, as might have been expected, perfectly furious at finding that Louis Philippe has relinquished his possession of Tahiti, and restored that island to its rightful Sovereign. The old and worn-out charges against the Administration of Guizot—that he is sacrificing France to England—have been brought forward with increased vehemence and earnestness. He is accused of ignobly truckling to this country, and of compromising the honour and interests of France to a cowardly apprehension, lest he might incur the displeasure of the Court of St. James. It might have been supposed that the war party in France would by this time have tired of sounding this cuckoo note. Not so, however. They repeat it with as much emphasis as if they had never uttered it before. It seems, indeed, to be a stereotyped cry. It is always on their lips: always forthcoming whenever the slightest incident occurs connected with the foreign policy of France. Nothing is too absurd to set the war party among our neighbours off in full cry against the Administration of Guizot. England haunts France by night and by day. They see her hand in every thing that occurs. No event takes place in which they are concerned—none, we mean, that comes into collision with the national vanity—which is not at once ascribed to British influence.

It is impossible, in this calm and collected country, to form any idea of the paroxysm of passion into which the least important circumstance—provided English agency be supposed to be seen in it—throws the people of France. And seldom have they been worked up to a pitch of greater excitement than by the intelligence of the relinquishment of Tahiti on the part of Louis Philippe. Their journals, which are more strictly the representatives of the national mind, than is the newspaper press of this country, are perfectly furious. They do not reason on the subject; it seems as if their reason were utterly gone. They literally rant and rave. England is denounced in terms of fiercest indignation. Louis Philippe is held up as a traitor to the principles which placed him upon his throne; and Guizot is not only pronounced unworthy to retain his place, but is portrayed in the blackest colours ever employed to paint the character of a minister. Did we not know the genius of the French—were we not aware how compatible, in their case, the most terrible tempest of words is with quietude of action—we would expect every day to hear of the expulsion of Louis from his throne, and the decapitation of Guizot. Weak and infatuated people! It is fortunate for them that they have such a sovereign as Louis Philippe: it is a mercy that they have such a minister as Guizot. A less judicious monarch—a less firm and enlightened minister—would long before now have involved France in a European war, and most probably have involved it in irretrievable ruin.

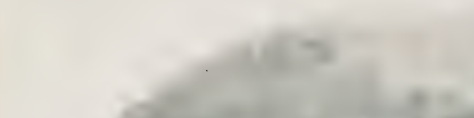
THE REBELLION IN SPAIN.—ALICANT.

The seaport town of Alicant, in Valencia, has of late acquired considerable interest from its having been the seat of rebellion and blockade. Thus, the Castellano publishes a letter from Elche of the 10th ult., stating that the insurgents, after closing the gates of Alicant, and walling up that of the Queen, had published a bando, permitting the women and children under twelve years of age to depart. Two coast-guard boats blockaded the harbour.

In the news dated Madrid, Feb. 15:—"The Government journals insert letters from Alicant, stating that the insurgents are already beginning to feel the effect of scarcity in that city, and quote the price of provisions as extravagantly high. They also inform us that Boné and his partisans had taken the precaution, previous to the arrival of the blockading forces, to scour the country, and carry off all the cash to be found in the local treasuries and excise offices, which they acknowledge amounted to above £1200 sterling. It appears further, that the insurgents had taken the precaution, whilst the sea was open, to obtain a stock of ammunition, which, say the same Ministerial journals, 'came by a corsair from Gibraltar!'" Next, Madrid letters of the 16th ult. brought details of the execution of seven officers near Alicant.

Alicant is built in a bay of the Mediterranean, on a peninsula, at at the foot of a rocky mountain, which has a fortified castle at its summit, four hundred feet above the level of the sea. It has a mole, or quay, and a neat little temporary lighthouse. The houses of the town are flat-roofed, and the only good building is the Hotel de Ville, a stone edifice, in a highly ornamented style of modern architecture. Mr. Allan, in his recent tour, says:—"We were told there were no less than fifty subjects resident here: but party feeling keeps them much apart, and in disunion. Many English workmen are employed in smelting silver and lead ore, brought from mines recently discovered near Carthagena, and said to exist all along the coast, between that place and Malaga. Large smelting works have lately been established here, a short distance outside the town."

ALICANT.—DRAWN ON THE SPOT BY F. G. SARGENT, ESQ.



ALICANT, FROM THE BAY.

Few places in Spain have suffered more from political persecution than Alicant, and its present condition must be bordering on a state of distraction, fatal to its declining commerce and the general interests of the inhabitants.

The subjoined view of Alicant, sketched from the harbour, is one of the illustrations of Mr. Allan's beautiful "Tour in the Mediterranean," just published.

According to a despatch from General Roncali, he opened his fire against Alicant on the 17th, at one o'clock in the morning, and had thrown a great number of shells into the town. The insurgents made a sortie, but were driven back. The horrible butcheries on both sides continued unabated, and scenes of a still more horrid description are anticipated on the fall of Alicant, which cannot hold out long. According to one report, Roncali had already shot one in every five of his prisoners, who amounted to more than two hundred, and all the insurgents, taken in two Custom-house sloops, were ordered to be shot on deck.

Another despatch, of the above date, received at Madrid from General Roncali's head-quarters at Villa Franqueza, details the progress of operations for the blockade of Alicant whilst awaiting the arrival of his battering train. He had that day completed a battery of howitzers in the Alicantina foundry (the British foundry mentioned above), and had taken possession of a considerable store of coals for the use of the steamers-at-war. The insurgents had fired round shot and grenades at the new battery, but had not done any damage thereby. During the previous night, from one o'clock to three, he had employed the Nacionales of the surrounding country in keeping up a fire against the wall of Alicant in its entire circuit landward. The rebel enemies believed themselves attacked in reality, and after a general uproar in the place, remained all night in arms at the wall. In the morning they made an attack, and were repulsed with the loss of two killed and several wounded.

The civil Government of the province of Alicant has been established at Elche, the nearest town of consideration to the place besieged. General Roncali has also established another battery in a windmill on the hill of St. Julian, towards the east, which, it is said, overlooks the second line of defence of the Castle of Alicant. Deserters say that the Patulea have taken possession of the harbour to prevent the escape of the faint-hearted in the city, and declare that all shall embark, or all perish together." They further say, that "Boné sleeps constantly in the Castle, and the revolutionary junta hardly holds any sessions: one of its members, Espana, feigns illness; but Franco and Carreras are almost always on duty, for they have no confidence in the Nationals, no regular troops remain with them; and it is only by not laying aside for a moment the gun or the sword, that they can half fulfil the military necessities of their position." The young Empecinado is also amongst them. Constant desertions are announced by the besiegers, and preparations are made for cutting off the supply of water from the famous well of Fuensanta. The decree of "No quarter" is not permitted to be a dead letter in the hands of the military authorities.

SPAIN.

We are very barren in news from Spain, owing to al. the Liberal journals having ceased publishing; even that moderate paper El Mundo has been ordered by the Government not to appear until further orders. Private letters have, however, been received from Madrid to the 20th; they—although written with the greatest caution, all letters being opened at the post—describe the state of affairs not only in the capital, but in the departments, as most alarming. The people are indignant at the cruel treatment of Messrs. Cortina and Mados, who although the Government now declare that they have no serious charge against them are still to be sent to Valence a to be tried by a Court Martial; the members composed of the tried partisans of the Ministers. The barbarous General Roncali, not satisfied with having shot seven officers, has now determined on decimating al. the prisoners taken in the affair with Borbi. The insurgent chief, by way of reprisal, has caused the Commandant-General Lassala and the political chief Gionti, to be thrown into dungeons; and has notified to them that they were to be prepared for death. The last accounts from Alicant are that the insurgents on that day had still possession of Carthagena and Alica.t, and were preparing for a determined defence. General Roncali, who was before Alicant, was erecting batteries to bombard the fort. Letters from Andalusia give as certain that should the insurgents find sufficient occupation for Roncali until the middle of March, the greater part of that department would rise and join them.

The slaves of the Matanzas have had a serious affair with the military; having revolted, they were attacked and upwards of 800 men killed in the conflict.

The Queen Mother will be received at Perpignan by M. Mathieu, the intendant of the Crown property of Valencia, and Baron de Meer, Captain-General of Catalonia. The French Military Commander of the Pyrenees overtakes Lieutenant-General Castellane, who will also receive the Queen Dowager with becoming honour.

Countess Gorowska, the daughter of the Infant Don Francesco de Paulo, intends quitting Brussels for Madrid, on a visit to her father, whom she has not seen since her marriage.

ITALY.

The following is a copy of a letter, dated Rome, Feb. 19:—"Yesterday, four cardinals were consecrated bishops, the Pope officiating as a bishop and not as pontiff. It is now more than 150 years that a Pope has not officiated for such a purpose in the cathedral of St. Peter. The whole of the diplomatic corps, Don Miguel, and the Prince Royal of Wurtemburg, were present at the imposing ceremony. The accounts from Ravenna are far from satisfactory, and the cardinal delegate fearing for Ferrara, has left for that city. The insurgents have again appeared, they pay the farmers for everything provided for their use, and pursue the pontifical troops in every direction. In a trifling encontre last week, they killed two men, and wounded several others. It is reported that there will be a general rising in the month of March, and that three expeditions will appear simultaneously in the Roman States, one from Malta—a second from Corsica, and the third from Algeria; numerous refugee Spaniards are to join the insurgents. Those reports have been so often circulated, that little faith is placed in them, but this much is certain, that we have numerous secret societies actively at work, and that the Romish States are overrun by determined conspirators, who call themselves 'Young Italy,' and demand a Constitutional Italian Government."

GERMANY.

The following interesting statement of a most deplorable event has been received from the banks of the Danube: "The province of Cadnoun was governed by the Emir Ismael. The former Pacha of Latakia, Youssef, under vain pretexts, imprisoned him, and made him pay 15,000 piastres for his liberty; the successor of Youssef made him pay twice as much. Harroun had got his brother, Mohamet-Aga, appointed Governor of Cadmous, in place of Ismael, who was made one of the councils. Mohamet-Aga demanded from him 20,000 piastres, which being refused, he threw Ismael into prison. The friends of the latter determined to rescue him, and in the night they introduced themselves into the governor's palace, in the centre of which stood the prison. The governor, hearing the noise, called out for his people, but before they could arrive, Ismael's friends fell on him, and killed him. They then delivered their prey, and installed him in the palace. Harroun, furious at the death of his brother, put himself at the head of 100 cavalry, and proceeded to Cadmous; but not deeming himself strong enough, he determined on resorting to stratagem. He accordingly sent the Emir Medhem, a relation of Ismael, to the palace, and this man, by false representations, prevailed on Ismael and three other persons of distinction to accompany him. When at some distance from the palace, Harroun's men fell on them and captured them; the Emir Tamer was seriously wounded. Once in the power of Harroun, he had them cruelly tortured; and as the Emir Tamer was reported to be the person who killed the governor, he had him crucified; the others were loaded with chains, and tied across camels, the head of the crucified man hanging from the neck of one of the animals. The whole party thus entered Latakia, Harroun and his suite playing at the djerid along the road. Ismael and his companions were thrown into prison, the Pacha of Beyrout being applied to to decide on their fate; but it is more than probable that when his orders arrive they will have ceased to exist."

FRANCE.

The information I sent you in my last as to the intention of the French Government not to ratify the imprudent conduct of Admiral Dupetit-Thouars in taking possession of Otaheite, turns out to be correct, as will be found from the following copy of an official article which appeared in the Moniteur yesterday:—"The Government has received news from the island of Tahiti from the 1st to the 9th of November, 1843. Rear-Admiral Dupetit-Thouars, on arriving in the Bay of Papaoia on the 1st of November, found there, on the 9th of September, 1842, which the King has ratified, thought it his duty not to confine himself to the stipulations of this treaty, but took possession of the entire sovereignty of the island. Queen Pomare has written to the King to demand the execution of the clauses of the treaty, which assigns to her the internal sovereignty of her country, and to supplicate him to maintain her in her rights. The King, by the advice of his Council, not finding in the facts communicated sufficient motives to derogate from the treaty of September 9, 1842, has ordered the pure and simple execution of this treaty, and the establishment of the French Protectorate on the island of Tahiti." If I am correctly informed, this tardy act of justice—for it is now more than eight days since the Government were in possession of all the facts—was most reluctantly granted by M. Guizot; not that for a moment he ever sanctioned or approved the conduct of the Admiral, but he was afraid of the Chambers. The speeches of Lord Aberdeen and Sir Robert Peel, coupled with the earnest remonstrance of Lord Cowley, however, compelled him to insert the articles which appeared in the Moniteur. Our opposition journals are tame t is morning rather crestfallen; they anticipated that M. Guizot would not dare to disavow the Admiral, and that a war with England must have been the necessary result. Their pride is somewhat injured too that the disavowal should have taken place after the remarks of the English Government in the House of Parliament; had it been before, nothing would have been said about it—but now "M. Guizot only obeys the orders of Lord Aberdeen." It is but just to state that his Majesty, the instant he received the news, determined on not ratifying it. If I am correctly informed, despatches with the recall of Admiral Dupetit-Thouars, have already left France by a frigate. The question will be discussed in the Chamber. The following took place yesterday in the Chamber of Deputies:—

M. de Carné demanded permission to speak relative to a matter on which he wished to obtain some explanation from the Ministry. "A resolution of the Government," he observed, "was inserted in the Moniteur of this morning, from which it appears that the taking possession of Queen Pomare's territories in the name of France, has not obtained the approbation of the Cabinet. It is, of consequence, in this state of things, that the facts having reference to this important resolution, shall be accurately known. I may add that it is desirable that the discussion in this Chamber shall precede that which may take place in the British Parliament. I have, therefore, to pray the Chamber to appoint Wednesday next for the explanation which I demand."

"M. Guizot—I have no objection whatever to make to the explanation asked for. The Government is ready to give all the information that may be desired.

"M. Bellaud—According to the Moniteur, it appears that the Government is not of opinion that the facts ought to be appreciated as Admiral Dupetit-Thouars has done. It, therefore, appears to me necessary to have the official report on which the Ministry has decided laid before us, and to have it deposited in our archives. I have to ask the Minister for Foreign Affairs if he has any objection to this course?

"M. Guizot—In like manner, I have to reply that I do not see the slightest objection to what is proposed."

The discussion was then fixed for Thursday next.

M. Borrot, the French Consul-General sent to Hayti to regulate the indemnity due to France, has returned; he brings with him 300,000 piastres.

The editor of the journal La France has been found guilty of publishing articles, being a personal attack upon the King, showing an adhesion to another form of government than that established by law, and attacks upon the oath of allegiance and fidelity. He was sentenced to eight months' imprisonment and a fine of 8000 francs (£320).

At the annual public sitting of the Academy of Sciences a prize of 4000 francs was given to M. Machen, of Verviers, for his method of extracting starch from flour without injury to the gluten, or nutritive principle.

On Saturday evening last, his Majesty, accompanied by General Athalen, Colonels Dumas and De Chabannes, and several orderly officers, left Paris for Chateau d'Eu.

The falsification wine continues to an alarming extent. A few days since the police seized 100 pipes of adulterated wine in the cellars of one of the first Houses in the trade.

We have been rather more gay this last week; we have had several well attended private concerts. That given by Dupres was most fashionably attended. Dupres sang one of Barbe English ballads, accompanied by the composer. His language was pure and distinct. The soirées of M. Pankouke are much frequented, not only by the élite of Paris, but every artist of merit. M. Pankouke possesses one of the most extensive and best selected galleries of werth and curiosities in Paris. The musical and dancing soirées of our countryman, Mr. Cuthbert, are decidedly the best regulated and amusing to be found in our capital. They are the resort of beauty and fashion. Mrs Cuthbert and her charming daughter are the fairy queens who preside over these delightful meetings.

The long-expected ballet has at length appeared at the Grand Opera. It is called "Lady Henriette; ou, la Servante de Greenwich." The subject is trifling, but the decorations are excellent. The music, which is pleasing enough, is by de Flotoro, Burgmuller, and Deldeves. It was well received.

We have a species of petty warfare at the Italian Opera. The director has applied to the court of justice, demanding that his contract with Formasari should be cancelled on the ground that this artist, who receives 25,000 francs for the season, has not fulfilled the conditions of his agreement, by, at the hour of performing, sending a certificate of ill health. Formasari says that he is prepared to show that he is not in a fit state to sing. It is reported that an action will also be brought by the director against Bonconi for jilting rather too merry on a Carnival night, and preventing, by his non-appearance, the representation of the "Barber of Seville."

One of the great admirers of Madame Catalani has had her portrait engraven, and profusely distributed.

Doehler, the celebrated pianist, is now in Paris.

The Carnival at Naples has been rather dull.

An opera by Jaubert, called "Puss in Boots," is now in rehearsal at Berlin. The King has refused to accept the resignation of Meyerbeer as Maitre de Chapelle. It is said that Meyerbeer is writing an opera to be called "The Emperor Rodolph of Nassau."

Spohr, the celebrated violinist and composer, has resuscitated; he lately played at a concert at Hesse Cassel.

Letters from Denmark speak in high terms of a violinist named Bassini; it is said that he is likely to succeed Paganini.

BELGIUM.

BRUSSELS, Feb. 21.—It is asserted in a letter that the King of Sweden was growing worse; the mortification in the leg is ascending, and there are no longer any hopes of saving him.

Messrs. Cubitt and Sopwith, English engineers, arrived yesterday at the Hotel de l'Europe. They are come on account of some capitalists of London and Belgium, to examine on the spot the plans of the engineer of the state for the new railway between the Sambre and the Meuse, which has been long called for by the interests of the manufacturers of that country. They waited the same day on the Minister of Public Works.

The King has received a letter from the Emperor of Austria, notifying the death of the Archduchess Maria Christina, and a letter from the Grand Duke of Oldenburg, notifying the death of her Royal Highness the Grand Duchess.

His Majesty goes into mourning to-day for a fortnight.

The measures taken by the Prussian Government, respecting the Polish deserters who have arrived in the Grand Duchy of Posen, are being carried into execution. Most of them belong to the higher classes of society; considered as state prisoners, they are sent to the fortress of Magdeburg, where they will be confined. It is calculated that since the expiration of the cartel with Russia, 2000 deserters have come to the Grand Duchy of Posen.

GREECE.

Letters from Athens to the 6th ult. state that the party agitation in the National Assembly is still kept up by the debates on the proposed Constitution, but that public tranquility has not been disturbed. The Mainotes are kept quiet by promises that their claims shall have justice done to them by the law. The 4th article of the Constitution, which gave rise to the stormy debates, has been passed in the following terms;—"All Greeks are equal before the law, and contribute to the charges of the State in proportion to their fortunes. Greek citizens alone can hold public offices. Those only are citizens who become so according to the laws of the country."

The latest dates are of the 10th inst. They announce the recovery of King Otho from illness, and that grand fêtes had taken place at Athens to celebrate the event, on the occasion of the anniversary of his Majesty's birth-day. M. Mavrocordato, the Greek Ambassador to Constantinople, had given in his resignation, in consequence of a difference between him and the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Liverpool, Capt. R. W. Evans, arrived at Southampton on Tuesday night at 11 o'clock, bringing mails from Gibraltar, Cadiz, Lisbon, and Vigo. Her dates of departure are as follow:—From Gibraltar, Sunday, Feb. 18, at six o'clock p.m.; Cadiz, Feb. 19, at nine a.m.; Lisbon, Feb. 22, at five p.m.; and Vigo, Feb. 23, at half-past five p.m. The letters received by this vessel announce the insurrection as virtually at an end. The great bulk of the army remained faithful to the government, and the people had taken no part whatever, either for or against the movement. Indeed, the insurgent bands had been much thinned by desertion; and many of them had returned to their allegiance. All the most influential men of the Septembrist party were in prison or had fled. Three brigades, under the command of Viscount Fonte Nova, had been dispatched in pursuit of the rebels, who, it was reported, had sought refuge in Spain.

SYRIA.

Our private letters from Beyrout, of the 17th of January, announce that a general insurrection is on the point of breaking out in the Lebanon. The roads are no longer safe for travellers, and even the field labourers are compelled to work with a musket on their shoulders. The oldest inhabitants declare that a similar state of anarchy never before existed in the Lebanon. A few days previously the dead bodies of two mountaineers were found between Beyrout and Tripoli, who had been assassinated and plundered by the troops of Essad Pacha, who refused to surrender the murderers to justice. Essad Pacha was exercising the most odious oppression over the unfortunate Maronites. He had lately quartered on the inhabitants of Kasserouan paying a tribute of 30,000 piastres, although the Porte had exempted the inhabitants of that province from all tribute during three years, in consequence of the losses they had suffered in the war of 1840. The inhabitants having been intimidated, paid part of this sum; but the British Consul having been apprised of this fact commanded them not to pay any more.

AMERICA.

By the arrival of the packet-ship Cambridge, from New York, we have papers two days later than those received by the Britannia steamer. The Cambridge is the packet-ship of the 1st, but owing to the ice in New York harbour was detained a day in her going out.

We learn that the rejection of Mr. Porter, as Secretary of War, had been confirmed by the Senate, after a protracted sitting, only three members supporting the nomination, and forty-two voting against it.

On the same day a resolution was submitted similar to that in the House of Representatives, requiring the President to give the British Government the twelve months' notice under the Oregon convention.

Mr. Benton offered in the Senate, on the 30th Jan., a resolution inquiring whether slaves escaping to the British dominions since the treaty of 1842 had been given up; and also a resolution proposing that the provision of the treaty of 1842 relative to the surrender of criminals escaping from justice be terminated. On the following day the first resolution was agreed to; and the second, on the motion of Mr. Benton, was postponed until the 14th ult. Mr. M'Duffie gave notice that he would offer a resolution that would bring the bill introduced by him within the jurisdiction of the Senate, in order to obviate the objection to its discussion.

At the same time a resolution was offered for an estimate of the expense that would be incurred in causing the steam frigate of the same station to leave New Orleans on a month, and cruise among the West India islands and along the coast of the Carribbean sea and the Gulf of Mexico, &c., returning to New Orleans, and touching at such intermediate ports. Also a resolution of inquiry, contemplating the establishment of a naval depôt, at some point near the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi.

Some discussion had also taken place relative to the southern states and their right of interfering on certain questions, but this was of an unimportant character.

The Peruvian Treasury had issued a notice to claimants under the convention with Mexico to the effect that holders of certificates would on their presentation receive their proportions of the second instalment and interest paid by Mexico, after deducting expenses of transmission and insurance on the transmission of the funds to the United states. They are amount to be distributed to 137,748 dols. 28c., and is equivalent to six 83934-100000 per cent on the respective swards.

The Hon. Alexander Porter, one of the United States Senators, from Louisiana, died on the 14th ult. at his residence near Franklin, Attakapas.

The accounts from various parts of the United States represent the weather as unusually severe.

Papers from New York of the 3rd Jan. have been received by the Mediator, which reached Portsmouth on Monday. They bring only one fact of interest, viz., the resignation of Mr. Calhoun as a candidate for the Presidency.

THE SPANISH QUESTION.

The following letter from Lord Ranelagh, which has been published in the daily papers, may not be considered uninteresting at the present moment:—

TO THE EDITOR.

3, Bolton-row, Feb. 26, 1844.

SIR—The subject of the imprisonment of Don Carlos is to be brought before the House of Commons to-morrow. May I request a place in your columns for a statement essentially bearing on the subject, in which a false judgment by the House of Commons must bring disrepute and discredit upon England? Don Carlos is at the present moment detained a prisoner in France, in consequence, not so much of any desire on the part of the British nation, as of the personal request of Lord Palmerston, made by him in 1840, the responsibility of which is inherited by Sir Robert Peel.

My object in writing these few lines is not to discuss the merits of the numberless "Spanish questions" of the last few years, but I cannot forego an opportunity of bringing before the public such conduct of Lord Palmerston as fell under my own observation, and which has had serious consequences I believe detrimental to their interests. Lord Palmerston's Quadruple Treaty was first framed to pacify Portugal, and was afterwards extended to Spain, to suit the short-lived caprice of the Regent Espartero, then President of that country. It stands a blot upon our national honour, and will remain to after ages as a monument of the debasement into which we ourselves were sunk at the period it was framed. It was, besides, a direct violation of the rights of independent kingdoms, and a gross infraction of the law of nations. This treaty furnishes a singular instance of an interference with the concerns of other states at the moment repeated pledges of non-intervention were stopping from the lips of its framer. It was a convention in which the attitude of Great Britain and France was rather menacing and offensive than conciliatory and firm. It protracted the civil war, wasted the blood and treasure of the people, and its effects are still exercising all the best resources of Spain. If a constitutional government was so much to the liking of Lord Palmerston, why did he confine his efforts to its establishment in Spain? Unguarded as his precedent, might not the example be equally followed by other foreign governments claiming a right to support principles of their fancy, such as Russia in India, America in Canada, France in Ireland? Lord Palmerston was asked in the House of Commons, what would be the course pursued, as regarded England, if other powers adopted a similar line on the Carlist side? The noble lord replied, that two great powers might act as auxiliaries on different sides, and not be at war with each other, but were not the belligerents, and therefore had not the belligerents' right of seizure should any other power choose to send supplies to Don Carlos. On this assurance, and given thus publicly, and recorded in the Journal of a British statesman, several merchants from Holland, Sardinia, and England, sent arms and ammunition to the coast, when, to their surprise, they found that British cruisers had orders to seize them; but, still more to the shame of the honour of Englishmen, let it be known that a defiance of these outward professions of neutrality this British statesman had issued the following order, viz.:—

"Information has been received by his Majesty's Government that a Sardinian squadron of four or five frigates are about to put to sea; and as it is possible that some of the ships of that squadron may appear on the coast of Spain with a view of giving countenance and protection to the projects of Don Carlos, I am to convey to you the directions of the Board of Admiralty, that you do keep a watchful eye on the proceedings of these ships, and to use your utmost endeavours to counteract any effect their presence may produce, as well as to prevent any succours reaching the Carlist forces through their means; you will, however, avoid the risk of any hostile proceedings, unless they should persist, after due warning, in landing arms or munitions of war, or in rendering active assistance or co-operations to any Carlist force with which they may be in the province bordering on the coast."

It will naturally be supposed that Lord Palmerston, after the issuing of this order, would have made the regular and requisite notifications of these instructions to the other neutral states. Such, however, is public speech was for the northern powers, his private order to the British navy. Comment is needless. Lord Palmerston, moreover, said in the House of Commons that the British naval force would remain neutral and take no part whatever in any internal diversion between the Constitutionalists of 1812 and their opponents.

Now, I happened to be in Barcelona two days after one of the most horrid, cruel, cold-blooded tragedies that ever disgraced a civilised country; perpetrated, too, with the connivance and assistance of the principal authorities. This was the massacre of 120 Carlist prisoners. The authors of these murders, though well known, were not molested; but a day or two after, when the Constitution of 1813 was proclaimed, a dozen of the principal inhabitants were sent as pri sioners on board the British man of war, where they were kept, making, for the first time since Britannia ruled the waves, prisons of its wooden walls and gaolers of its officers.

Disgraceful as this may appear, it is not equal to what followed; for I find from the notice of the instructions issued by the noble lord to the Admiralty, that an officer who was in command of a British man-of-war opened a most cruel fire of grape and rascal-shot on the passing army of Gomez, a defenceless set of men, who had not the means of returning so unheard-of and un-English an attack.

The next charge I bring against Lord Palmerston (for I accuse no one else of degrading the British flag) was the part taken by the British naval forces at the siege of Bilboa, where I was myself a witness to a British man-of-war playing the part of belligerent in secret only, her outward appearance of neutrality being stedfastly and strictly preserved. Had she been considered as an enemy, she would have been seized, and, perhaps destroyed. To assume character, quarter, and appearance to which she was not entitled, is a most disgraceful act of hostility occurred in the burning scene at the decisive attack on the bridge of Luchana, yet even there escaped recognition, enveloped, as they were, in storm and darkness, whilst surpassing the all-confiding Carlists. This fact was denied by Lord Mahon in the House of Lords. I was not then in England to answer him. I now defy him or any one else to disprove what I have stated.

I now come to an indignity, or rather a savage barbarity, displayed towards the person of Don Carlos. The following document cannot, I should hope, be expressive of British feelings, but rather those of individual hostility:—

"Viscount Palmerston having signified to my Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty his Majesty's pleasure, that, in the event of Don Carlos applying for protection on board any of his Majesty's ships or vessels, such protection be positively refused to Don Carlos, I am commanded by their lordships to signify these directions to you to guide yourself accordingly. Yours, C. Wood."

Under what circumstances would Don Carlos have asked to be received on board a British vessel? Most likely not under the pressure of personal danger; therefore, there could be no refuge under instrument to cover not the less death, but to aggravate it. Besides, under Lord Palmerston, that would have

SPANISH VILLAGERS RETREATING.

DON CARLOS.—AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

The detention of Don Carlos as a prisoner in France was the subject of a very interesting debate in the House of Commons on Tuesday night; and which, in the words of the Times, has "tended to throw a little light, a few sparks, into the dark chaotic mass of Spanish politics."

Don Carlos, it appears, is at this moment detained in the Hôtel Panette, at Bourges, an ancient city in the department of Cher. Here, as stated by Mr. B. Cochrane in the debate of Tuesday night, Don Carlos is but meanly lodged. "He," Mr. Cochrane, "was at Bourges in the course of last year, and had the opportunity of observing the treatment of that prince. Whatever might have been his conduct, he was a prince of the blood of Spain, and when he entered France one of the articles was that he should be always treated as an Infante. But what was the case? His expenses were limited to 15,000f. per annum—less than £700—irrespective of the rent of a house. He was lodged in most miserable rooms, having only three for himself; he might go out to a distance of four leagues, but four gendarmes and police always attended him. He had now been nearly four years shut up in that place, and had not been allowed to enter a house in the town. His restrictions had become greater than they were at first, for when he (Mr. Cochrane) was there last year he was obliged to have permission from the authorities of the town before he was admitted to see him." On the other hand, Sir Robert Peel stated that he (Sir R. Peel) "was positively assured that Don Carlos had enjoyed, and continued to enjoy, every privilege consistent with safety. So far from being imprisoned, he was permitted to go for leagues from Bourges; he was permitted to visit at every house in Bourges; he had even had the palace of the Archbishop offered him as an abode, and had he accepted that offer, he (Sir R. Peel) had reason to believe that he would have been even still less subject to restraints. These were the positive assurances which had been given him."

Don Carlos is in his 56th year. He is the second son of King Charles IV., and brother of Ferdinand VII., who died in 1833; he once had a fair prospect of succeeding to the throne of Spain. The king, his brother, had four wives, the last of whom, Marie-Christina, bore him two children, and these were daughters. By the provisions of the Salique law, adopted in 1713, by Philippe V., the royal succession was secured to Don Carlos; when the old king was persuaded by the intrigues of the court, to abolish the Salique law, and to name the queen Regent, after his death, of the kingdom of Spain, during the minority of Isabella II. By this coup d'état, the prospects of Don Carlos were cut off; for he had every prospect of wearing the crown, when his niece, a child three years old, ascended the throne which he had so ardently coveted.

DON CARLOS.

We have not space to follow the fortunes of Don Carlos in his attempts to establish his claims to the throne of Spain; more especially as the substance of his career will be found in the parliamentary debate already referred to.

Our other illustration represents an afflicting scene, now too frequent in Spain, viz., the flight of an entire village before a dominant leader; and a more sickening scene of the calamities of civil war can scarcely be depicted.

THE MAID OF DAMASCUS.

Aspettare e non venire, &c.—Italian Proverb.

To wait for those we love—
To wait and wait in vain—
To tread the appointed grove
And tread it o'er again;
Weeping—trembling fearing—sighing—
Living on a hope self-dying—
Oh! there's no tardy, future bliss
That can atone for this—for this!
Methought I heard his step—no—no!
And yet 'twas something soft and sweet,
Which made mine ears mistake it so
For the first echoes of his feet!
They are the music that can bring
My heart-lute all its song again—
They have the magic pow'r to string
Its saddest fret to gayest strain!
But no! he comes not, and I'm left Alone—forgot—perhaps bereft! W.

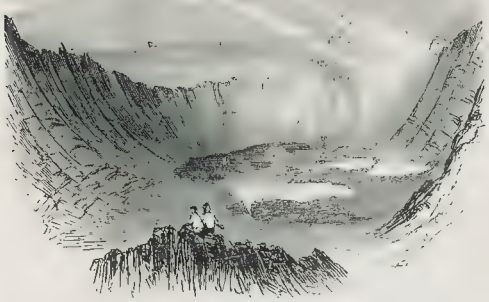
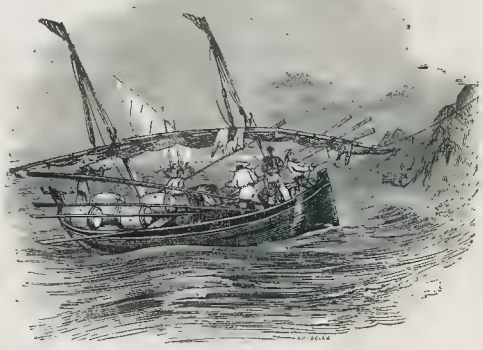
THE MAID OF DAMASCUS.

THE AZORES.



CALDEIRA, OR CRATER, IN CORVO.



PICO WINE-BOAT.

RECENT SURVEY OF THE AZORES.

On Thursday next, her Majesty's steam-vessel, the Styx, having been thoroughly refitted, will leave Woolwich, to complete her survey of the Western Islands; and thus perfect a series of results of great interest to the scientific world, and of high importance to her Majesty's navy, and the mercantile marine. The present is, therefore, a fit opportunity for glancing at some of the principal scenes visited by the Styx, from her first commission.

The Azores, as the majority of our readers may recollect, lie in the North Atlantic, about 800 miles from the western coast of Portugal. They consist of nine islands, in three distinct groups. The north-western group contains the small islands of Corvo and Flores, distant about 114 miles from the central group, which includes Terceira, St. George, Pico, Fayal, and Graciosa. The third group, 69 miles to the south-east of the second, is composed of the two islands of St. Michael and Mary, and the Formigas Rocks.

The expedition originated with Mr. Hunt, the British Consul for the Azores, who, in the letter communicating to his Government the destruction of Praya, in Terceira, by earthquake, in June, 1841, suggested that as several islands had been thrown up in these seas by former earthquakes, it was not improbable that such might have been one of the results of the catastrophe at Praya; and he, accordingly, pointed out a situation, 15 miles eastward of Terceira, as the most likely place for finding shoal water. The Styx, a second-class steamer, under the command of Captain Vidal, was, accordingly, dispatched to ascertain the existence or non-existence of such a formation, by accurate survey. She sailed from Portsmouth in November, 1841; and, after a passage of thirty days, in which she suffered much from bad weather, arrived at St. Michael's; whence, having remained a few days to refit, she started for Terceira, to sound in the direction pointed out by the Consul; but, after a most diligent search, no shoal water was found to exist there. The town of Praya was visited, and a survey made of the bay and adjacent country. The Styx next anchored on what was formerly the summit of Sabrina island, but where is now water fifteen fathoms deep. Sabrina will be recollected to have been thrown up from the ocean in 1811, and to have disappeared in the same year. The Styx now returned to England; and, after a refit, proceeded again to the Western Islands in 1842, to make an accurate survey of all the islands. Fayal was first surveyed, from its having been selected by the West India Mail Company, as a coal depôt for their steamers crossing the Atlantic. Flores and Corvo were next visited, and thus concluded the work of the first summer. Madeira was visited previously to the Styx returning to England; and meridian distances were measured between all the islands, by means of eleven chronometers, and the longitude of each place correctly determined. In the same month the Styx returned to Woolwich, a matter of necessity every winter, as there is no secure anchorage or harbour to shelter the vessel from the very severe gales with which the Azores are visited in winter. In March last, the Styx again left England for Madeira, and surveyed that place and the neighbouring island of Porto Santo, and the Dezertas —three barren rocks, situated about 30 miles south-east of Madeira; and here was made an interesting discovery of a submarine connexion between Point Lorenzo, the eastern extremity of Madeira, and the Dezertas. The Styx left Madeira in the middle of June, and soon arrived at the Azores, where operations were re-commenced: Graciosa was surveyed; as were also St. Michael's and St. Mary's, and the Formigas; there was likewise determined the position of a shoal, which was long disputed, and the existence of which was frequently denied: it has been named Dolabarat's Shoal, breakers having been first seen by that person in a voyage from Martinique in 1783. Pico was next partly surveyed by the Styx; and she left Madeira again in November; having remained there two months, and completed her survey of the island, she returned to Woolwich early in January last: she will start again on the 7th instant, and complete the survey by the examination of St. Michael's, Terceira, and part of Pico.

The most attractive geological results of the survey are those in connexion with the volcanic origin of the islands. One of these is the subject of our first illustration—A Caldeira in Corvo, one of the smallest of the Western Islands, rising abruptly 2200 feet from the sea. This caldeira (Portuguese, large kettle) lies on the north side, and is a vast basin, or seat of an ancient crater, probably of the volcano to which the island is indebted for its existence: it is 1000 feet deep, and nearly three miles in circumference. The cliffs on the north side rise to the very edge of this crater, and every winter brings down by its devastating storms large portions of the rock, which will, in a few years, lay one of the sides of the crater entirely bare. Its interior is now chiefly used for pasture, and is, in many places, cultivated with maize, potatoes, &c. The northern portion of the bottom of the valley is filled with water, upon which are several small islands, declared by the inhabitants to be so disposed as to form a model of the Azores. One portion of this lake being on a higher level than the other, the stream running from it turns a little mill, which grinds the produce of the valley. Many heads of cattle may be seen grazing here unattended, and frequently remain so for many weeks; since the inhabitants, during the winter months of fogs and bad weather, dare not visit the crater, and accordingly, many of the cattle are blown off, and destroyed. The inhabitants, scarcely numbering 300 souls, live in a closely-packed village by the sea, on the south, this being the least exposed spot on the island, and where only they can pass the winter.

Our next illustration is a Wine-boat, such as is used for conveying the wine to Fayal from Pico, where are produced the finest wines, which, though inferior to Madeira, from their low price, find a good market, both in Europe and America. The vines grow among the débris of volcanic matter, which, from its inclination, receives the full force of the sun's rays. Fayal produces no wine, and is only the port where wine is received from the opposite island for treatment and foreign shipment. The boats are picturesque, and have two large lateen sails. The work of taking in wine, as everything else with the Portuguese, is attended with great noise and clamour, and the distance from Pico to Fayal is done in half-an-hour or forty minutes. They are fine boats, and the boatmen exhibit great skill in the management of them; piloting them along the rocky coasts, and often taking in their cargo from off the rocks, under a heavily rolling sea.

THE VALLEY OF WATERFALLS, IN FLORES.

The Valley of Waterfalls, represented in the next engraving, is situated on the eastern side of the island of Flores, and offers from the ocean some of the most beautiful scenery to be met with in this, the most picturesque island of the Azores. The whole island, which is rugged and broken in all parts, here presents a vast amphitheatre, closed, however, on the sea side by the lower cliffs, and in the centre admitting the passage of the waters collected from the many cascades that pour into the valley. The tops of the mountains in this island are rarely free from clouds; whilst innumerable rills unite, and fall in cascades down the perpendicular sides of the valley, which is likewise generally filled with clouds—forming altogether a scene of striking sublimity.

CHURCH OF SANTA CRUZ, IN FLORES.

The Church of Santa Cruz, in Flores (our next engraving), presents a good specimen of the churches to be met with all over the Azores. No hamlet, however small, is without one of these fanes; and they are frequently seen on the mountain side with scarcely a single habitation near. Little or no variety can be detected in their style of architecture, the only difference being in their size, which varies considerably; they are generally kept in bad repair, their revenues being small and the peasantry poor. During the late civil war, religion in these islands received a check; and convents, which were before common, are now nearly unknown. The architecture of the churches is simple, and they are substantially built of lava, the only material to be found here.

We hope ere long to resume these very interesting sketches.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1844.

Can the living be legitimately punished for the faults or crimes of the dead? The question seems a startling one, and the first impulse of every one would be to answer it in the negative. Yet many of the old enactments of the Statute Book were founded on the principle that it was just to punish crimes both in the person of the criminal, and, where he was beyond the reach of the law—in the abode where all evils "cease from troubling"—in the persons of those connected with him. The principle is one of a barbarous age, and of an era of savage manners, proved in some degree by the fact that it now is in full force in China and Japan, where the whole family of a culprit is involved in his punishment, even to extermination. It is not quite unknown, however, to countries that call themselves civilised, and no later than on Tuesday evening last was defended in fact by Sir R Peel, the Prime Minister of England All our readers must be aware of the views we took of that most miserable and deplorable event, the duel at Camdentown, in which Colonel Fawcett was shot. It was an event, the impression of which will not soon die away. But attention has been again turned to it by a question asked in the House of Commons, on Tuesday night, as to whether the Government intends to introduce any measure for the repression of the practice of dueling. The answer of Sir Robert Peel was in the negative; he thinks that the law, if enforced, is sufficient to prevent the practice, if it can be prevented by law at all. But he also claims for the Government the credit of having done all in its power to discourage the practice. When the widow of the unfortunate officer applied to the War-office for the usual pension, she was refused it, on the ground that her husband had fallen in a duel. We know nothing of the circumstances of the lady; but supposing that the refusal of the pension entails the usual consequence of such deprivation —distress—here is the punishment for an offence plainly inflicted on the most innocent and most to be pitied of all the parties affected by the mournful event. The slayer of the husband is superseded as an officer in the army; but as a civilian he has gone scathless of consequence from the law. The two seconds, more guilty in our eyes than even the principals, are yet, we believe, in the rank, and receiving the pay of English officers. Colonel Fawcett is in his grave, but his widow is punished for his fault, and the consequence of crime is visited on one not only guiltless of offence, but the most severe sufferer of all, without this additional affliction—it may be—poverty and destitution. It is right to discourage duelling; but this does not seem calculated to affect it. Society at present brands the refusal to accept a challenge with cowardice and disgrace; it leaves the challenged no alternative but the violation of the laws of God and man—or wordly shame and obloquy. However, nature is weak, and honour in the eyes of our fellow men is dear to its weakness. Few there are who have strength enough to obey that code which is the most binding on a Christian. This is common to all; but in the army it operates with tenfold force. At this moment an account of a court martial is before the public, in which one of the charges against an officer is that "he did not take notice" of some offensive language used towards him. Thus the military code accuses a man if he refrains from fighting, and punishes him when he does! Colonel Fawcett, according to the received notions of society, had no alternative but to go out, as it is called, or to lose caste as "an officer and a gentleman." He fell, and his widow is the only one who is severely punished! We cannot conceive this to be just. A life passed in the service of the country justly entitles a man to certain rights, which extend to his survivors, and are looked on as certain, provided death overtakes him while he is still in that service, or liable to be called into it. The pension is gained by past service, and cannot, we think, be withheld in consequence of the manner of the death. There is no understanding to that effect, that we are aware of, in the compact between the soldier and his country. Death in a duel invalidates a policy of insurance; but then the condition is stipulated between the parties to the contract. If death, when it involves a crime, is to forfeit a pension to the widow of a soldier, it must, on the same principle, be enforced against the widows of those officers who may commit suicide. The Government can hardly be prepared to carry it out to this extent; yet suicide is, by both human and divine law, a distinct, defined, and, indeed, deadly crime—as being almost the only one that precludes the possibility of repentance. The intention of the Government is good, perhaps; but the principles of the case have not been sufficiently weighed. It will surely reconsider its somewhat harsh determination.

Although we have strongly expressed our opinion that it is high time for the legislators of England to do their duty towards the peculiar interests of their own country—and, above all, to attend to the sad plight and miserable condition of the poor—and although we have declared an earnest desire that no particular part of the empire should monopolize the attention of Parliament in a spirit of exclusion, as Ireland has monopolized it through many a session of tedious debate—yet we do not think that a public journalist would discharge his duty to the public if he did not make some remark upon the long-drawn discussion which closed the parliamentary proceedings of the last week—and parried a direct and strongly-urged attack upon the Government, with a majority of ninety-nine votes in favour of the Minister and against Repeal. We still believe that too much public time was wasted literally thrown away—upon that discussion; but we do not, therefore, underrate the importance of the principles it caused to be enunciated, the arguments it propounded, or the declarations it called forth. It was a great party struggle, before which the true usefulness of discussion could not fail to make itself apparent—and from a mass of fallacy and verbiage to elicit much wholesome and valuable truth. Ministers should remember that the truest and best statesmanship is that which legislates more than it debates, and show the country the superiority of action over words. The eccentric lucubration of Mr. Disraeli, we may remark, contained much practical truth and some sound common sense, and the mixture of force and fable, of fact and fallacy, which pervaded the brilliant oration of Mr. Macaulay, fell glitteringly upon the ear. Sheil was energetic and powerful beyond question; and Stanley caustic and severe; and other men said things that were eloquent and impressive, too—yet, upon the division, and as we think through the discussion, the triumph of the Government could hardly be disputed. But we only speak of triumph as far as the debate was concerned—no further. The usefulness which it elicited in the shape of truth, could be no triumph to any Government in England, Peel or Russel—Tory or Whig. The truth which it demonstrated was the misgovernment of Ireland, insisted upon by O'Connell and the Irish people, and disputed and denied with equal obstinacy by all English Administrations alike. We have opposed Repeal heartily—but we know that the separation of the two countries is fortunately a question as hopeless as it is bad nevertheless we admit freely, though sorrowfully, the fatal misgovernment of Ireland, and we insist that the time has come upon us when she must be governed well. Now, it is because we believe this conviction has taken root and will be strengthened among our English countrymen by the facts that have come out upon the debate, that we so extract usefulness from what we should otherwise consider a mere profligate expenditure of the public time. Perhaps, too, we should deem it valuable, because it has certainly demonstrated the impossibility of Repeal. But it has, with equal certainty, demonstrated also the misgovernment of Ireland and the duty of Ministers to set their Cabinet in order in this regard. Justice must be done to the Irish people. Some plan must be hit upon to reconcile religious prejudices; to create more friendly relations between landlord and tenant; and to remove the bitter load of the bad Poor Law from the bruised hearts and wounded spirits of the poor. We want to see no English interests sacrificed—but here are there tangible propositions which a Minister might propound to Parliament, and which are better worth deep, serious, and absorbing consideration, than all the party conflicts that were ever waged upon the floor of the House; better ten thousand times than lingering debates of attack and defence, involving the existence of a Ministry rather than the welfare of a nation. We may scout the bugbear of Repeal of the Union, but, for Heaven's sake, let us see the grievances of Ireland redressed.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, Sunday.—On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, and the greater part of the household, attended divine service in the private chapel within the Castle. The Archdeacon Wilberforce and the Hon. and Rev. Charles Leslie Courtenay officiated. On Saturday her Majesty and Prince Albert took their usual morning walk in the royal pleasure grounds. The Prince of Wales and the Princess Alice when were taken out for a carriage airing on Saturday morning, and the Princess Royal rode on her pony. Sir R. Peel arrived shortly after two, and, after an audience of her Majesty, returned to town.

MONDAY.—The Royal Highnesses the Princess Alice and the Princess Royal were taken an airing. The Queen and Prince Albert remained in the afternoon. Archdeacon Wilberforce left his departure from the Castle in the forenoon. Mr H. Lowreck had the honour of submitting to the inspection of her Majesty an Irish Royal Highness Prince Albert has model of a plough on a new principle. The plough is an ingenious contrivance to avoid turning, and has a coulter both ways.

TUESDAY.—The Queen and Prince Albert enjoyed their usual early walk. Her Majesty and her illustrious consort again proceeded in the afternoon.

WEDNESDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert have left the Castle, and were the royal family taken out for their accustomed airing. His Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out on horseback in the forenoon, attended by Colonel Wylde. The Right Hon. Sir Robert Peel arrived at the Castle at one o'clock, and, after having had an audience of her Majesty, returned to town.

THURSDAY.—Her Majesty and Prince Albert walked for some time in the pleasure grounds this morning. The Prince afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Col. Wylde. Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar and Lord C. Wellesley had some excellent sport, rabbit-shooting in the preserves in the Great Park this afternoon.

MARRIAGE IN HIGH LIFE.—The marriage of Thos. M. Montgomerie, Esq., with the Hon. Georgiana Louisa Foley, daughter of the late Lord Foley, was solemnised on Tuesday, the 27th ult., at St. George's, Hanover square. The ceremony was performed by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Norwich; after which the happy couple left town for Mr. Montgomerie's seat, in Norfolk. Lord Foley gave a déjeuner à la fourchette, at his mansion, in Hanover square, to a number of relations of the families, amongst whom were the Princess Sapieha, by the side of Lord and Lady Melbourne, the Marchioness of Westmeath, Lord and Lady Marcus Hill, Lord, Lady, and Miss Gage, Lord, Lady, and Miss Ingestre, the Hon. Mr. and Mrs. J. Ashley, Mr. and Mrs. Beauclerk, Sir Charles and Lady Cockerell, Lord and Lady Fitzgerald, Sir Edward Baker, the Rev. George Montgomerie, Mr. Frederick Montgomerie, Mr. Bonner, &c., &c.

DEATH OF BARON WALLACE.—Lord Wallace died on the 23d instant, at his seat, Featherstone Castle, Northumberland, in the 75th year of his age. The late Baron married the widow of Sir Thomas Saville, and daughter of the second Earl of Hopetoun, by whom he has left no issue. Lord Wallace was Master of the Mint, and Vice-President of the Board of Trade under the Wellington Administration, and was raised to the Peerage in the year 1835, by the title of Baron Wallace of Knaresdale. Before his elevation to the Upper House his Lordship sat for Penryn and Weymouth. His lordship dying without issue the title becomes extinct.

His Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, attended by the Hon. Capt. J. Macdonald, Aide-de-camp, has returned to Corfu from a tour in the Neapolitan and Papal States. His Royal Highness, during the present, three weeks at Naples. The Prince's establishment at St. James's Palace is kept up on a reduced scale, and his Royal Highness is expected on a visit to his illustrious relatives in this country late in the season.

STRATHFIELDSAYE.—The Duke of Wellington arrived on Tuesday evening from Apsley House, a portion of his grace's domestic establishment having come from the metropolis on Saturday with the plate. The noble and gallant duke, as Lord Lieutenant of Hants, gave a splendid entertainment on Wednesday to Mr. Lowndes Bingham and Mr. Justice Cresswell, the judges on the western circuit. The High Sheriff (Mr. Alan Hamilton Wedderburn), the Speaker of the House of Commons, and a circle of about 30 of the magistracy of the county were invited to meet the judges by the noble host. The Duke of Wellington returned to town on Thursday evening.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

A NEW CHURCH.—Has been erected at Parr, near St. Helen's, which was consecrated on Tuesday last by the Lord Bishop of Chester.

The Bishop of St. Asaph has appointed Frederick Bolingbroke Rishana, Esq., of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, one of the Masters of the Birmingham and Edgbaston Proprietary School, in the Hon. Mastership of the Wrexham Grammar School.

OXFORD, Feb. 26.—At a meeting of the Graduates in Divinity, houlen in the Convocation House this morning, the nomination of the Rev. Benjamin Parsons Symons, D.D., warden of Wadham College, to be an Examiner of the Theological Schools, under the late statute, was unanimously approved. An examination for a Lusby scholarship will be held on Tuesday the 22nd of March, and following days. Candidates, members of the university, must not have exceeded their eighth term, are to call on the Vice Principal of Magdalen Hall, on Thursday, the 21st of March. The examiners are the Rev. Wm. Powell, the Rev. H. Walker, and the Rev. E. Hill appointed by the trustees of the Mathematical Scholarships will be held on examination in the schools on Tuesday, the 19th of March, for the purpose of electing one scholar to the present year. Candidates are to call on Professor Powell, in New College-lane, on Thursday, the 14th of March between the hours of one and two, with certificates of their standing, and of the consent of the head or vicegerent of their college. The Rev. Dr. Bandinel in the chair. The secretary read the report, which commenced with a statement of receipts and expenditure for the past year. The number of students for the year and term as follows:—In the faculty of medicine, 84; of arts, 1,128; of law, 28; being 10 less than during the session 1842-3. In the junior school there were 400 boys, being 20 more than during the same term in 1843-4. Some changes have been made in the professorships during the year, in consequence of the retirement of Professor Potter and the death of Professor Kidd. The credit of the college had been well maintained at the university, a sole three-firths of the exhibitions, scholarships, &c., having been gained by members of University College. A donation of 2,000 had been received through Lord Brougham. The Hon. Col. Leicester Stanhope submitted three resolutions, the object being the appointment of a person to read prayers and the scriptures daily in the college, no compulsory attendance being required. The third resolution affirmed that the college had failed to secure the object for which it was established, and that it was desirable to make it a family as well as a day-school. Mr. Hutton and Mr. Warburton, M.P., opposed the resolution, which, for want of a seconder, fell to the ground. The following noblemen and gentlemen were elected to fill the various offices for the ensuing year:—President, Lord Brougham; vice-president, the Earl of Auckland; treasurer, John Taylor, Esq., F.R.S., council, M. Chazer, Esq., W. D. Christie, Esq., Earl Fortescue, James Heywood, Esq., S. J. Loyd, Esq., James Thornely, Esq., M.P.; auditors, Thomas Farrer Hankey, Esq.

CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 23.—The following appointments have taken place:—The Rev. Coningham Thomas Hall, M.A., of St. Peter's College, to the rectory of Washford Pyne. The Rev. Nathaniel Bowen Dennis, B.A., of Corpus Christi College, to the rectory of East Ruttonghon, Sussex. The Rev. Edward Francis Hodgson, M.A., of St. John's College, to the rectory of Holme-cum-Beckering, Lincolnshire. The Rev. James Allen, M.A., of Trinity College, to the perpetual curacy of St. Mary, Quarrhill, Leeds. The Rev. Thomas George Penny, M.A., of Trinity College, to the perpetual curacy of Chernal, Wilts. The Rev. Thomas Westmore and, M.A., of Sidney College, to the vicarage of Sandal Magna, near Wakefield.

The venerable and much-respected Master of St. Catherine's Hall met with an accident on Monday last, which, though fortunately not of so serious a nature as at first thought, will, it is feared, be some time before the Venerable gentleman recovers from its effects. We understand that Dr. Proctor, accompanied by the Master of Jesus College, had been making a morning call at the Rev. Alexander Cotton's, at Girton, and on their return Dr. Proctor, it appears, took a leap, in playing at the game of Aunt Sally, at Girton's cottage having been immediately procured, Dr. Proctor was conveyed to his lodge, the muscles and cords of the knee found that the venerable master, College sorrery bruised and shaken, has no bones injured.

DIOCESAN OF ST. ASAPH AND BANGOR.—A meeting of the clergy of the archdeaconry of Exeter was held on Tuesday, at the College Hall, to consider the propriety of addressing grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, and petitions to the Legislature were adopted, deprecating the union of the two sees of St. Asaph and Bangor. There was a large attendance of the clergy, amongst whom were the very Rev. T. H. Lewis, Dean of Exeter; the Venerable J. Moore Stevens, Archdeacon of Exeter, the Rev. W. E. Peel, rector of Ashreigney; the Rev. C. C. Bartholomew, rector of Lympstone; the Rev. J. T. Toye, rector of St. Stephen's; the Rev. Harris and Tucker, rector of St. Martin's; the Rev. K. C. Harrington, rector of St. Alban's; the Rev. J. M. Douglas, rector of St. John's; the Rev. —— Mealy, vicar of St. Thomas's; the Rev. P. Carlyon, rector of St. James's, &c. An address to the Archbishop of Canterbury and petitions to the Legislature were adopted, deprecating the union of the two sees.

OXFORD, FEB. 28.—The following gentlemen, it is understood, have been nominated this day by their respective colleges, as proctors for the year, to fill the office of proctors for the ensuing year:—Senior Proctor: Rev. Henry Peter Guillemard, M.A., Fellow of Trinity College. Junior Proctor: Rev. Richard William Church, M.A., Fellow of Oriel College.

IRELAND.

CHANGE IN THE IRISH MAILS.—The Hereinafter Advertiser states that the Post-office authorities are about adopting new regulations in reference to the communication between England and Ireland. The Holyhead mail-packet, which leaves Kingstown at half-past six, A.M., is to be discontinued. Indeed, it had become almost wholly useless, as the London correspondence was sent on to Liverpool. There are still to be two mails daily from Kingstown to Liverpool:—one at six o'clock, A.M., the other at half-past six, P.M. The night mail as half past nine is to be discontinued. The early mail from Kingstown, at six o'clock, is to take the Irish provincial mails for England, which are to arrive in the Dublin Post-office at four, A.M., to afford time for the sorting and dispatch.

The inland mails are to leave the Postoffice at eight, P.M., an hour earlier than at present. It is rumoured in Dublin that the Duke of Richmond is to succeed Fitzgibbon, Earl of Clare, as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of the association was held at Conciliation Hall on Monday, John O Connell, Esq., M.P. in the chair. The chairman gave a graphic description of his father's reception in the House of Commons, and at the Anti-Union Law League meeting in Covent-garden Theatre, which he said was unbalanced at a meeting meeting of eighteen months ago. He read a letter from Mr. O'Connell, in which he stated the number of days he had attended the Irish Parliament during the last session, and in consequence of the week, among which was the following letter from Mr. O'Connell :—

"London, Feb. 24, 1844.

"My dear Ray,—I am not a little proud at being able to congratulate the association on one circumstance of its small magnitude. I mean the generous sympathy exhibited by the Irish people for the sufferings, and for the sufferings of the Irish. I have constant manifestations of this kindly and generous spirit, but the meeting at Covent-garden, on Wednesday, produced a scene never exceeded, and I do believe never equalled in any country. This is a spirit to be cherished, as well as admired for its noble generosity. I am sure the association will reciprocate these most laudable and honourable feelings, and that the Irish nation will show that Irish gratitude will at least equal English generosity. We must cultivate these kindly sentiments at both sides. The weakness of affection, however fulsome that it is quite useless for the wise and good in great human affairs, as long the conduct and character of the people would endure. Ireland. Alas, years has passed since the Irish people have had an opportunity to testify to the selfish and base conduct. The misgovernment and the hopeless state of reform is defined by every letter we receive from Ireland. The appalling state of Ireland is not to be remedied by any ordinary means. The people of Ireland are not to be remedied by any ordinary means. The people of Ireland are not to be remedied by any ordinary means. The people of Ireland are

larly to the establishment of the girls' school, commending greatly the object of the committee. It was a new and striking chapter in the history of education, and one that would be the means of producing great good. It disposed him to say with the immortal Burns—

Her 'prentice han' she tried on man,
And then she made the lasses, O!

He then appealed to those within its walls to continue their support and to those without to become members; and, after recounting the benefits of such institutions, concluded by quoting from the works of a celebrated poet—

Howe'er they be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good;
True hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

Mr. Ryalls then sang one of his favourite songs, which was followed by Miss Christiana Weller's performances on the pianoforte, which elicited tremendous applause. The introduction of this lady to the company, and of Mr. Weller to the author of the "Pickwick Papers," caused considerable merriment.

The company were then addressed by Mr. John Smith, and after some excellent singing by Mr. J. Russell, Miss Whitnall, and Mr. H. Wilkin, the company adjourned to the class-rooms and other apartments in the upper story, where confectionery and fruit were served up. The sculpture and picture galleries were thrown open, and in the latter were six large cartoons of scenes from the works of Mr. Dickens, including one from his late excellent work, "The Christmas Carol." After partaking of refreshment, the company promenaded the suite of rooms for about three-quarters of an hour, and again took their seats in the lecture-hall.

Dr. Thorburne then addressed the audience; and Mr. W. B. Hodgson, the secretary, in an eloquent speech, proposed a vote of thanks to Mr. Dickens, which was carried with enthusiasm; Mr. Hodgson stating that the committee, at their next annual meeting, would propose that the name of Mr. Dickens should be inscribed on their roll of honorary members, and that he should receive the silver medal which entitled him to all privileges. (Loud cheers.)

Mr. Dickens then returned thanks, and took leave by quoting himself, in the words of Tiny Tim, "God bless us, every one." A large number of the company then repaired to the picture gallery, where dancing was carried on, for a short time, with great spirit. The majority of the company, however, retired at half-past ten. Thus ended this most enthusiastic, varied, and brilliant meeting.

Our illustrations represent the distinguished chairman addressing the company in the theatre of the institution. The second engraving shows the Sculpture Gallery of the establishment, with a few of the drawing-class copying some of the fine specimens of antique art with which this apartment is enriched.

THE GREAT ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE MEETING, IN COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

ANTI-CORN-LAW LEAGUE MEETING, IN COVENT GARDEN THEATRE.

The annexed engraving illustrates the fifth metropolitan weekly meeting of the Anti-Corn-law League, held in Covent-Garden Theatre, on Wednesday week; and rendered unusually attractive from the announcement of Mr. O'Connell's intended presence on the occasion. The meeting is allowed to have been the largest ever assembled within the walls of the theatre.

As soon as the doors were opened the rush was terrific: boxes, pit, gallery, orchestra, and stage were crammed to suffocation within five minutes after the doors were opened, while the crowd in the street did not seem in the least diminished.

Precisely at seven o'clock, the minutes of the last meeting at Manchester were read: and were confirmed, on the motion of Mr. Cobden, M.P., seconded by Dr. Bowring, M.P., amid extreme silence. Mr. George Wilson, chairman of the League, then addressed the meeting.

Mr. O'Connell did not make his appearance until some time after the commencement of the proceedings of the evening.

Our artist has sketched the platform, or stage, at the moment of Mr. O'Connell's addressing the meeting. The appearance of the platform was extremely impressive; backed as it was by scenery, continued at the wings, the effect was extremely picturesque; the platform, or stage, was crowded; and that of the boxes, and of the whole house, heightened by the presence of elegantly-attired ladies, was splendid and dazzling.

The gathering of the assembly was fraught with interest. Although the house was densely crowded, nothing could exceed the orderly manner in which the multitude kept anxious watch for the arrival o Mr. O'Connell. Ever and anon, cheers, as each known member of Parliament arrived, were caught up by the wedged mass inside, and re-answering echoes rewarded the labourers in the cause.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—IX.

THE HON. SYDNEY HERBERT, M.P.

The name of Sydney Herbert sounds as if it would read better in the pages of fashionable novels, than at the foot of a grim Admiralty order for equipping for storm or battle a "Formidable" or a "Tonnderer." There are men born in such a position that they seem to inherit that which the greatest talents and most unceasing exertions can never reach, and Mr. Sydney Herbert is of the fortunate and privileged number. The office he holds, it is true, is not one of the most important in a political sense; but if he display but ordinary abilities, and if the ascendancy of the Conservative party continue, it will be the stepping-stone to others. Not having the slightest want of office for its rewards, he stands precisely in the position that is most likely to obtain it: almost all the members of the Ministry are rich men. Mr. Herbert, however, is one of the most wealthy. He is stated—with what truth we know not, for we have not seen his genealogical tree—to be a descendant of the celebrated Strongbow, the conqueror of Ireland, who, no doubt, in the confusion of the struggle, took good care of himself as to the division of the spoil of the conquered race. His property descended, with various mutations, to his successors, so that it is not improbable that some of the land held by the young Secretary of the Admiralty may have once belonged to the old feudal marauder. He, in fact, derives a large income from the rents of one of the most improving parts of Dublin. He is half-brother of the Earl of Pembroke, and has succeeded in obtaining office early; his age does not exceed thirty-three, and himself and Mr. Gladstone are about the youngest members of the Government. In abilities, however, he cannot be ranked as the equal of Mr. Gladstone, who has distinguished himself in various ways—as a man of business, an able writer, and a still more able debater.

Mr. Herbert has confined himself to speaking on points connected with his office, in which his greatest efforts were only explaining and proposing the navy estimates. During the present debate on Ireland he has spoken on the general question. He made a much better impression in his speech on this subject than on the Estimates. There the necessity and the anxiety to be exact as to details impeded his fluency. On this occasion he exhibited very little of embarrassment or hesitation. His opinions, too, were liberal on many points, and his tone conciliating on all. He declared himself in favour of some endowment for the Catholic clergy, that would render it unnecessary for them to resort to political agitation as a mode of procuring the payment of their slender stipends.

Mr. Herbert is rather slenderly made; neat and genteel, rather than commanding: his voice is not of the strongest, and altogether, though we do not think he is fitted "the applause of listening senates to command," he may yet take a very creditable position in them, nevertheless. He represents the southern division of the county of Wilts, for which he has sat since 1832. He is a decided supporter of the present Corn Laws, and at a recent meeting of Agriculturists "came out" very strongly against the League.

ABATEMENT OF METROPOLITAN NUISANCES.—On Thursday last a meeting of the corn, hay, and straw dealers, salesmen, farmers, &c., was held at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet-street, for the purpose of receiving the committee's report of their proceedings in respect to the hawking of hay and straw in the metropolis, which practice is found so injurious to the trade. The chair was taken by Mr. Chambers, who made some introductory observations. The Secretary then read resolutions agreed to at the previous meeting, from which it appeared that the cooperation of the authorities at Somerset House, and of the police commissioners, had been promised towards putting down the practice. The chairman further added that it was intended very shortly to submit a case to counsel on the subject; after which the matter will be brought before the magistrates in the usual manner. The following resolution was then read and unanimously agreed to:—"That it is the opinion of this meeting that hawking hay through the metropolis is contrary to law, being in direct opposition to the act 50th George III., section 12, by which hawkers are required to take out licences," &c. Some other resolutions were then agreed to, connected with the intentions of the committee; after which, a vote of thanks was passed to the chairman, who, having acknowledged the compliment, dissolved the meeting.

DREADFUL FIRE AT OXFORD.—TWO LIVES LOST.

Tuesday morning a lodger in the house of Aaron Jacobs, a Jew, living near the church, in St. Ebbe's-lane, in Oxford, discovered the premises to be on fire. An alarm was given, and some engines specially arrived. After the lapse of some time a supply of water was obtained, and by five o'clock the fire was got under, and prevented doing much damage beyond the house in which it originated. The Jew at first escaped with two of his children, but unfortunately returned to the house, either with a view of rescuing a daughter, who refused to leave the house till she was dressed, or what is more generally conjectured (from the position in which he was found), to secure his money and some other portable valuables in a room, or rather closet, at the top of the house, where the remains of his body were found burnt almost to cinders, lying over the box containing his money. The daughter, a girl of 16, also perished in the flames. Aaron Jacobs was a Polish Jew, about 50 years of age, a Rabbi, and held in great respect by his brethren. His body was discovered among the ruins about nine o'clock in the morning; that of his daughter was not found till much later in the day. The houses in the neighbourhood are much crowded together, and it is wonderful that the fire did not extend much further. Jacobs, who was of the tribe of Levi, was a Rabbi; and when a Mr. Levi (also a Rabbi) was informed that the body had been found, he most earnestly entreated that it might not be touched until he had first touched it. This request was complied with, and Rabbi Levi, with some peculiar ceremonial, touched the charred and smoking remains of the deceased, and subsequently repeated over them a "prayer of forgiveness," which, we understand, is usually offered up over the Jewish dead. He appeared extremely desirous that all the mortal remains of the deceased should be collected, and this was carefully done. He claimed the custody of them, placed them in a chest, and had them removed to a room, in Mr. Price's house, where they now remain, awaiting the coroner's inquest. It appears that, as the deceased was a Rabbi, he must be interred in London. Great anxiety has been evinced by Rabbi Levi and the other Jews in Oxford, to have the interment take place according to the Jewish law, within twenty-four hours after the death; but, owing to the absence of the city coroner, this could not be done. Mr. Jacobs, who kept a sort of general warehouse, was reputed a wealthy man, and from the situation in which he was found (in a small closet in the top of the house), it is presumed that he had gone thither to secure his property, and was suffocated before he could make his escape. What adds force to that conjecture is the fact, that a heap of gold and silver coin, with other valuables, were discovered under the body when found. They were immediately taken possession of by Mr. Justice Taylor, and placed under seal. They will, of course, be handed over to the widow and family. Among the property consumed—indeed, nothing has been saved—was a Hebrew Bible, which the Jews held in particular veneration, as it had been consecrated by the High Priest. It had lately been left in Mr. Jacobs' custody, and its loss is deeply regretted by Rabbi Levi, and the other Jews in Oxford. Jacobs's son had only recently returned from Poland. The eldest daughter, Rebecca, was an extremely well-conducted girl, and is spoken of by her neighbours in terms of deep regret. Her father, who had resided in Oxford for several years, was aged 54. The melancholy catastrophe, as might be expected, has caused much painful excitement in that quiet city.

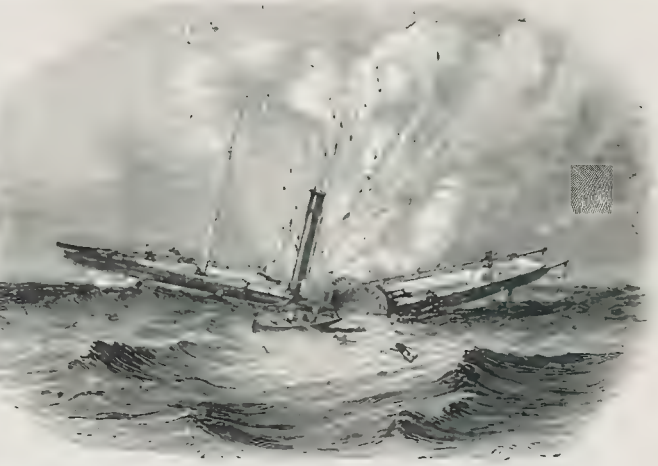
LOSS OF THE ELBERFELD—STEAM SHIP.

For the above sketch of the Elberfeld steam-ship, as she appeared on the afternoon of Thursday, the 22nd of February, we are indebted to one of the persons on board, at the moment of the catastrophe, Mr. William Bush, civil engineer, of Deptford.

Before we proceed to detail the wreck, we would call attention to the invention of a new mariner's compass, constructed upon principles which prevent the local attraction of the ship (the cause of many wrecks) having an undue influence upon it; a point deemed of such importance, that Mr. Palmer, the chairman of the Shipwreck Committee, expressed a strong hope that Government will offer a premium to scientific men, to induce them to give their attention to the subject.

Mr. Bush, it will be recollected, attempted, eighteen months since, to place a caissoon lighthouse upon the Goodwin Sands; but, being inefficiently supported, he was obliged to give up the enterprize, not, however, until he had expended upon the same the large sum of £10,000 out of his own private resources. Yet, to his attempt to erect the caissoon, may be attributed the production of this novel compass, which in all probability will be the means of saving the lives of thousands. Mr. Bush accidentally took down into the chamber of the iron caisson, a marine compass; and to his surprise found no variation in it from the true north, although when he again brought it to the top of the caissoon, he perceived a variation of 10 or 12 degrees. Since then Mr. Bush has constructed a compass of an entirely new description; and from several experiments made at Woolwich, he has found that such compass varied less by 6 degrees than those of the common kind, with which it was compared. We have thus prefaced our description of the loss of the Elberfeld steamer, on account of the invention of the compass being the indirect cause of in any of the persons on board the ill-fated vessel being saved, as will be seen from the following narrative

The Elberfeld, under the command of Capt. Stranack, sailed from the Brielle on the 22nd, at fifty minutes past six, A.M., under light and variable winds. Minute attention was paid to all the compasses on board, there being three belonging to Mr. Bush and two of the common description, when it was observed that the superiority of those of Mr. Bush was maintained during the whole time afforded for observation. Mr. Bush remarked to Captain Stranack that the ship's working appeared to be different from what it was when they left the Brielle, and that there was a strange vibration of the vessel. Scarcely had these remarks [illegible] one of Mr. Bush were but too truly confirmed; he [illegible] to order the boats to be in readiness, for he was con[illegible] being constructed of iron, would afford but few minutes [illegible] themselves. Whilst this conversation was taking place, an indication of a plain nature gave warning that their fears were well grounded, for about ten minutes to three she broke completely in half in the middle of the vessel. Mr. Bush rushed up stairs, exclaiming, "It is now all over, stop the engines and out boat," and himself and two others fell headlong into the boat at the moment she was launched, the wind at this time blowing a brisk gale. Mr. Bush then took the rudder of the boat, and kept her head to the wind, as she was rowed stern foremost towards the vessel to save the remainder of the crew, and to which nautical manœuvre may be attributed the saving of those who were still upon the deck of the ill-fated steamer. The crew of the boat called out to Captain Stranack, who was on the after part of the wreck, to save himself by springing with the oar into the sea, as her head and stern were collapsing. This was a dreadful moment to all; the wreck presented a most awful yet grand spectacle; the boiler bursting by the collapse, threw up immense volumes of steam and fountains of water, and the vessel went down with a loud explosion. After going down, Mr. Bush looked round for her unfortunate crew, and the first he saw was Captain Stranack, struggling in the water, supported by a portion of the wreck. The captain and several others were with much difficulty taken into the boat. Three persons were unfortunately lost,—two stokers, named Wilson, father and son, and the cook, named Andrews. [illegible] Mr. [illegible] Captain Stranack [illegible] was attracted by a handkerchief hoisted as a signal of distress. On getting them on board, Captain Muys humanely supplied them [illegible] coffee, soup, &c. Captain Stranack and Mr. Bush describe the whole occurrence as a dream, for, from her breaking to her going down, not more than five minutes elapsed, and what but a short time before was considered a beautiful model of naval architecture, was sunk irrecoverably in the ocean. The calamity which overtook this vessel illustrates the error of constructing vessels of a great length with the enormous weight of engines, coals, and water amidship, and it is to be hoped that the Government will examine into the expediency of constructing war steamers for sea-going purposes. The loss of the Pressient has been attributed to her length, but no one survived to describe her loss; therefore the present event should be particularly brought under the notice of the Shipwreck Committee, in order that, by the examination of the survivors, they may determine upon the accuracy of such an opinion, and introduce a measure to prevent in future the construction of vessels of the inordinate length to which many have been built. Too much praise cannot be given to Captain Muys for his humanity and kindness, and to those under his command; but the Margate boatmen, before they would land them from the Charlotte, peremptorily demanded an exorbitant price per head, although the majority of the poor fellows were without a shilling. Since their arrival Captain Stranack and Mr. Bush have waited upon the secretary of the Shipwrecked Mariners' and Fishermen's Society, who have given clothing to the crew of the Elberfeld to the amount of £11 6s.; and the General Steam Navigation Company have rewarded the first and second engineers, and forwarded them home free of expense. Captain Stranack and Mr. Bush have subscribed towards a fund to remunerate the captain and crew of the Charlotte, to induce others to follow their noble example.



LOSS OF "THE ELBERFELD" STEAMER.

THE CALEDONIAN SOCIETY'S BALL.

On Thursday night the Anniversary Ball of the Caledonian Society of London, took place at the Assembly Rooms, Hanover-square. The preliminary arrangements were of such a nature as to ensure the attendance of an assemblage as numerous as it was select. The members of the Society had adopted measures to preserve the strictest harmony during the evening, and nothing transpired throughout the dances which was in any way calculated to mar the good fellowship which had called together some hundreds of the most distinguished patrons of this excellent institution. The band, under the direction of Mr. Guinness, was conducted in a superior manner.

The dances selected for the occasion were for the most part taken from the works of Musard, Jullien, Labitzky, Gow, and Guinness. A new set of the "Caledonians," arranged by Mr. Guinness, and a set of Scotch waltzes, by the same composer (dedicated to the stewards of the ball), were greatly admired; and the numerous ladies and gentlemen who figured in the same, appeared so completely to appreciate the spirit of the music, that it was almost impossible to divest oneself of the belief that the dances had been studied expressly for the occasion. About one o'clock the party retired to an elegant supper, prepared by Mr. Hewett, of Regent-street. Mr. Wylie, the President of the Society, took the chair, and after congratulating the company upon the social feeling which happily prevailed amongst them, proposed in due order "The health of her most gracious Majesty," and afterwards that of "The Ladies." The toast which introduced her Majesty to the notice of the meeting was responded to with the most fervent enthusiasm, and after the compliment to the ladies had been duly acknowledged, the company resumed their attendance in the ball-room. The subjoined engraving will serve to convey some idea of the magnificent style in which the ball-room was decorated, the representation of the costumes and the imposing appearance of the various groups being depicted much more forcibly than they could possibly be described. The company seemed so much to enjoy the universal gaiety which prevailed, that, as night advanced, one and all appeared desirous of continuing the dance until a late hour in the morning; and this laudable wish was realised to an extent which could have produced no other effect than that which usually arises from such cheering exercise.

MARCH!—A SONNET.

Thou variable Tyrant of the Year!
MARCH! in thy snow or frosty vestment clad,
Or Making Nature weep a general tear,
Thou hast some attributes which make us glad—
Thou bring'st the sunny April show'rs more near,
And therefore do we take thy embassy,
Rude as it is, to be precursor sent Saying: "at length the Seasons do relent,
And flowery May all joyous ye shall see!"
Mild Zephyr soon will kiss the buds and flow'rs
And through the disentangled woods and bow'rs*
Breathe his warm breath upon the waiting things
That long to have their winter-closed springs
Unlock'd as throat of tuneful bird that sings'. W.

MUSIC.

EXETER HALL.

THE SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—This most praiseworthy and spirited institution has published its Eleventh Annual Report, by which it will be seen that a taste for relishing genuine music is reviving amongst us. The following list of the public performances of the Society during the year from Christmas, 1842, to Christmas, 1843, will sufficiently show this, for nothing but the most sterling compositions have been produced, and the more sterling they were, the more they were attractive.

,, December 22nd

Crotch's New Anthem, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," or Hymn of Praise, Spohr's "Fall of Babylon," and Handel's "Deborah," proved to be delightful novelties amongst the more venerable standards, and were as enthusiastically received as they were splendidly performed. We do not like the prefix of Doctor to the names of Spohr and Mendelssohn; we wish they had not been weak enough to accept this foolish distinction. We have objected to this title before now, and can demand with Horace,

> Quae cura patrum, quave Quiritium,
> Plenis honorum muneribus tuae,
> Augustе, virtutes in revum
> Per libitos, memorēsque fastos
> Æternet?

The word Doctor in itself is not objectionable; but when we know that hundreds of charlatans have been dignified by this once honorary and honorable appellation we are surprised that any genius will now submit to the association it necessarily imposes, or be addressed by a title so desecrated and demeaned.

The enthusiasm evinced in the cause of true music by this exemplary society is manifest from the catalogue of their library, which, "gathering strength as it goes," bids fair to be ere long the first and most comprehensive collection of music in Europe. Our space will not permit us to give a review of the various and splendid talent exhibited by the executive portion of the Sacred Harmonic Society, whether as solo vocalists or aggregate chorists, but we cannot omit a notice of three gentlemen to whom the excellence of the general effect is indebted particularly: Mr. Surman as conductor, Mr. Miller as organist, and Mr. Perry as leader, all of whom have discharged their several important functions with judgment, accuracy, and taste. This society is already an honour to our country, and a cause of generous rivalry throughout the continent.

HEBREW MELODIES—SACRED AND TRADITIONAL.

Mr. Henry Phillips, the popular vocalist, and Mr. Louis Leo, still continue to give their soirées illustrative of the antiquity of Hebrew music. It is an interesting subject, and alike concerns the musician and the antiquarian, although, perhaps, the advocates for its exclusive pre-eminence have not, or cannot, altogether substantiate their claims to entire originality. It is stated in Genesis (chap. iv. v. 21) that Jubal, the sixth descendant from Cain, was "the father of all such as hand e the harp or organ." With respect to the instrument called an organ, in the English version of this passage, Dr. Burney remarks, "it must not be imagined that such a noble and complicated machine is there implied, as the present instrument of that name."

It would be almost an anachronism to assert that the organ existed in an age when harmony was not understood; and yet there is no relic of the arts of antiquity which puzzles more than it does. Without a knowledge of harmony it is scarcely credible that any such instrument could have been constructed; and yet we have proofs of its existence long before the art of counterpoint was known. St Jerome and Vetruvius both acquaint us with the existence of this noble instrument at a time when scientific men were disputing about the divis.ons of the scale, which alone would argue the non-existence of our present system of harmony, and show that the ancients had the means, without the art, of applying them. A similar puzzle embarrasses when we consider the Hebrew melodies, as "bodied forth" by Messrs. Phillips and Leo. There seems to be a freshness about them which does not pertain to antiquity—their construction is evidently on the basis of modern imitation of an elder school: they are too consonant with our present received notions to be old: they are, no doubt, delivered by the afore-mentioned gentlemen as genuine relics of ancient sacred minstrelsy; but, without "any offence," we have no faith in them. But still we would not disturb any pleasurable sensation that their most excellent performance may have caused in the breast of any one—

NEW MUSIC.

I'M AFLOAT, I'M AFLOAT. The words by ELIZA COOK; the music composed and sung by HENRY RUSSELL. Duff and Hodgson.
A very spirited defiance of the Coast-Guard, and, when well sung, as by the composer, full of genuine effect.

SWEET MURM'RING VOICES OF THE PAST. Ballad. The poetry by JOHN J. REYNOLDS; the music by EDWARD J. LODER. Duff and Hodgson.
Graceful, expressive, and flowing; but the appoggiature of the melody might as well be left unharmonized.

THE OLD SILVER BOWL. Song. The poetry by JOHN J. REYNOLDS; the music by EDWARD J. LODER. Duff and Hodgson.
Not very original, and altogether unworthy of Loder, who at times can compete with any composer, living or dead.

MY NATIVE BELLS. Chansonette. The words by MRS. C. BARON WILSON; the music by ALEXANDER LEE. Duff and Hodgson.
A very graceful new reading of the old carrillon, which we had supposed to have retired from composition, and had rung its own knell long ago.

THE LIGHT HOUSE. No. 9 of Sacred Melodies. The poetry by W. EDWARDS STAITE, Esq. The music by JOSEPH PHILIP KNIGHT. Duff and Hodgson.
A melody well conceived, and admirably adapted to its subject; but we should like to see the D sharp, which frequently occurs in the bass, written as E flat.

THERE'S PEACE IN HEAVEN. No. 10 of Sacred Melodies. The poetry by W. EDWARDS STAITE, Esq.; the music by C. E. HORN. Duff and Hodgson.
This is a very smooth flowing melody; but there is an unnecessary retardation of rhythm in the 7th and 8th bars.

I'LL HANG MY HARP ON A WILLOW TREE. Song. Composed by Wellington Guernsey. Dublin.
A sweet, impressive melody is here set to words of very touching and beautiful simplicity, written by Lord Alfred Paget. They came upon us quite by surprise, and evince true poetic feeling. The air catches and interprets their spirit, and has a very pretty accompaniment; and altogether this pleasing ballad has all the elements of popularity.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

The last novelty at this house was a two-act drama "taken from the French" by Mr. Oxenford, entitled "Grist to the Mill." We are not of opinion that it will realize its title in the treasury department: it is an insipid affair, and but for the admirable acting of Madame Vestris, Strickland, and Mrs. W. Clifford, would have proved a fiasco."

When is our legitimate—our Prize Comedy to appear? or, out of the aggregate number presented one hundred and twenty-seven, as we have heard—is there one good one? We hope there are many, and that the delay of choice may be owing to the difficulty of selection.

PRINCESS'S.

The production of the diminutive prodigy "Tom Thumb" has failed in general. We are not sorry for it, although we regret at the same time that the "homunculus" himself may be probably disappointed in a speculation. A theatre like the Princess's, possessing so many genuine and legitimate attractions, should be above such low things as dwarfs in either intellect or stature. It may contrive to do very well without them.

STRAND.

A very broad burlesque of Shakspeare's "Richard III." was produced at this lively little theatre on Monday, with entire success. It is nearly as literal as the popular travestie of "Othello;" the best bits being the wooing of Lady Anne, the tent scene, and the "terrific combat." Hammond played Richard in his raciest vein; and his imitations of an histrionic contemporary were much relished by the audience. The burlesque is interspersed with many parodies of favourite songs from those of the older melodists to Balfe's last new ballads; and these, by their absurdity, kept the audience in excellent humour. Time was when a Shakspearian burlesque was a hazardous experiment; but such things are now safer game; and in this case the jokes were so thick that the hearers had not time to reflect on the worth of one before the wit of another flashed forth. The costumes were a tissue of ludicrous anachronisms.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

It is understood that Mr. W. Farren will shortly re-appear at the Haymarket Theatre, in the character of Sir Peter Teazle.

Mr. Copeland, the brother of Mrs. Fitzwilliam, is reported to have taken the English Opera House, for the purpose of bringing forward a succession of French plays—a bold speculation, but one that is more likely, we think, to prove profitable at this theatre than a system of management which might be guided by a determination to produce old-fashioned melo-dramas and farces, based upon vulgarity rather than humour. Such has been the character of the performances lately introduced upon this stage.

MONS. DUPREZ is announced to make his appearance in London at Drury-lane, on Tuesday evening next; but we learn that it has been found necessary to postpone the first performance until Thursday, the pre-arrangements being of a very arduous nature. The opera selected for the occasion is "William Tell," which has been made the vehicle for many novel scenic effects. M. Duprez will perform the part of Arnold; Leffler, William Tell; Borrani, Gesler: and Miss Romer, Emma.

COVENT GARDEN Theatre has been taken by the Anti-Corn-law League for a period of three years; but, as the meetings will take place only twice in a month, it is reported that Mr. Macready will, upon his return from America, be accepted as the lessee, at a rent which may be considered little more than nominal.

In order that the costumes and decorations at the Haymarket Theatre may be rendered as effective as possible, Mr. Planché has been engaged for three years to superintend the mise en scene.

Mr. Risley, the professor of gymnastics, and his clever little son, will resume their performances at the Haymarket on Easter Monday.

THE NEW ACT FOR REGULATING DRAMATIC PERFORMANCES.—In proof of the beneficial effect of this enactment, it may be mentioned that the "Tempest" and the "Merry Wives of Windsor" have been played for a succession of nights at two of the minor theatres. This speaks much for the "regeneration" of the legitimate drama.

THEATRICAL ECONOMY.—The magnificent velvet curtain with which Mr. Macready adorned the stage at Drury-lane has recently undergone the process of dyeing, in order that the materials may be converted into new dresses for the corps dramatique, when occasion shall require any novelty of costume.

The second piece in which M. Duprez will appear is Donizetti's opera, "La Favorite."

Mr. Parish Alvars, the celebrated harpist, has arrived from the Continent, for the season.

THE POLICE AND THE DRAMA. AN UNREHEARSED SCENE.

In consequence of informa.ion having been received by the police authorities, that some the illegal performances were carried on nightly at an establishment near King's-cross, Battle-bridge, where gangs of young thieves and the worst of fe.nales congregated, to the annoyance of the respectable inhabitants, arrangements were made, under the direction of Mr. Superintendent Massey, of the G division, for the purpose of making a capture of the performers and the whole of the parties assembled in the theatre. On Wednesday night, between eight and nine o'clock, a numerous body of the police, accompanied by Mr. Massey, Inspectors Penny and Barton, Sergeant Archer, &c., repaired to the "scene" of action, where several officers, some of whom were disguised as butchers, dustmen, and other characters, had paid for their admission, and became part of the auditory for the purpose of giving their evidence. The interior of the house in which the entertainments were to be exhibited was fitted up with a proscenium, scenery, and all the paraphernalia of a theatre, with a doorkeeper, money and check-takers, &c. The exterior was placarded with announcements that the grand melo-dramatic pieces of "Maria Martin, or the Red Barn Murder," with other novel and splendid entertainments, would be exhibited, interspersed with music, singing, gymnastics, tumbling, and legerdemain, and "only a penny" was charged to witness the performances, which were "never equalled" in the known world. The audience having waited with great patience the curtain at length rose, when the piece of "Maria Martin" was commenced by automaton figures of the most grotesque appearance, and which were made to move with wires, so that they "suited the action" to the words, which were repeated by some one behind the scenes, who also worked the wires. At length the officers, who had been so organized that it was impossible for anybody to escape, rushed behind the scenes, and captured the whole of the "automaton actors," including the wretch Corder, and his victim, Maria Martin; also the figure of Death, and all the minor characters. The scenery, machinery, and decorations were then seized and packed up, and, together with the audience, doorkeepers, money-takers, and station-keeper, were all taken to the station-house, followed by an immense crowd of persons. No less than 83 persons, men, women, and children, were placed at the bar in hatches, and locked up. The "ladies" of the dramatis personæ were first ushered forth, and were deposited in cells for the night, whilst the "gentlemen" were domiciled in separate apartments. The taking down the names and charges, &c., against them occupied till a very late hour, and crowds of persons assembled around the station-house, and remained a considerable time until they were dispersed.

[We could wish that the police in other parts of the metropolis would endeavour to distinguish themselves by suppressing similar dens of infamy to these, instead of adopting a petty and disgraceful system of annoyance towards all who come in their way, particularly towards respectable persons; for, as common waggoners and go-cart men are known to take a delight in obstructing a thoroughfare when they see a gentleman's carriage approach, so many of the West-end police are ever so well pleased as when they can interfere effectually to mar the enjoyments of those whose recreations are as harmless as their characters are irreproachable. Several complaints have been made to us during the past week of conduct of this kind, and of the adoption of a system of espionage towards respectable tavern-keepers, which certainly calls for public reprobation. In the F division it is well known that the most scandalous favouritism prevails, and it is no uncommon occurrence to find realized the old adage that "one man may steal a horse with impunity, whilst another is hung for merely looking over the hedge." This, however, cannot long continue, and Police Inspectors and Superintendents must either condescend to equalise their behaviour to all, or else they must adopt a stern and uncompromising course without favour to any one. It is too bad that we should see respectable men, the proprietors of properly conducted taverns, dragged daily to Bow-street to answer for the heinous crime of allowing a few friends to sit in their bar parlours for a few minutes after 12 o'clock, when the lowest coffee houses in the neighbourhood—the most notorious haunts of thieves and other bad characters—are allowed to remain open for the accommodation of these persons during all hours of the night].

SERENADE

ON THE EVE OF LIA ROSA'S NATAL DAY.

Oh! hush thee, sad nightingale!
Let my fond lay
Be all that the echoes
Shall whispering play!
Thy song is too pensive
For young maiden's ear,
Whose heart never sorrow'd
Or eye wept a tear!
Mine is all joy, bird!
In welcomes to sing
To-morrow her birthday—
The birthday of Spring!

When April had usher'd in May's sweet life and flow'rs,
Young Rose was the loveliest
All through the bow'rs!
BEAUTY went culling
The sweets there were
And found her the purest
As well as most fair!
Then to mild Virtue
Presented her prize;
Who said, "For the future
I'll dwell in those eyes!"

Young LOVE there was list'ning,
And thus did decree:
"Fair Virtue! this blossom
Must harbour us three!
For Beauty shall nurse it,
And thou shalt defend,
While I'll hover 'round it
Till its sweet life end:
Then back we will bear it,
To whence it was given,
And weep o'er before it
To its native heaven!" W.

COUNTRY NEWS.

COVENTRY.—A CURIOUS CASE OF SWINDLING. A stranger in the garb of a female, about three weeks ago, walked into the Dog and Duck Inn, Coventry. Her cheerful manner and pleasing countenance, and clever address, so won upon the landlady (Mrs. Hales), that instead of proceeding by the Banbury coach, which she particularly wished, she was induced to continue all night, being unprepared with clothing to encounter the inclemency of the season. The worthy hostess becoming more and more charmed with the interesting stranger, several days elapsed in the mutual interchanges of affection and confidence, when her friend remarked that it might appear strange to Mrs. Hales that she offered no money. "The fact is," says she, "I have a remittance of £600, I expect to receive at the Birmingham Branch Bank of England, but how to get there I do not know. Would you have the kindness to accompany me in your gig?" I have always consulted you during my stay here, and intend to make you my confidant." Mrs. Hales readily complied, and, with her friend, proceeded to Hrmingham the following morning. On arriving at the bank inquiry was made for the manager, of whom the stranger wished to know if £600 had been paid to the account of Miss Watts; to which a negative was given. Great surprise was manifested by Miss Watts, and the manager was requested to fill up a cheque for Mrs. Hales to receive the amount, provided she did not present it herself. On their way home Miss Watts appeared much concerned at her disappointment, and suggested that Mrs. Hales that, as her present exigencies required a little more ready money, she would place the cheque in Mrs. Hales's hands for a loan of £60, and would give her £40 for the accommodation. This unit was easily swallowed by Mrs. Hales, and the forthwith produced 55 sovereigns and a £5 note. Mrs. Hales, proud in the company of Miss Watts, and Miss Watts, highly delighted with Mrs. Hales, spent several agreeable days, during which she made known that she was to the seat of Lord Craven, at Coombe Abbey, with Mrs. Hales's horse and gig. On being informed by the housekeeper, Mrs. Robinson, that her ladyship was not at home, Miss Watts refused to leave her card or name, saying she was known to her ladyship, and expected soon to be Lady Montague. On Monday the 30, a request was again made for the horse and gig to convey her to Market Harborough, where Miss Watts had an account, who she said would not likely to live. No objection, of course, was offered, and Miss Watts, anticipating the want of mourning, borrowed the habiliments of Mrs. Hales, very generously offered for her convenience, together with a valuable watch. They were equipped, she arrived at Harborough, and alighted opposite to Mrs. Sau t's, observing she was afraid her aunt was dead, as the blinds were down. The man was desired to go to the Swans Hotel, and wait for her. Miss Watts walked forward to the Union Inn, where she took some brandy and water, with a biscuit, and after staying about two hours, went to the Swans to inform John that her aunt was very ill, and wished her to stay a few days at Harborough; he must, therefore, return without her, and bring the gig for her on Tuesday, the 19th, discharging the expenses of John and the horse, with a promise also, of 10s. for his journeys, and as for wine he had paid on the road. On the return of John, &c. and Mrs. Hales became somewhat concerned about their fair friend, and on the following morning despatched John, with a policeman, to Market Harborough, to take proper care of Miss Watts. This, however, was found to be unnecessary, as the clever and interesting visitor had taken care of herself by procuring a seat in the omnibus for London on the previous evening, where she is no doubt enjoying the fruits of her tour. We might add, the dress and under garments obtained of Mrs. Hales, with the watch, are considered worth £15 to £20, while those left behind are estimated at 2s. 6d. We have since been informed, that instead of proceeding to London, Miss Watts took a seat for Oxford by the Oxford coach, from Northampton.

KENT.—SERIOUS AFFRAY BETWEEN THE POLICE AND AN INSANE MAN.—About twelve o'clock at noon on Monday a person named Frederick Hunter, residing at Welling, in Kent, became furiously insane, and procured fire-arms at several persons out of the window. Three of the police proceeded to break into the chamber to secure the maniac, and whilst they were in the act of bursting open the door, he snapped a pistol at them three times, and brandished a carving-knife in his other hand. They obtained an entrance at great risk, as he fought desperately with a knife and pistol. Police-constable 44 ultimately knocked down and overpowered him, when it was discovered that he had stabbed himself in two places in the abdomen. He remains in care of the police. Dr. Grantham (the divisional surgeon), who happened to be in the village, attended the unfortunate man, and expressed it as his opinion that the injuries would not prove fatal unless the intestines are cut through. He had in his possession a double-barrelled gun and seven pistols (all loaded heavily), a sword-stick, and a carving-knife.

MANCHESTER.—FATAL ACCIDENT.—TWO LIVES LOST AND SEVERAL PERSONS WOUNDED. On Monday last about four o'clock in the afternoon, the inhabitants of Peel-street, Manchester, were greatly alarmed by a tremendous noise proceeding from an iron warehouse, which is one of the most extensive in the town, and occupied by Messrs. Horton, Simms, and Bull, proprietors of Lowndes Hill Iron-works, Shropshire. It appears that some men were in a large shed, the roof of which is supported by ten iron pillars, against each of which large quantities of iron were piled. The men were engaged in "sorting" the iron, and rearing it up against the pillars, when in an instant, and without the least notice, one of the piles of iron, so laid up against the pillar, gave way, and falling in a direction towards the next pillar, came in contact with and carried it away; the second pillar also gave way, and in the same manner one after the other, and so on until the whole of the five pillars went in succession, and ult mately came in contact with the gable end of the building, and drove the whole end of the building, roof, and all, into the canal, which runs close to the warehouse. A woman was standing on the opposite bank of the canal, with a child in her arms; a large portion of the falling building came upon her, threw her down, and dashed the child out of her arms into the canal. On being extricated from the ruins, it was found that her thigh bone was broken, but the child was got out of the water unhurt. A gentleman who had just entered the warehouse to purchase some iron was buried in the ruins and killed on the spot. Another person, named WILKINSON, who was in the employ of the company, was also buried in the ruins, and killed, having been most shockingly mutilated. There were five other persons in the shed at the time, most of whom have received more or less injury. It is rumoured that another man is still in the ruins. The navigation of the Rochdale and Manchester Canal is for the present stopped by the rubbish.

SUFFOLK.—MORE INCENDIARY FIRES.—On Saturday night last the neighbourhood of Ipswich was dreadfully alarmed by the heavens becoming suddenly illumined by one of these awful conflagrations, which are, alas, too frequent at this season. The Hadleigh engines were drawn out directly and horses harnessed, waiting for a messenger; and the requisite preparations had scarcely been made when a man galloped into town from Mr. Golding's, of Wenham, and stated that an alarming fire was then raging on his (Mr. Golding's) farming premises. No time was lost in getting to the spot, and when they had reached it an awful spectacle presented itself, there being then burning two barns, a bean stack, and building shed, piggeries, and a quantity of haulm, &c. All exertions were then directed to save the six stacks that were standing uninjured, fortunately they had a good supply of water, and a large quantity of people present ready to assist. Monday morning an examination took place at the house, before two magistrates, of the men who had been on the premises watching. After a lengthened inquiry, one of them, named Cheverton, was remanded for further examination. Thursday afternoon an express was sent for the Hadleigh engines from a person named Cooper, of the above place, it appears that there was a fire in the barn, which was burnt down, together with out-buildings. The origin of the fire is a mystery at present. The parish of Polstead, as at Stoke-by-Nayland, was the scene of another incendiary conflagration, but, happily, not a very disastrous one.—About two o'clock on Friday morning last the inhabitants were greatly alarmed by a cry of fire, which was ascertained to be at the rectory of that parish, the residence of the Rev. James Coyte, where a hay stack had been maliciously set on fire, and was burning with fury. The fire was discovered by the manservant, who slept in a room over the stable-yard-house. In a short time, a great number of the agricultural labourers and mechanics of the town and neighbourhood were at the spot, and by the greatest exertions on their part the fire was got under, and the hay-stack, which was preserved in preserving about 12 tons of the hay, by cutting away the outsides of the stack which had ignited. The rev. gentleman, on Sunday last, caused a written paper to be read upon the reading desk, which he expressed his grateful thanks to his neighbours and friends, amongst whom he was proud to rank the labouring portion of his parishioners, whose orderly and persevering conduct on the occasion of the calamity he most highly appreciated.

WIGAN RIOT.—It has been for some months the practice of the coal-miners in this neighbourhood to enter into a society for the purpose of collecting subscriptions wherewith to "turn out" for wages in the winter months throughout the whole of the ensuing charter. The colliers in the town of St. Helen's and its neighbourhood have now been "out" several weeks, and subsisting upon this fund; thus causing the pits to lie idle, and at a ruinous sacrifice to the masters, who, instead of receiving any revenue, are obliged there to expend other workmen, who were brought to St. Helen's, and were on Monday morning being escorted by the county constabulary to the several works, when they were hooted by the turn-outs, amounting to several thousands, and who ultimately rushed upon and most violently assaulted the police. Some were, however, taken into custody, but were rescued, when a general melee between the parties was the result. Many of the police were thrown at the officers, one of whom was struck by a superintendent Story on the upper part of the face, cutting him shockingly. Other officers were much injured. It is feared that the people, who are in a state of desperation, will most probably commit further offences.

The Wick and Thurso mails are more than forty-eight hours overdue.

LONGEVITY IN A WORKHOUSE.—In the Strand Union Workhouse, Cleveland-street, in the sick men's ward, there are at present seventeen patients whose united ages, together with that of the nurse, amount to 1169 years. The oldest inmate of the ward was a huntsman, and subsequently a publican; the next oldest, a journeyman baker, and the three next oldest, each about 76, were for many years sailors. They all have good appetites, and the majority of them could consume more than the workhouse allowance. The women in this workhouse attain an extraordinary age. Four were buried within the last ten days, whose respective ages were eighty-six, eighty four, eighty-two, and seventy-six.

TRUE POLITENESS.—Of all the accomplishments by which we are charmed, true politeness is the brightest and the most admirable; seeing that while it imparts pleasure to all who come within the scope of its influence, it prompts the development of that essential goodness of heart which renders it the truest way of giving offence. It has nothing to do with formality: neither bowing nor smiling, nor the practice of any prescribed ceremonial, can prove the existence of true politeness: nor does it consist in a servile assent to every opinion that may be advanced—for that is the fruit either of folly or of subtlety springing from a mean or an immoral design: its essence is that generosity which leads us to study—not to wound, but to respect—the feelings of those around us, with a view to promote their comfort by all the means at our command; and this generosity—this germ of true politeness—conspicuously characterized Dr Delolme. In him there was a total absence of everything nearing even the semblance of assumption. He made no display of superiority, no attempt at dictation: he would not willingly wound the feelings of any man alive; nor would he, except indeed in cases of approaching death, fail to conceal, if possible, any circumstance calculated in his judgment to create annoyance or alarm. *Sylvester Sound. ORTHOPŒDIC INSTITUTION.—On Wednesday the annual meeting of the governors, donors, and subscribers to the Orthopœdic Institution, for the cure of club foot and contractions of the body, was held at the institution, No. 6, Bloomsbury-square, London, the fifth annual meeting since the establishment of the institute, which it is rather singular is the only one of the kind in the kingdom. At one o'clock, the Hon. P. C. Scarlett took the chair, supported by Vice-Presidents Quarles Harris, and F. Kelly, Esqrs., Dr. Little and other eminent men. The report stated that the out-patients during the year had been 620, the number of in-patients on the rotation list 52

LONDON PEACE SOCIETY.—A public meeting, explanatory of the principles, and in aid of the objects of this Society, was held in the British School-room, Hare-court, Aldersgate-street, on Tuesday evening, February 27, John Pease, Esq., M.P., in the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Chairman, the Rev. W. [illegible], E. W. Richard, Esq., Mr. Ingram, the Rev. C. Dukes, M.A., Mr. Jackson, and Joseph T. Price, Esq., of North Aubey. About 400 persons were present, and 134 signed the declaration of adhesion to the society's principles.

ROYAL ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY. On Tuesday the members of this Society met pursuant to adjournment in Hanover-square. Prof. Owen, F.R.S., in the chair. It was announced, amid applause, that, since Sunday last, another valuable accession to the Society's menagerie, in the Regent's park, had taken place in the shape of a new male giraffe, the foal of one of those which, in 1837, was brought over from the forests of Darfur, in the interior of Northern Africa, upwards of six feet high, the dam being about seventeen feet. Mr. Gould presented three new specimens of kangaroo, and Mr. Fraser three new species of birds, hitherto unknown in this country. A new species of strix, or "snowy owl," was acknowledged from Captain Farrer; and the reading of a paper by Mr. Yarrell, of a remarkable shoal of a new species of fish caught at Lyme Regis, and which had added to the handicraft of the fishermen, concluded the proceedings of the evening.

THE DUBLIN REVIEW. No. XXX.

This work maintains its wonted spirit, and manifests, in some of its papers, very considerable ability and learning. The present number is confined principally to subjects of a political and religious character; yet the variety of interests treated of, and the stirring nature of those more particularly appertaining at the present crisis to the Government and condition of the sister island, render the current number more than usually attractive. Its great article is, "The Grievances of Ireland," which, coupled with another paper on the same subject, that appeared in the same review, in the autumn of 1842, presents a somewhat startling picture of the causes that have led to the present unhappy and distracted state of that country. It purports to be a review of the speech of Mr. Smith O'Brien, delivered in the House of Commons last July; and is written, we should say, by an Irishman. But the most brilliant, eloquent, and clever article in the number, is the one entitled "O'Connell and Brougham Irish Agitation and French Revolution," in which the critical lash is pretty sharply applied, especially to the parallel attempted to be drawn between the present agitators in Ireland and the first French revolutionists: the reviewer disposes of it with great cleverness, and much satirical point. The articles on "Archbishop Whately's Petition" to the House of Lords, praying for a church government, and on "The Scottish Schism," are the next ablest papers. Altogether, the present number of this Review, though it appears to have been got up hastily (owing, probably, to the peculiar position in which it is at present placed), is not certainly inferior in talent, information, or ability, to the general run of the earlier ones.

MARTIN CHUZZLEWIT is filled with the Domestic Economy of the Pinches, and their Experience in the Metropolis; with a glance at Mr. Montague and Jones, Mrs. Gamp, and Mrs. Harris. The rambles of Tom and his sister are the best vein:—

Many and many a pleasant stroll they had in Covent-Garden Market: snuffing up the perfume of the fruits and flowers, wondering at the magnificence of the pine-apples and melons; catching glimpses down side-avenues, of rows and rows of old women, seated on inverted baskets selling peas; loosing unutterable things at the fat bundles of asparagus with which the dainty shops were fortified as with a breastwork; and, at the herbalists' doors, gratefully inhaling scents as of vesi-stuffing yet uncooked, dreamily mixed up with capsicums, brown-paper, seeds; even with hints of liquorice balls and fine young curly leeches. Many and many a pleasant stroll they had among the poultry markets, where ducks and fowls, with necks unnaturally long, lay stretched out in pairs ready for cooking; where there were speckled eggs in mossy baskets, white country sausages beyond inspectionment by surviving cat or dog, or horse or donkey; new cheeses to any wild extent; live birds in coops and cages, looking much too big to be natural, in consequence of those overplacates being much too little; rabbits, tame and dead, innumerable. Many a pleasant stroll they had among the cool, refreshing, silvery fish-stalls, with a kind of moonlight effect about their stock-in-trade, excepting always the ruddy lobsters. Many a pleasant stroll among the waggon-loads of fragrant hay, beneath which dogs and tired waggoners lay fast asleep, oblivious of the premises and the public-house. But never half so good a stroll, as down among the steam-boats on a bright morning!

There they lay, alongside of each other; hard and fast for ever, to all appearance, but designing to get out somehow, and quite confident of doing it; and in that faith shoals of passengers, and heaps of luggage, were proceeding hurriedly on board. Little steamboats dashed up and down the stream incessantly. Tiers upon tiers of vessels, scores of masts, labyrinths of tackle, tide sails, splashing paddles, funnels, boats, lumbering barges, nimble skiffs, with ugly lighters for the water-rat within their mud-discoloured nooks; church steeples, warehouses, house-roofs, arches, bridges, men and women, children, casks, cranes, boxes, bales, packages, cellars, and hard-by taverns: there they were, all jumbled up together, any summer morning, far beyond Tom's power of separation.

In the midst of all this turmoil, there was an incessant roar from every packet's funnel, which quite expressed and carried out the uppermost emotion of the scene. They all appeared to be perspiring and bouncing themselves, exactly as their passengers did; they never left off fretting and chafing, in their own hoarse manner, once; but were always panting out, without any stops, "Come along do make haste I'm very nervous come along oh good gracious we shall never get there how late you are do make haste I'm off directly some along!" Even when they had left off, and had got safely out into the current, on the smallest provocation they began again, for the bravest packet of them all, being stopped by some entanglement in the river, would immediately begin to fume and pant afresh. "Oh here's a stoppage what's the matter do go on there I'm in a hurry I'm done on purpose did you ever oh my goodness do go on there!" and so, in a state of mind bordering on distraction, would he last seen drifting slowly through the mist into the summer light beyond, that made it red.

Tom's sail, however; or, at least, the packet-boat in which Tom and his sister took the greatest interest on one particular occasion, was not off yet, by any means; but was at the height of its disorder. The press of passengers was very great indeed: steam-boat after steam-boat as each in turn came up, was choked up; distracted women, obviously bound for Gravesend, but turning a deaf ear to all representations that this particular vessel was about to sail for Sweden, were conveying baskets of refreshment behind bulk-heads and water-casks, and under seats; and very great confusion prevailed.

It was so amusing, that Tom, with Ruth upon his arm, stood looking down from the wharf, as nearly regardless as it was in the nature of flesh and blood to be, of an elderly lady behind him, who had brought a large umbrella with her, and didn't know what to do with it. This tremendous instrument had a hooked handle; and its variety was first made known to him by a painful pressure on the windpipe, and a sensation of being drawn backward by the throat. Soon after, disengaging himself with perfect good humour, he had a sensation of the ferrule in his back; immediately afterwards, of the hook entangling his ankles; then of the umbrella generally, wandering about his head, and tapping at it like a great bird; and, lastly, of a poke or thrust below the ribs, which gave him such exceeding anguish, that he could not refrain from turning round, to offer a mild remonstrance.

THE ARTIZAN, Vol. I., is, to say the least of it, the cheapest quarto it has ever been our lot to receive. Think, reader, of some 300 pages closely packed with reports of the progress of the operative arts during twelve months, all for as many shillings! So much for quantity; the papers are of first-rate excellence, particularly those on engineering; and the criticisms on the marvels of the day and the literature of the arts are spirited and impartial. The uppermost topics of the day are treated in a strikingly readable manner, and there is so much novelty in each month's number as to render it a sort of newspaper of the operative arts, with the advantage of clever lithographic illustrations in abundance. Altogether, we do not expect to witness a cheaper or better record of the world's invention than this journal presents, month by month, to the utilitarian public.

THE APPRENTICE is a new weekly journal, edited by the conductors of the "Artizan," and, like the parent periodical, is sound and useful in glancing at the onward movement of the trades and operative arts. Among the novelties in its first monthly part are Screw Propulsion, the Equilibrium Slide Valve, Pedo-motion, &c.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

THE ILLUMINATED MAGAZINE presents a splendid head and front in addition to other attractions; it is now really "illuminated" in the antique as well as the modern acceptation of the term. The Editor's "Chronicles of Clovernook," which we are happy to see resumed, are fraught with scarlet and gold, and faced by a very clever colouring by Leech, brilliantly coloured and illustrating a lively rattling sketch, entitled "Tom Houghblaan's Guardian Sprite." This illustration is a very superb affair, as is the illuminated heading. The "Chronicles" are the economy of the Turveyopians in their packed-up little Swiftian sprite the schoolmaster who has been so long "abroad," must, we suspect, be located in Turveytop. The following passages burn with truthful eloquence Benevolent and gentle was the schoolmaster, and worthy of the honours lavished by the state upon him. Aye [illegible] look; but in Turveytop the schoolmaster is not a half-drudge [illegible] No, sir; the importance, the solemnity, of his mission is [illegible] Children are not sent to him with no more [illegible] than if they were [illegible] packed in the letter in which their tails docked [illegible] Turveytop the schoolmaster is considered the maker of the [illegible] more artificer of society. Hence, the state pays him peculiar consideration. It is allowed that his daily labours are in the immortal chambers of the mind—the mind of childhood, new from the Maker's hand, and undefiled by the earth. Hence, there is a solemnity, almost a sacredness, in the schoolmaster's function; upon him and his high and tender charge does the state of Turveytop depend, that its prisons shall be few. It is for him to wage a daily war with the gaoler. His work is truly glorious, for it is with childhood—beautiful childhood! cried the Hermit, passionately—"holy childhood, with still the bloom of its first home upon it!" For indeed, there is a sanctity about it—it is a bright new-comer from the world unknown, a creature with unfolded soul! And yet, sir, are there not states where, whilst yet the creature draws its pauper milk—of the same sort, by the way, that nurtured Abel—we give it to those fiends of earth, violence and wrong, and then scourge, imprison, hang the pupil for the teaching of its masters? Childhood, with its innocence killed in the very seed!

Childhood, a fiend imp in rags, with fox-like, thievish eyes and lying breath, the foul weed of a city. Such, indeed, it is to the niceness of our senses, shrinking at the filth and whining of that world-wrinkled babe! But look at it aright, sir," —cried the Hermit with new animation—"translate its mutterings into their true meaning. What do you see?—what hear? The lineaments and cryings of an ac. ursed demon; a giant thing of woe and mischief scowling and shrieking at the world that hath destroyed its holiness of life: that, seizing it, yea from the hand of its Maker, hath defaced the divinity of its impress, and made it devil—a devil to do a devil's mischief: then to be doomed and punished by a self-complacent world, that lays the demon in a felon's grave, and after, sighs and wrings the hands at human wickedness."

In Turvey top the schoolmasters may be said to take the place of our commanding soldiers. We give rank, distinction, high praises, to generals and such folk for the cunning slaughter of their thousands. We take the foul smell out of bloodshed, and call men-quellers heroes. We give them gold lace, and stick feathers upon them, and hang them about with Orders of Saint Fire, Saint Pillage, and Saint Slaughter. We strip the skin from the innocent sheep to make rub-a-dub to their greatness, and blow their glory to the world from blatant brass. Now the Turveytopians have no soldiers; but they give the same amount of honour to their schoolmasters. They have a belief that it is quite as noble to build up a mind as to hack a body; that to teach meekness, content, is as high a feat as to cut a man through the shoulder bone; that, in a word, it is as wise and useful, and surely as seemly in the eye of watchful Heaven, to fill the human brain with thoughts of goodness, as to scatter it from a skull, cleft by the sword in twain. Hence, the schoolmaster in Turveytop is a great social authority, honoured by the state. The savage counts his glories by scalps; the refined man of war by his gazettes. The general kills five thousand men—defeats some twenty thousand. He may have picked a quarrel with them, that he might pick his sprig of laurel, and rejoice in lawful plunder. He has done his work upon humanity; he has acted his part in the world—a world of human sympathies—and he becomes earl, or steps up duke. It is his rightful wage, paid by a grateful hand. The schoolmaster of Turveytop numbers his scholars; shows the heroes he has made; the victors over self among his army; the troops of wise and peaceful citizens he has marshalled for the field of life, and is honoured and rewarded accordingly."

The following, on laughter, is as beautiful as it is original:—

Think of a babe without laughter, as it is, its first intelligence! The creature shows the divinity of its origin and end, by smiling upon us: yes, smiles are its first talk with the world, smiles the first answers that it understands. And then, as worldly wisdom comes upon the little thing, it crows, it chuckles, it grins, and, shaking in its nurse's arms, or in waggish humour playing bo-peep with the breast, it reveals its high destiny—declares, to him with ears to hear it, the heirdom of its immortality. Let materialists blaspheme as gingerly and as acutely as they will, they must find confusion in laughter. Man may take a triumphant stand upon his broad grins; for he looks around the world, and his innermost soul, sweetly tickled with the knowledge, tells him that he alone of all creatures laughs. Imagine, if you can, a laughing fish. Let man then send a loud ha! ha! through the universe, and be reverently grateful for the privilege.

We are happy to meet the author of "The Chronicles" in this new vein of excellent humour.

We have only space to glance at the other contents—as a well-timed incident, by Miss Toulmin; a very spirited translation from the Swedish, by Lewis Filmore—"Winter, the King; and Spring, the Poet;" a tale of Italy, by Miss Pardoe; and a sketch of a Parisian Coquette, by Mrs. Postans. Our quotation is the illustration of a truly graceful story, by Miss Costello, entitled "Thorp Cloud; or, the Monastery of Dove Dale."

Everywhere the road sparkles with sparry particles, and round Matlock up to the High Peak the paths glitter as if the fairies had strewn them with diamonds; but as Dove Dale is approached, these indications of mines cease. At a certain spot, where a humble way-side inn appears, the traveller quits his vehicle, and here those who are accredited guides are in waiting to conduct the bewildered seeker after novelty. Not that any place can less need a guide than Dove Dale, as the path is sufficiently easy and straightforward. On a first approach nothing but barren hills of unvarying aspect, without a solitary tree, are before the view—no indications appear of the future beauty, and for nearly a mile no improvement takes place. All this time, as the walk continues, a strange object attracts the attention; it is an immensely high pyramidal mountain of several sides, all nearly flat and tapering to a point, where on the very summit is placed by nature a single pointed grey stone, forming the peak. This mountain is covered with short turf, but neither tree nor shrub breaks its monotony, and the shape, totally unlike any which surround it, gives it a remarkable and surprising effect. This is the celebrated Thorp Cloud, named as one of the curiosities of the country. It stands across the valley like a huge gate, and the river Dove runs round its foot. When the point is reached at which the river appears, the valley begins to shows signs of beauty. Luxuriant foliage runs feathering up the steeps; grey picturesque rocks come forth amongst the trees, and a hundred accidents of the ground render it interesting and curious. Thorp Cloud has its superstitious associations, which, in the reign of King John, make up a very pleasant romance.

Our next quotation is the illustration of "A Tale of a Tea-kettle," by A. B. Reach; a sort of reverie on steam, or dream of the steam-engine, by a boy—named James Watt:—

Truth to tell there was something peculiar in the glance of the boy's eye;—there was mind, active, speaking mind, looking through it. He sensed as one who gazed upon a wondrous vision, and whose every sense was bound up in the display of gorgeous pageantry floating before him. He had sat watching the escaping steam, until the thin, vaporous column had appeared to cast itself upwards in fantastic-changing shapes. Sometimes the subtle fluid gathering in force and quantity would gently raise one side of the lid of the kettle, emit a white puff, and then let the metal fall with a low clanking sound. There was power—strength in that watery cloud. But still the spout poured forth its regular volume of white vapour—shooting over the ribs of the grate, and curling and rolling in outlines as varying and quaint as those of a rising mist. Suddenly, to the eye of the half-dreaming boy, the steam appeared, instead of escaping up the chimney, to spread itself out in a dense volume before the fire-place. He gazed intently at the phenomenon—indistinct outlines, like the wavy robes of spectres, showed themselves—floated dimly for an instant—then melted into the shapeless cloud. Again they re-appeared, and more distinctly than before; and the spell-bound boy saw faces, some terrible, and others gentle and mild, forming, and vanishing, and again re-appearing in the wonderful steam-cloud. He gazed, and gazed. To the faces, fanciful forms, woven from the vapour, attached themselves and clung. There was something about them awful'y undefined; but they were undefined rather to the mind than the eye. The latter could see them, but the former could not grasp or form an accurate idea of their strange, shadowy proportions. Some were dimly terrible, others calm and serene—back and fore they floated, not passing, but blending with—gliding through—each other, and waving their misty wings with a slow undulating motion. Gradually the fair and gentle steam spirits seemed as it were to coalesce, to glide together and become one, instinct with mild intellectual grandeur; and round it gathered a threatening phalanx of the dark and gloomy spirits, their forms changing to hideous, undefined, grotesque things, and their faces fearful to look upon. But the mild spirit gazed calmly on them, as if in reliance on its innate power; and raising its white arms it waved the evil spirits back, and as they retired undefinedly, they covered their gloomy foreheads with their wings, for a pale halo of light beamed around the long fair curls of the master phantom. But again they rallied and rushed, dark, evil-minded, like an undefined horror, and wrestled with the fair, good form. Here, there, anywhere, their demon faces, lowered and moped and mowed round the god-moulded face; and with their pointed claws and swooping wings they sought to tear the good spirit down, and to exult over its fall, with looks of bitter, jeering hatred. But they could not—the spiritual light, flickering in long pencils from the forehead and the eye of the mild spirit, seemed, although it was so pale, and apparently so soulless, to scorch the wings and shrivel up the limbs of the assailant spirits; and at length, drawing up its grand form, it threw its arms abroad, and with the motion, as though at the waving of a wand, the most demons shrunk and shrivelled and writhed in impotent malice at the feet of their conqueror, who stood over them—an angel trampling upon fiends!

And as the dreaming boy saw this, an unbidden thought came upon his mind, and he knew that the fierce struggle was symbolical of

INTELLECT WARRING WITH THE ELEMENTS.

The illustrations by Meadows, Leech, Prior, Gilbert, Hine, Hamerton, and Martin, are spirited and clever throughout; and the number is, altogether, by far the most brilliant that has yet appeared. We are glad to see the addition of some neat reviews of new books.

DUPREZ.

This great tenor is at length secured by the spirited manager of Old Drury, and will appear next week in the part of Arnold in Rossini's "Guillaume Tell." Last year, when we anticipated the pleasure of his arrival here, we gave some general outlines of his power of voice and style of singing. Those who have been accustomed to the delicate finish of a Rubini, or to the aroma of a Mario or a Salvi's voice, may not probably like that of Duprez; but he is an artiste of extraordinary skill, endowed most liberally by nature, physically as well as otherwise. His range and strength are prodigious, and no doubt he will make an immense hit. The tenors are getting up in public estimation: we shall have no less than four from the continent this season, independent of the number we have at home who run counter.

PORTRAIT OF DUPREZ.

SMOKE.

WRITTEN AND ILLUSTRATED BY ALFRED CROWQUILL.

What is more disagreeable than to take an inviting habitation, with the appearance of perfection and comfort in every room, and find out, upon possession, that every chimney smokes; but how much more disagreeable is it for a young bride, during the honeymoon, to find herself linked to an inveterate smoker, who darkens its wane by rolling tobacco clouds

How uncomfortable is it to invite an otherwise very amusing fellow to your domestic table, and find him get cross and fidgetty, after the removal of the cloth, for the want of a cigar, which your wife's curtains and delicacy forbid.

Raleigh deserves to be immortalised for his introduction of the potatoe, but for that of tobacco he deserves to have the sun of his glory smothered in clouds from the pipes of his devotees. Formerly the habit of smoking was confined to the early mechanic, to counteract the sharp morning air, or to the old tradesman, to wile away the evening in a public-house parlour with men similarly inclined. Then they returned to their homes, and left their infectious fumes behind them; but now—and sad is the alteration—they have entered even into the sanctum of their homes, not only to the destruction of their wives' best cap, but also very often to their best temper.

Boys now are as anxious to attain the power of smoking as they formerly were for the first shave! Many and dreary are the solitary sicknesses which they endure before they master the mildest Havannah. And often in their first blush of glory in taking their first ascent upon smoke's intoxicating hill, do they return pallid and giddy, and are at length forced to resign for a time their ambitious project.

By slow degrees only do they climb the nauseous steps that lead to distinction in the art. Timid and faltering is the progress as they advance upon the full-flavoured—the tobacco fiend ever and anon torturing them with sickness and insensibility. At last, after much practice, they become cigar smokers, of which interesting fact they continually remind you by thrusting their cigar cases under the noses of their friends, as though they had obtained a diploma of merit.

Poor King Jamie, when he wrote his counter-blast against tobacco, which at that time rose in faint and infantine curls at distances few and far between, could little picture to himself—for in his time it was a disgusting rarity—the massive clouds that now roll in from every corner, bursting alike from the mouth of cads and gentlemen.

In days of yore the kind and unceremonious invitation from a friend was "Come and take a glass of wine and bit of mutton." Now it has resolved itself into "I say, old boy, come and take a cigar." Many a man has been forced into a trap of this kind, and finds the ensuing morning his tongue like a parrot's; and should he perchance the next day receive a whiff from the short pipe of an early paddy, his feelings are any thing but enviable.

Nothing has tended so much to break up pleasant and old-fashioned society as the introduction of general smoking; ladies are left solitary while the men go and take a cigar, or should they have sufficient fortitude to stand the suffocating blast, they undergo the dreadful feeling of being smothered like bees in a hive.

To some the art, cunning, and mystery of smoking is unattainable from want of strength. Ridiculous in the extreme is the appearance of a pale-faced boy struggling against a nausea worse than sea-sickness, listlessly dropping the best half of a treasured Principe, whilst his countenance bespeaks the indistinctness of his ideas as to his whereabouts.

Many carry on an appearance of having arrived to the ambitious state of a "smoker" upon very slight grounds; such as continually lighting a cigar, and continually letting it out. This "ruse" is now so well known, that it is easily detected, and the aspirant is, of course, treated with the most bitter contempt by staunch men who luxuriate in a perfect white ash, and actually gloat over the smell of German tinder.

But in vain is it to contemn this growing evil! The world seems as if it were smoking hot! The very dark-skinned child of the prairies takes his tomahawk pipe, which he offers as a guarantee of peace

The bright-eyed Spanish donna sports her cigarette, and puffs in company with her swarthy husband, and the young and gazelle-eyed Signora coquets as she rolls the cigarillo for her enamoured Don.

The Turk, luxuriously dozing on his musnud, draws the powerful weed through the most beautiful perfumes, and intoxicates himself without breaking the law of Mahomet.

The phlegmatic German lives a life of pipes: they are the delight of his existence! Those dear Meerschaums, dark with the tobacco's essential oil, hang in rows around his chamber, and he gazes upon them with the adoring eyes of a lover. When he by chance gets a peep through his own created cloud at his beauteous fair one, he immediately afterwards fills his pipe, repairs to her footstool, and smokes at her vigorously for months, and when at last the declaration comes, the blushes of his angel are hidden by his darling smoke.

The Frenchman is also inveterate in the habit, but, not content with the fumes, he crams the dust up his nose that he may revel in the double delight

The Irishman's dudheen is very often a satisfactory breakfast, and he hands it with such a grace to his fair countrywomen as though it were ambrosia.

Oh, tobacco! tobacco! thou hast turned the world into a cigar-case, and my pipe is put out that I am not a successful tobacco-stopper.

THE CHARTIST OUTBREAK IN WALES.—In the late Chartist outbreak one of the principal leaders of the party that attacked the Westgate Hotel was a man named "Jack the Fifer." Upon seeing the insurgents defeated he fled, and although very large rewards were offered for his apprehension, he was not heard of until within a few days past, when a letter was received from him dated Virginia. He states, that after a great many hair-breadth escapes in this country, he embarked for America. He has been offered a commission as an officer in the army destined for Texas. He is very anxious in his inquiries after David Jones, the tinker, another commander of the Chartists in Newport, who also made off, and for whose apprehension there was offered a large reward. In fact, these two men concocted the outbreak, and instigated the Chartists to the insane attack upon Newport.

THE NEW PATENT CABRIOLET.

THE TRIBUS.

In pursuance of our original plan to place before our readers at the earliest opportunity, engravings illustrative of the newest designs and most recent improvements in everything affecting our social condition and public convenience, we present the annexed cuts of a new patent street carriage, called a Tribus, which has just made its appearance in the metropolis, and which recommends itself to public patronage by many advantages which the street cabs at present in use do not possess.

The Tribus is a two-wheeled vehicle, and, as the name indicates, is adapted for the accommodation of three persons. The entrance is from behind, as in an omnibus, by which a greater facility of ingress and egress is afforded. In cases of accident also, the readiness with which, by this arrangement, an escape can be effected must be obvious. The driver sits behind, and by this means the balance of the vehicle is more equally adjusted, all ricketty motion prevented, and the weight entirely kept off the horse's back. He is also enabled to open and shut the door without removing from his seat, and additional security is given to the passengers who are immediately under his protection, while at the same time the most perfect command of the reins is secured. There are two windows in front, one behind, and two at the sides, thus combining the advantages of a covered and an open carriage.

The interior is fitted up in a style more like the appointments of a private carriage than a vehicle of public conveyance. A red lamp is placed at night in front to prevent the danger of collision. There is also a very novel and simple mode of communicating with the driver from the inside, by which instructions can be conveyed in the most rapid and effectual manner, without the least inconvenience.

Should a shaft break, the horse fall, or any other accident occur, to which all vehicles are liable, there is a safety wheel in front, which prevents the body of the carriage from coming down, and thus interposes for the safety both of the horse and the passengers.

Mr. Harvey, of Lambeth-house, Westminster Bridge-road, is the patentee of this carriage. The Tribus, which is at present to be seen at the Bazaar in Baker-street, will shortly take its "stand" for public approval, and we have no doubt that, from its superior accommodation, safety, and elegance, it will take precedence of, if not entirely supersede, all other vehicles of a similar class at present in use.

THE NEW PATENT CABRIOLET.

IRISH SKETCHES.

WHISKEY STILL IN CONNEMARA.

In the "fine auld ancient times," before Father Mathew and the Temperance Societies were heard of, it was no uncommon assertion for an Irishman to make, that "if his mother had reared him on whiskey, he'd have been a sucking babe to the day of his death." The love of this liquor was pre-eminent in the country; and its name, which literally means water, was given to it as that of water of life is given to brandy by the French, either to denote that it is the only kind of water "fit for Christians to drink," and that they will not "make beasts of themselves," as some natives of the Emerald Isle have been heard to declare, by so far imitating cattle as to drink "pure element." Or perhaps by so modestly naming it they got over the blame, as some folks did the difficulty of eating flesh-meats on fasting, by plunging it in gravy, and calling their joints fishes of St. Patrick—see Croker's Popular Songs of Ireland.) Indeed some of the jovial Irish song writers, with more fun than good manners, blame the Saint himself for this hatred of water. Says one of these worthies—

> "You've heard, I suppose, long ago,
> How the snakes in a manner most antic,
> He marched to the county Mayo,
> And trundled them into the Atlantic.
> Hence not to use water for drink,
> The people of Ireland determine:
> With mighty good reason, I think,
> Since St. Patrick has filled it with vermin,
> And vipers and such other stuff."

The number of illicit stills was in days gone by enormous. In the fifth report to the House of Commons of the Commissioners on Fees, Gratuities, &c., in Ireland, returns are given of seizures during five years, from 1809 to 1806 inclusive; and the number of stills seized during this period amounted to 13,409, or an average of about 2680 a year. It is asserted, that with all this, it is fair to calculate that not more than one in fifty was seized, as they abounded at that time. Many of the gentry kept them, and the law that levied a fine of £50 on the cowhand in which such a still was discovered only made it the interest of all persons to keep it a secret. It was a work of danger too to the Government officers to suppress them, and many a life was lost in the task. The stills were generally placed in the most inaccessible places up a mountain side, sheltered by a mass of rock, and half covered with trees and herbage, with convenient "lookouts" for the parties employed, and the whole things so neatly hidden as to be evasive of no suspicion, even to those who stood absolutely within a few yards of the still, when it was in full operation. If discovered and seized, it was of so little value, that it was no great drawback; the only covetable article being the kettle in which it was brewed. This illicit whiskey was termed potsen, from being manufactured in small quantities, and consequently in a little pot, the sen being an Irish diminutive of an endearing kind. From being brewed over a turf fire it had contracted a smoky flavour, which at once distinguished it from "Parliament," or "King's" whiskey. The want of this flavour was a serious objection to the "lawful article" with all persons of "exquisite palate." But the number of these stills is now so diminished, owing to the temperance movement, that they are of most uncommon occurrence; and, certainly, the change produced by Father Mathew is one of the most marvellous on record, particularly as it is the voluntary act of a nation, who seemed so much addicted to the reverse. People now go from a fair sober, a thing scarcely known years ago.

WHISKEY STILL IN CONNEMARA.

The Right Hon. the Speaker of the House of Commons had his third parliamentary dinner on Saturday, at his mansion, in Euston-square, when the following noblemen and gentlemen honoured the right hon. gentleman with their company:—Lord Ashley, Viscount Jocelyn, Mr. Bethell, Mr. Plumptre, Mr. Shirley, Sir Howard Douglas, Sir Stephen Glynne, Bart., Mr. Cardwell, Colonel Powell, Viscount Sandon, Sir R. H. Inglis, Bart., Mr. Estcourt, Hon. Wm. Bingham Baring, Mr. Emmerson Tennent, Col. Peel, Captain Holdero, Mr. Chas. Hope, Viscount Mahon, Marquis of Douro, Hon. J. Stuart Wortley, Right Hon. F. Shaw, Mr. Packe, Mr. Maunsell, Sir Robert Pigot, Mr. Neville, Sir William Heathcote, and Hon. R. Clive. Lord Charles Wellesley, Mr. Philip Miles, Mr. Stuart, and Sir J. Yarde Buller were invited, but were prevented from dining with the Speaker. On Saturday next the right hon. gentleman holds his first levee.

PIRATES IN THE INDIAN OCEAN.—The Dutch resident at Rouw states, that news had been received from Sekana, a noted retreat of the pirates, that several vessels had been equipped to exercise piracy, from the coast of Malacca to Poloe Pinang. In an action between these pirates and the English steamer Diana, one of the chief of these banditti was killed, two others taken prisoners, and the vessel captured; the others retreated into the river Taeng, near Tjambi, on the east coast of Sumatra. An attempt by the Dutch authorities to seize the pirates was at first unsuccessful; but his Majesty's brig the Windhond, the Janus schooner, and six cruisers, have been sent after them; they are to blockade the river, and punish this nest of thieves as it merits. The master of a native vessel of Serawak, in Borneo, who has arrived at Pontianak, relates that at the beginning of July three English men-of-war had anchored off the river; they were to undertake an expedition against the pirates of Dyak. Accounts had been received that the result of this expedition was, that several Kampongs in the district of Ser.bas had been taken, about 100 habitations of Malays, and 30 of Dyaks, each 150 feet in length, and several of these vessels were destroyed. This news, however, needs confirmation. The Malays and Dyaks, it is said, made a vigorous resistance; but suffered very severely from the well-directed fire of the English, who lost only two men.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

There be some sports are painful, but their labour
Delight in them sets off. SHAKSPEARE.

If immortal Will had been asked for a "poey" for the steeple-chase, he could not have furnished a more characteristic one than the lines prefixed to the article, wherein we purpose to descant on the Grand National of that ilk, celebrated at Liverpool on the 28th ult. From its nature it forms a singularly appropriate finish to its own season, and introduction to the legitimate business of the turf. The Grand National Steeple Chase, which comes off at Liverpool, is run, as to its first moiety, across the country, and, as to its latter, over the course, common to the "flat" racing, as it is called—ominously enough. For the sight-seers it is admirably contrived: whether the jocks and proprietors of horses so regard it, is another affair. A race over a hunting line is dangerous enough from the fact that when a fall does take place at a fence, charged full flight, it very rarely requires a second to do the business—but in this course three-quarters of the jumps are artificially made up—arrangements that are the especial horror and discomfiture of all quadrupeds. However, "What's the odds so long as there's fun"—is the country? a place that grows less of that than any other crop—indeed scoffers insist that pleasure can not be classed among articles of rural produce.

Nevertheless, there was a tolerable crop on the Aintree course on Wednesday last. The season was lovely; and, though it rained cats and dogs from half-past one till half-past three—a very imposing company occupied the Grand Stand, and the "al fresco" was alive with plebs. The usual parading of the horses of course suffered from the weather, but at a quarter past three, sixteen noble nags were mounted, and cantered past the stand, and then, being taken to the usual starting place—just beyond the first fence out of the lane—the word was given and they started. The four following only being placed by the judge:—

The latest betting was 5 to 1 against Discount; and 6 to 1 each against Wiverton and Mazeppa—nothing else backed. The first off was Tom Tug, who led, but at no great pace, the first round, and over the brook facing the stand, cleverly, all the others doing the same, except Mazeppa, who was pulled up at the third fence, after starting. Crossing the lane the second time, the speed improved. The Romp leading, and Peter Simple and Charity biting the earth: each floored about the same time. Down the canal side and into the race-course they came as hard as they could split the four placed being first into the course, and all the others near at hand. Three four seemed to be running tolerably together, but during any part of the race Discount could have run over his horses. Once inside the distance, Crickmere set him going in earnest, and won in brilliant style by at least a dozen lengths. Time, 13 minutes 40 seconds; distance, 4¾ miles. There is a probability that the conditions of this steeple chase will next year be altered from handicap to weight for age, with penalties for running—a very judicious step.

There was a very sporting hurdle race for a finish, won in capital form by Mr. Raworth's slapping mare Chance; Hislington a middling second, after his race for the steeple chase. It seems odd times when Bill Scott comes out with his steeple-chase nag—in shape of a brother to Charles XII.! There is every promise of fun winter meeting being as brilliant as our next season. The chase has already a good many subscribers, and spirit—at least the spirit for sport never flags in Lancashire. The following is the last average of the public betting in town and country.

BETTING.—TATTERSALL'S. THURSDAY.

In consequence of the influentials being at the grand Liverpool steeple-chase (an account of which will be found below), there was, as might be expected, a dull afternoon.

The two first favourites are firm at the quotations, and are evidently on the rise. Orlando, reported to be a little off, is again at his recent figure; there is also a decided move in Running Rein; and, as it is said that all bets are off if he is disqualified, all investments, except coupled with another, nag, are harmless. We give the quotations below:—

LIVERPOOL GRAND STEEPLE CHACE.

This great event "came off" on Wednesday last at the Aintree race-course. The attendance was not quite so numerous as on former years, but the élite of the aristocracy were present, and the whole mansions in that vicinity are, and have been for days past, crowded with distinguished visitors. Nearly all the railway trains and steamers during the last forty-eight hours have brought parties, anxious to witness the exciting sport, from all parts of the three kingdoms. The early part of the day was propitious—cold but fine; but shortly before two o'clock, the time announced for starting, it began to pour in torrents, and, with a slight intermission, it continued raining until the race was over and for some time subsequently. The attendance of ladies on the Grand-stand was very meagre.

The ground was nearly the same as on former years, with one or two exceptions. The start took place in a field out of Moss Lane, and, crossing over four fields with good fences, turned to the left over the leap, known as the "Upper Brook." This is the point at which the start has taken the similar field over in the whole troop, on the present occasion, sixteen in number, got in gallant and sportsmanlike style. Then they proceeded over three other fields, still inclining to the left, at the last of which some strong rails were placed, from whence they branched into a field by the canal side. The next leap was the "Water Jump," into a field of great size, and crossing a ploughed and grass field, they proceeded by the lane over the bridge into the racing ground, at the distance where where hurdles five feet high were placed, and the next leap was the artificial brook, nearly opposite the grand stand. This was thirteen feet in width. At this point Charley threw his rider, but the others got safely over it, and on again, with his dress bearing evidence of his disaster, but the misfortune placed him hors de combat. The same ground was retravelled as far as the bridge, from whence, instead of crossing the training ground, as before, the horses entered the course when all the leaping was over. The horses kept well together, no disaster having taken place, except the one alluded to, until near the canal, where Peter Simple threw his rider. These were the only falls during the race. They failed off, however, as they reached the winning-post, all except nine having been distanced. They were placed—Discount, 1; Returned, 2; and Tom Tug, 3. The winner was by at least a dozen lengths.

The Champion Hurdle Race followed. The country over which the race extended is a flat surface, presenting nothing remarkably picturesque to the eye; but the distance is relieved by a winding running canal, a gothicked country, with the spire of Sefton church—an ancient structure, the mausoleum of the Molyneux family; and other antique villages, which fill the eye. The start commenced a few minutes before three, and were scrupled eleven minutes and fifty seconds—the distance being upwards of four miles.

We hope to be enabled next week to present to our readers a representation of this spirited scene.

HER MAJESTY'S STAGHOUNDS.—On Monday morning the meet was at Winkfield church, where there was an excellent muster, including his Serene Highness Prince Edward of Saxe Weimar, most of the officers of the Life and Foot Guards, and many of the sporting gentlemen of this neighbourhood. The celebrated deer Rob Roy was uncarried in a field close by, and went away at a tremendous pace through Mr. Blain's park, on to New Lodge and Ascot, headed back by Mr. Harcourt's park, at St. Leonard's; thence he made away, by Oakley-green, to Surley Hall, and crossed the Thames between that place and Clewer; the hounds were then brought through the town of Windsor, and laid on the scent near Dorney; they then made away towards Twomile-brook, and crossed the Bath road, near the lane leading to Burnham; passed Lord Orkney's mill, and away through Burnham Beeches, right on to Holtspur-gate, and thence to Holtspur Bottom, where the deer was taken, after a splendid run of two hours and fifty minutes. Several got regular duckings, in consequence of the low lands being inundated from the overflowing of the Thames.

The following hunters, "well known in Leicestershire," were sold on Monday, by Messrs. Tattersall:—Rocket, 460 guineas; Negro, 220 guineas; Pilot, 165 guineas; Monarch, 170 guineas; Volunteer, 120 guineas; and Magic, 100 guineas. Total for the six, £1435.

THE QUI TAM ACTIONS.—On Thursday a return was made to the House of Commons of the writs of summons issued out of the Court of Exchequer during the last half year of 1843. The writs were amounted to thirty-four in number, endorsed with the debts and penalties, and issued by Mr. James Thomas Russell, of 37, Percy-street, Bedford-square, against the following parties, at the suit of Charles Henry Russell, the above solicitor, and John Lewis:—Lord George Bentinck, the Earl of Eglington; the others against George Anson, H. Hill, John Bowes, John Gully, Peter Clover, Henry Justice, William Crockford, William Gregory, John Greenwood, Sir Thomas Bayley, Jonathan Peel, Charles Greville, and A. H. Bayley. In the bill now before the House of Commons it is provided that in future, before an action can be brought to recover penalties on games, the sanction of the Attorney-General must first be obtained.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

(Sittings at Guildhall, before Lord Denman and a Special Jury.)

THE QUEEN V. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.

In this proceeding the Attorney and Solicitor-Generals were for the prosecution; Mr. Cockburn and Mr. Crowder for the defendants. It was an indictment against three persons of the names of Mottram, Williams, and Horsley, warehousemen in Cheapside, for conspiring to cheat the Crown of revenue duties, by damaging, collusively with officers of the Customs, to certain cases of French goods at a less duty than that laid down by the tariff. One of the defendants (Horsley) had absconded, Williams pleaded Guilty, and Mottram put in a plea of Not Guilty. The officers of the Customs implicated were handy-gawkers, of the names of Homersham and Burnby. The evidence was the same as that given before the Sheriff some time back. A great number of witnesses were called for the prosecution, who showed the mode of transacting business at the Customs, and went into a variety of technical details. The most interesting witness was Burnby himself, who had become evidence for the Crown, and who deposed that on the 10th of September, 1840, he went to defendants' counting-house, and there saw Mottram; that he (witness) told Mottram that Homersham had stated that he had facilities of passing goods coming from abroad; that Mottram ordered a clerk to go to the Customs-house; that certain cases were handed and taken away without the payment of the dues; and that he (Burnby) and Homersham had received £20 each for their participation in the job. This witness, on cross-examination, confessed the series of delinquencies of that serious character. He confessed having been a party to the forgery of a deed; and to many other fraudulent transactions. No witnesses were called for the defence. Counsel then addressed the jury for the defendants, and Lord Denman having summed up, the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty."

JUDGES' CHAMBERS (SERGEANTS' INN).

(Before Mr. Justice Cresswell.)

NEWTON AND IXOR V. ROWE AND NORMAN.—LIABILITY OF A MARRIED WOMAN TO THE LAW OF ARREST. LIBERATION OF MRS. NEWTON FROM CUSTODY.

Mrs. Newton, the wife of Mr. Augustus Newton, the barrister, was brought up before the above learned judge, on a writ of habeas, in the custody of the sheriff of Gloucester, in order for her discharge from a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, at the suit of Messrs. Rowe and Norman, the proprietors of the Cheltenham Examiner.—Mr. Knight appeared for Messrs. Rowe and Norman, and Mr. Newton argued his own case.—On Saturday the case was argued before his lordship, as to whether Mrs. Newton was liable to arrest.—The case came on again before his lordship. Mr. Newton having taken out a summons to set aside the writ on the ground of improperty, and also that she had no property of her own, nor any source of income, except that arising out of the emoluments of her husband's profession, who is a barrister-at-law. His lordship, on perusing the deed under which Mrs. Newton enjoyed the revenue, asked Mr. Knight if he had noticed the alienation clause, from which it would appear that Mrs. Newton could not anticipate her property, nor convey it over to any person whatever; that was a deed which could not easily be got over.—Mr. Knight apprehended that Mrs. Newton, being now in legal custody, under his lordship's warrant, she could be compelled to take the benefit of the Insolvent Act; and, under the compulsory clause of that act, the distressing creditors, Messrs. Rowe and Norman, could obtain a vested order, and, whether the property was much or little, they would be entitled to a dividend. The learned gentleman concluded this part of the case on the part of Mrs. Newton, being a compulsory one, and not a voluntary act of her own, her interests would not be disturbed, neither could the acting trustees take any advantage of the alienation clause, as they could not raise a sixpence under the deed in his lordship's hands. Mr. Newton then got up, and going towards his lordship's chair, said My lord, I now pronounce this deed to be a forgery, and produce it.—Mr. Justice Cresswell: Is it? Mr. Newton: Yes, it is. Mr. Justice Cresswell: I cannot do that.—Mr. Newton: Will you not, my lord, impound a forged instrument? I call on your lordship to impound that document.—His lordship: Proceed with your argument.—Mr. Newton: My lord, this deed is forged, and I require it to be impounded.—Mr. Justice Cresswell at length said, in a dignified manner: Mr. Newton, whether sitting in chambers or open court, I am not in the habit of having my orders disobeyed, and I now direct that you proceed with your argument immediately, or leave my chambers. The argument was then proceeded with. Mr. Justice Cresswell said that the property was clearly not saleable, and he did not see how he could set aside the detaining creditors; then again there was another difficulty; it entirely depended whether they proceeded to obtain the vested order or not, and his lordship could not detain the lady in custody on those grounds. Mr. Knight, in his irregularity in the arrest, for the sheriff was perfectly justifiable in issuing the warrant; but he, the learned judge, had now no power to detain her, she clearly having no available property. Mr. Newton then applied to his lordship not to discharge her, but to commit her. Mr. Knight said they would, of course, be protected from an action.—Mr. Justice Cresswell: Oh, no, I cannot say that; I can make no bargain, nor be a party to a bargain; I must leave you to settle that among yourselves. His lordship then made out the order for Mrs. Newton's liberation from the Queen's prison.

PREROGATIVE COURT.

In the Prerogative Court on Wednesday last, a paper was propounded as the will of a gentleman of the name of Hobart, who died in May, 1843, containing a direction that the sum of £2425 should be devoted to an equestrian statue of himself. The paper was written in the following terms:—"I leave my friend Mr. Blake of Norwich, and written shortly before his death. The probate of this paper was opposed, on the ground that so absurd a legacy afforded evidence of the incapacity of the deceased. Sir H. J. Pratt said, that though the bequest might be an evidence of the egregious vanity of the deceased, it was not sufficient to justify the Court in holding that he was insane, and admitted the paper to probate.

In the Bankruptcy Court the adjourned hearing of the case of Mr. Charles Mathews was resumed on Tuesday. The court was crowded with theatricals. Mr. Mathews stated that his losses at Covent-Garden Theatre amounted to £27,000. The insolvent was examined at great length, and the case was again adjourned. In reference to some points of his examination Mr. Mathews has published the following letter addressed to the commissioner of the evening papers:—

SIR,—In your paper of this day you report me to have stated in the Court of Bankruptcy, that "on my engagement at the Haymarket Theatre I wished Mr. Webster to make the duration of salary at a week for Mrs. Mathews and £20 for myself, thinking the latter sum sufficient compensation for my services; but he, in the most handsome manner, said he would prefer reserving it in my favour." I shall feel greatly obliged by your correcting the mistake. The salary was divided in the way I requested; and what I stated yesterday was, that on my return to England Mr. Webster said, in the most handsome manner, "that should Mrs. Mathews not be able to play during the period of the inquiry now pending, and I only should contribute my services, he should be happy to reverse the terms in my favour." This, of course, I considered as liberally and kindly meant; but, in the present emergency, I can never for a moment accept enough to interpret into his estimate of the relative value of our services.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, C. J. MATHEWS.

Park-street, Feb. 28, 1844.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

A case of some importance occurred at these sessions on Monday last, in which Mr. Corder, Clerk to the Board of Guardians of the Strand Union, applied to have process issued against a number of houses of ill-fame, which had been undicted before the grand jury, and against which true bills had been found. Mr. Prendergast objected on behalf of the bar that Mr. Corder was not a solicitor, and referred to a recent Act of Parliament, 6th and 7th Victoria, passed in last August, the second section of which strictly prohibits all persons not practising as an attorney, or duly enrolled, from suing out process or discharging other duties appertaining to the profession of solicitor. Mr. Sergeant Adams took time to consider the point, and next day stated that, on perusing the 6th and 7th Victoria, sec. 2, it was quite clear if any party should act as an attorney or solicitor, not having been duly admitted, he would render himself liable to be indicted for a misdemeanour.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—Mrs. Just, alias Young, was charged by Mrs. Baxter, with provoking her by abusive language to commit a breach of the peace. It appeared from the statement of Mr. Wooler, which created much laughter, and which was confirmed in evidence, that Mrs. Young made a similar charge against Mrs. Baxter, the declaration laid being that Mrs. Baxter had called her ugly names. On that occasion Mrs. Baxter pleaded a justification, and Alderman Humphery held that plea to be justification; it was proved and dismissed the complaint. Smarting under this, Mrs. Young and her "old man," Mr. Just, adopted an extraordinary mode of revenge. Having once lodged in Mrs. Baxter's house, they possessed a knowledge of the fact that a nephew of Mrs. Baxter had a skull (besides his own) which he used in his phrenological studies, and upon this fact they raised a story that Mrs. Baxter had murdered a certain lodger whom they named, and that they even knew the place where the unfortunate man's skull was deposited! The consequence was that the whole neighbourhood was quickly in an uproar; neither Mrs. Baxter nor her husband dared show their faces, for fear the mob would hang them; and the excitement at length grew to such a pitch that the superintendent thought it his duty to order a formal investigation. The police found a skull in the trunk of Mrs. Baxter's nephew, but the mystery was phrenologically explained to their satisfaction. Still, however, the popular fury was not allayed, and the parties continued to abuse complainant, &c. Alderman Hughes said he would endeavour to stop both parties from annoying the public by their recriminations, and bound them both over to keep the peace

Isaac Cohen, a young man of respectable appearance, was charged with stealing a silk handkerchief from the pocket of a gentleman, in the Court of Common Pleas. He was detected by a policeman on duty in the court in plain clothes. Upon being seized, he was identified by Mr. Rawlings, a special juror, as having been seen standing by his side, from whom he was robbed of his pocket-handkerchief, once while he was standing in the Common Pleas, and once during the examination of Barber and Fletcher.—It appeared that he had purchased more than twenty silk handkerchiefs, with Child, a City ward officer, and of two other handkerchiefs with Brend, the marshalman.—Mr. Alderman Challis remanded the prisoner for a week.

HOW-STREET.—Mr. John Cooper, the stage-manager of Drury-lane Theatre, applied to the Lambeth Gardens for a summons against Mr. Jardine, who had been engaged by Mr. Bunn, the lessee of that establishment, as chorus-singers, and who, there was every reason to suppose, were about to transfer their services to that Italian opera House. However, they having actually attended Exeter-hall rehearsals, at that theatre, of the forthcoming performances there, no doubt preparatory to their accepting an engagement at that house, although now in the service of Mr. Bunn, with their usual weekly salary.—Mr. Jardine said he doubted whether a magistrate had jurisdiction in such a case. The act that gave him power to enforce contracts between masters and servants, applied only to handicraftsmen, such as shoemakers, tailors, carpenters, &c. He should be altogether useless to commence an action at law against the parties.—Mr. Jardine said the better plan would be to give notice to the parties of the illegality of their proceedings, which might, perhaps, prevent a repetition of them.

MARYLEBONE.—Martha Bruner was placed at the bar before Mr. Rawlinson, for final examination, charged with having stolen various articles, the property of Mr. Alexander Bell, of No. 1, Thayer-street, Manchester-square. She had been for two months in the service of the prosecutor, recommended by a false character, previous to the robbery, which was proved, and she was committed for trial.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—Charles Bruce, a very expert housebreaker, was finally examined on the charge of felonously breaking and entering the dwelling-house of Mrs. Emily Hawkins, a widow lady, residing at No. 9, Lower Grove, Brompton, and stealing therein a quantity of plate, wearing apparel, &c. From the time of committing the offence the prisoner has been suffering imprisonment for another charge, and as soon as he was liberated he was brought up upon this charge. The prisoner did not deny the imputation, and said he should plead guilty. He was committed for trial.

LAMBETH-STREET.—Mr. Pelham, the solicitor on behalf of the Emigration Committee, and Lord. J. J. Lean, the Government emigration-agent, attended to prosecute a charge against a person named Charles Rayner, for having received £11 17s. 4d. from two poor men, named Allen and Bond, under pretence of procuring them a passage from the port of London to New York; and also with providing them with provisions necessary for the voyage. The poor men had, about the beginning of the month, paid Rayner, who had an office close to the London Docks, and represented himself as an emigrant agent, the amount above mentioned, for their passage on board the Brothers, a merchant ship, and also for provisions during the voyage. On going on board the vessel, however, the captain, who has since sailed, said he knew nothing about them, and refused to have anything to do with them, and the consequences had been, that they have been since in a state of great privation. The summonses against the defendant were returnable on Tuesday, but were adjourned until this day, in order to give further time for his appearance. Saunders, the summoning officer, deposed that he served the summons personally on Rayner, who at the time said he would attend to-day. He saw no more of him, and on going to the house on the day preceding he used every effort to see him, but without effect. Mr. Pelham, under the circumstances, and not wishing for the present to have the case heard in the absence of the defendant, would ask for another adjournment. The poor men, who it appeared had spent their last shilling to procure a passage, and who were perfectly destitute, were ordered by the magistrate a supply of money from the police-court fund, in order to keep them until the case is disposed of.

UNION-HALL.—A case, exemplifying in a remarkable degree the mistakes fallen into occasionally with respect to the identity of persons, came on before Mr. Cottingham, during the examination of a man named Jarvis, who was charged on the information of another Irishman named Connell. The prisoner was brought to this court a few days ago charged with stealing a firkin of butter, which he was seen carrying on his shoulder, and was stopped he said that he had found it in the road, and took it home. He was afterwards taken into custody, but this statement being disbelieved, he was taken into custody. The prisoner gave a similar account when before the magistrate, and two persons in attendance gave him a good character, and said that they had known him from his youth, and never heard of his being in trouble before. Two or three policemen, however, gave a very different character of the prisoner, whom they alleged had been convicted of felony, and transported for seven years. This latter accusation, however, was denied by the prisoner, and he was remanded until Wednesday, with a view that the matter might be further investigated. Accordingly policeman 76, P. Dawson, attended, and on looking at the prisoner he said that he took him into custody in the year 1835, for felony, and that he was convicted and transported for seven years. The prisoner declared that the policeman was mistaken, and went on to say that a brother of his was tried some years ago and sentenced to transportation, but a subsequent investigation having been entered into before the Secretary of State, his brother received a free pardon. The prisoner then applied to Connell, the Irishman who had known the prisoner since his boyhood, stepped forward, produced the free pardon of the prisoner's brother, and said that the accused had never been away fro-. Camberwell a month together since he was a boy. This latter circumstance was confirmed by the shopkeeper to whom the firkin of butter belonged, which the prisoner was charged with stealing. Mr. Cottingham said that the investigation in the charge about the policeman was satisfactory as to the identity of the prisoner, although he had spoken with such confidence on the point. The magistrate added, that he hoped the policeman would take a warning for the future, and be more cautious and confidently of his own recollection of a person until he was quite positive of it. Mr. Cottingham discharged the prisoner, stating that he left the court without any imputation on his character.

THAMES.—A respectable-looking young woman, was brought from Guy's Hospital to Union-hall, on a charge of attempting to commit suicide by swallowing a large quantity of laudanum, from the effects of which she was with difficulty saved. Distress seemed to have caused the attempt. She was sent to St. Olave's workhouse to be taken care of.

THE CASE OF SUPPOSED TRANCE AT DEPTFORD.—The deep interest excited in Deptford respecting the supposed trance cont nues increasing daily, and it is deemed one of the most extraordinary which has ever come before the faculty. It appears that the statement made in the case of the lady being in a state of decomposition was rather premature. On Monday, Mr. Hope, surgeon, of Deptford, attended, prepared with a galvanic battery, but, on viewing the body, considered it advisable not to make the experiment; he, however, recommended that the head should be raised more, so that if any life did remain, the blood should not flow to the head. He also strongly recommended that as no decomposition had taken place, no interment should be made until decomposition was unequivocal, and then, for the satisfaction of the relatives and justice to the medical profession, a post mortem examination should be made. He observed that the limbs were not stiff, and the skin was almost warm, and unlike death. The relatives still entertain hopes, and the body is frequently washed. It is, however, in the coffin. The limbs were perfectly supple. Twenty-four days had elapsed since the interment.

FINE WRITING.—On Monday the committee of the Journeymen Tailors' Benevolent Society, meeting for the despatch of business, addressed the assembled members, in their report, in the following magnificent language:—"The directors have to congratulate you on the prosperous state of the society's first apprenticeship—it may be said to have almost attained its climax. Like the modest rose, this institution first reared its head, and its odour filled the land. The kindly dews of the surrounding societies moistened its roots, and its benign sun of heaven shone upon it, improving its sweetness and increasing its strength, giving to its form all beauty and fair proportion, and preparing it for the broad and green fields of the world in which it was to be transplanted. Here it grew up to a stately tree, and its wide-spreading foliage was refreshed beneath the summer's sun. It braved the blasts of the coming winter, which gave majesty to its trunk and might to its giant arms, and it may now be said to have taken up its position in the forest of the world, and become a proud rival to the lordly oak. How grateful, how encouraging is that! How sweet the perfume it exhales; how soft must it make the pillow—how calm the sleep! It breathes an odour which is borne on the winds of heaven—wafted on the spicy gales of Arabia and the East Indies; it is carried over the proud waves of the broad Atlantic; it stimulates in the north, it invigorates in the south, for its supporters are to be met with at every point of the compass."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Although the arrivals of English wheat this week have been very moderate, we have still to report an inactive demand for that article at prices barely equal to those obtained on Monday. In foreign wheat exceedingly little was doing, on somewhat easier terms for the middling descriptions. The barley trade was very dull, and the rates had a downward tendency. The same may be said of malt. All other grain, as on Monday.

ARRIVALS. English: Wheat, 2270 ; barley, 2080; oats, 3670 quarters. Irish: oats, 7710 quarters. Foreign: wheat, 1340 ; barley, 830 quarters. Flour, 3080 sacks. Malt, 2380 quarters.

The Seed Market.—Linseed and rapeseed have sold on full terms: but, to all other kinds of seeds very little has been doing, at previous rates.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 60s; Baltic crushing, 26s to 30; Mediterranean and Odessa, 26s to 28s; hempseed, 32s to 34s per quarter; coriander, 18s to 20s per cwt; canary, 50s to 54s; white mustard seed, 7s to 12s; white do., 10s to 12s per bushel; English rapeseed, new, 42s to 43s per last of ten quarters. Linseed cakes, English, 5l to 5l 5s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 5l 5s to 5l 10s per ton; canary, 31s 6d to 32s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8½d to 9½d ; of housewife bread, 8½d to 9d per 4lb loaf.

Duties.—Wheat, 18s; barley, 8s; oats, 7s; rye, 10s 6d; beans, 11s 6d; peas, 10s 6d

TEA.—There is a very large business doing in tea, and prices are on the advance. The lowest price of strong Congou is now 1s 0½d per lb. The public sales of the week and the consumption of duty has been paid in London, Liverpool, Bristol, and Hull, during the present year, ending on Saturday last, amounted to 4,726,764 pounds; while, at the same period in 1843, the quantity released was 4,474,748 pounds. During the past month the import must have consisted of about 3,500,000 pounds.

Sugar.—The market is very firm for all descriptions of sugar, and the quotations have, in some instances, advanced from 6d to 1s per cwt for fine colonry parcels.

Wool.—Not one fair wool report, new or lasting, has been in active request, or, in some instances, an advance of 2s per cwt. All other kinds of hops move off steadily, at full prices:—Weald of Kent pockets, 40s to 46l 10s; Mid Kent do., 42s to 48l 10s; East Kent do., 46l 10s to 49l 14s ; Choice do., 50l to 52l 10s ; Sussex do., 35s to 36l 12s; Farnham's, 49l 10s to 50l 11s , Mid Kent bags, 40l 10s to 46l 10s.

Smithfield.—In to-day's market the supply of beasts, owing to the non arrival of the Father Thames, was unusually small, and of very middling quality. The few prime sorts on offer produced Monday's quotations; but those of inferior kinds had a downward tendency. The numbers of sheep were scanty, while the mutton trade was steady, at late rates. The numbers of calves were moderate, and the veal trade was in a depressed state, at drooping currencies. Pigs were of ordinary sale, at previous prices. Much cows sold at from 16l to 18l each.

Beasts, 2,200; sheep, 10,000; calves, 170; pigs, 280.

Per 8lbs to sink the offal—Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; second quality ditto, 2s 8d to 3s 4d; prime large ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d ; prime small ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 10d to 3s 0d ; second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; large hogs, 3s 10d to 3s 6d; small do. 3s 8d to 4s 0d; neat small ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d ; large hogs, 3s 10d to 3s 6d; small porkers 3s 8d to 4s 0d; suckling calves, 18s to 28s, quarter old store pigs, 16s to 18s each Beasts, 2,7 0; sheep, 140 ; sheep, 3240; calves, 154; pigs, 280.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—Prime beef and mutton sold freely, at full prices, but otherwise the demand was heavy. Inferior beef, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling do., 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 3s 6d ; small pork, 3s 6d to 4s 0d ; coarse do., 3s 0d to 3s 2d; inferior mutton, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; middling ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; coarse and inferior do., 2s 8d to 3s 0d; prime do., 3s 2d to 3s 4d; veal, 3s 4d to 3s 6d; small pork, 3s 4d to 4s 0d ; coarse do., 3s 0d to 3s 2d.

CHINESE COLLECTION.—FEAST of LANTERNS.—The most Exhibition, which the public press describes as surpassing in brilliancy of effect all the fêtes hitherto introduced to the British public, will, in consequence of its unparalleled success, be repeated THREE more EVENINGS, viz.—This (Friday) Evening, Saturday, March 7, and Saturday, March 9. On these occasions the brilliant and novel display will be increased by the introduction of numerous Original Chinese Fireworks, after the Manner, Novelties, adapted and arranged by Dr Wallis

"The scene was very beautiful, the effect fully realising that of the Palace of the Genius in the Arabian Nights." The Chinese Music was considerably superior to any of European manufacture we have lately heard."—Morning Chronicle. "At the Chinese Collection, the public have an opportunity of seeing the Feast of Lanterns and Fireworks, as decorated with a countless number of variegated lanterns, which produce a most enchanting effect, and give a splendour to the scene that could not be equalled in any part of Europe save within the Celestial Empire itself."—Morning Post.

In consequence of the inconvenience experienced in obtaining tickets, the admission to the Feast of Lanterns will, in future, be by payment at the doors. Admission, One Shilling each person. For the public convenience, the number of visitors admitted will be limited. Each evening's entertainment will commence at 7, and terminate at 10 o'clock.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.

MILLINERY and DRESS BUSINESS.—A Vacancy occurs for a PUPIL, offering the advantage of a select and established business. THE FOREIGN LIBRARY.—Part XI., Price 2s.,

IRELAND.—By J. G. KOHL.—

MR. KOHL's work on Ireland is beyond all comparison the most succinct and faithful that we have yet seen, and exhibits the laudable condition of that country in a light in which none but a foreigner, or at least a sagacious traveller, could paint it. His testimony is doubly valuable from the weight of experience and authority which he has carried with it. Making due allowance for national prejudices, it must be confessed that no modern traveller has more minutely and accurately depicted the social condition of the countries he has visited."—Dublin Evening Post.—Longman and Co., 1844, 186, Strand.

POPULAR SONG.—"I'M AFLOAT!" Words by ELIZA
COOK. Music by HENRY RUSSELL.—"This is a capital song. The words, by Miss Cook, are excellent. Russell has been very successful in several of his productions; such as 'The Ivy Green,' 'The old Oak Tree,' 'The old Arm-chair,' &c.; but 'I'm Afloat' is likely to exceed them all in popularity, as a pleasing and animated character, must become universally admired."—Vide Musica. EDWARD DODD'S ANGLO-ROMAN STRINGS for VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, and HARP—manufacturer to H.H.H. the Duke of Cambridge, which Strings, for power of tone and durability, are equal to the best Italian Strings, at 50 per cent. less, and are recommended to the public as the truest musical property of retaining the ill effects of heated rooms. Testimonials from Messrs. Bingham, Tolbecque, Wiley, Loder, Grattan, &c. &c. Sold at the manufactory, 12, Vauxhall Walk, Lambeth. Each bundle wrapped with E. Dodd's Anglo-Roman Strings.—Please ask for E. Dodd's Anglo-Roman Strings. Also improved Silver Strings.

BRETT'S IMPROVED BRITISH COGNAC.—The essential purity of this Brandy, and its superiority to every other spirit, is demonstrated by the test of chemistry, and by its perfect congeniality to the human stomach. Warranted. Samples may be had in sealed pint and quart bottles, 3s. and 3s. 6d. each, under the guarantee of our seal, label, and signature; and single gallons, or upwards, at 18s. per imperial gallon will be delivered by our own carts, or by the wharfinger, free of expense, to any part of the City. GEORGE BRETT, 20, Cornhill, and 21, Regent street.

BETTS and Co., PATENT BRANDY DISTILLERS, 7,
Smithfield Bars, have placed the produce of this country, the grain grown upon British soil, and malted and distilled on their premises, under the sole application and skill of the Continent. Their PALE and COLOURED PATENT BRANDY is a pure, wholesome, and palatable spirit, made from malt and equal in quality to the best Cognac at about half the price. It is prescribed by the highest medical authorities, at Guy's, St. George's, and the Westminster Hospitals, and at other principal Hospitals and Infirmaries throughout the kingdom. In stone jars, at 18s. per gallon, jar excluded; and in bottles, at 20s. per gallon (or 3s. 6d. per bottle), the bottles and packages included. A single bottle may be had from the country dealers in town and country, of whose names lists may be obtained from the Patentees. To prevent fraud, every bottle has the cork and mouth secured by the Patent Metallic Capsules (not tin foil), embossed with the words, "Betts' Patent Brandy, 7, Smithfield Bars."

TOOTH BRUSHES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, in answer to some complaints from the country, that Tooth Brushes purchased as of their manufactory have turned out of inferior quality, beg to inform the public that Brushes supplied by them to country shops are only warranted if their name is stamped on the handle. Cheap-priced Tooth Brushes are not to be had genuine, but much dearer in the end than a good Tooth Brush, as they do not last half the time; and, indeed, this applies to Hair Brushes, and every other description of Brush. The Tooth Brushes stamped with their name are of that best cut to match, both in the material and workmanship; and if of bone, which is very rare, that some hairs become loose, they not only charge them, but are obliged to the purchaser for the information, as they are sold in an inferior manner, if inset in bone, or set in ivory, 2s. N.B. Tooth, Hair, Nail, and Shaving Brushes, of the best quality, for exportation, with the usual allowance.—No 24, Old Bond street. February, 1844.

COMBINATION, ECONOMY, and QUALITY, VERSUS EXPENSE and INFERIORITY. VINCENT and PUGH, Wine Merchants and Brandy Merchants, of New Park-street, Borough, claim the attention of the Public to their article of BRANDY. The two qualities of Cognac and Pure Spirit, are hereby combined in the manufacture. The spirit having been submitted to the severest chemical analysis, to be by first analysing chemists of the day, testimonials of which can be produced to prove its perfect equality with the finest Cognac, the Proprietors can confidently challenge any competition to produce its equal. For the convenience of Families, the Proprietors have bottled a larger quantity, than 7 Gallons and Upwards, in handsome Imperial bottles, covered with a neat metallic capsule over the cork, and labelled "Vincent and Pugh's Champagne and Cognac Brandy." Sold in quantities not less than two gallons, equal to one dozen in bottles, at 44s per dozen, bottles included. Agent, WM. HAY, Wine Merchant, No. 14, Forster-street, Newport Market; and No 1, Great Newport-street, Leicester-square.

THE MART OF THE EAST,
A PARODY ON "THE LAND OF THE WEST."
Oh! Come to the "Wonderful" "Mart of the East!"
The Mart where the Bargains are cheap as the least!
Where thousands of garments are crowding our shelves,
Oh! come to the "East," them and Judge for yourselves!
Well sorry I am to part with them now for one's end,
And you'll say there's no Mart like "the Mart of the East."

The South has its Markets and warehouses, too,
But one thing is certain, they're not to be seen
In a scene would afford you an ocular feast
Oh! what can surpass "the Mart of the East?"
Then come here, at once; and E. MOSES and SON,
Will "sell" you much better than any have done,

The North has its stores where gents are shown—
But what are these dresses compared with our own?
Come and see them! and then you'll acknowledge, at least,
That the Mart of the West,
Then come to the East, where the prices are low
Where the articles offered are sure to go,

The stranger may gaze on the Clothes of the West—
But when he compares them, what are they at best?
And where can he go, when he can buy one cheap?
Oh does he not haste to "the Mart of the East?"
Then come here at once—where E. MO. s and SON
Will "sell" you much better than any have done,

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

STAMPED POSTAGE PAPER.—The proposed stamped half sheets intended to pass free through the Post-office, will bear an oval medallion portrait, beautifully embossed, of her Majesty, so impressed as to fall, when the half sheet is folded for the purpose of note-writing, in the right-hand corner of the space usually dedicated to the superscription of the letter. If the paper be intended to be sent as an envelope, the stamp falls into the centre of the front, immediately above the part allotted for the address. The authorities of the Post-office have given their sanction to thus placing the frank, as the process of obliteration will not be retarded by it.

EXTENSIVE FAILURE.—Almost the only subject of conversation on 'Change on Tuesday, was the suspension of payment by a gentleman well known in Liverpool, and connected with some of the first families in that place, who, after losing a most handsome fortune by speculating in shares, as still deficient, it is said, to the extent of nearly £100,000. This failure has produced a great consternation in the Liverpool Corn Market.

EQUALISATION OF THE LAND-TAX.—On Tuesday a meeting of deputies of metropolitan parishes effected by the unequal pressure of this tax was held at Lacey's, 14, Southampton-buildings, Strand, to determine what course should be pursued to effect a more equal distribution of the burthen; Mr. Broughton in the chair. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Lott and Holt, of the Common Council, Mr. S. Miller, of Lincoln's Inn, and other gentlemen of the Committee, condemning the inequality of the land-tax, and suggesting an application to Sir R. Peel, who, by his financial scheme, the income and property-tax, gave some hope of his entertaining a project for a revision of the land-tax, in lieu of the vexatious and unpopular tax on income. It was contended by the several speakers that the present operation of the land-tax was to fix on districts least able to bear it a very heavy share of the impost, while the highly-flourishing localities were comparatively untaxed; that the Redemption Act operated unjustly, both towards the heavier taxed districts and towards the revenue, being unavailable in the former, and enabling the lighter taxed and improving districts to escape everything like their fair contribution to the latter. Instances were given of the immense mass of railway property, and the recently become populous districts of the metropolis and other large cities, whose inhabitants, by the operation of the Redemption Act of Mr. Pitt, had freed themselves from this tax, whelst their prosperous condition, compared with the unimproveable nature of the older and heavier taxed localities, fitted them better to pay. It was stated that, in some districts, the quota of land tax to be so inconsiderable as only to require a rate in three years; and the expense of collecting it is so disproportionate, as to require three times the amount paid into the Exchequer, to be taken from the pockets of the payers, before it reaches the public coffers. The waste of the public resources the rate per pound was under a farthing, while in other and less prosperous localities from 2s. to 3s. in the pound was paid annually.

YARMOUTH BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—The Seventh Annual General Meeting of the members of the Benevolent Institution for the Relief of the Aged and Infirm Journeymen Tailors, was held on Monday last (Feb. 26) at the Freemasons' Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and the Secretary read the report of the past year, and congratulated the members and friends of the institution on the prosperous state of the funds. The receipts for the past year amounted to £2097 12s. 7d., and after the payment of the expenses of the Institution, there remained a balance of £1421 3s. 3d., which has been invested in the funds, making the total funded stock £11,126 0s. 9d. John Stultz, Esq. was elected president, and Messrs. Stultz and Hunter were elected treasurers for the year ensuing; and the other officers of the Institution being duly elected, a ballot took place for five pensioners in addition to the forty-four men in the asylum at Havenock Hall, a view of which appeared in No. 8 of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. Each inmate receives 8s. per week and coals for life. At five o'clock the five following were declared duly elected out of a list of thirty-eight deserving candidates, viz., Messrs Staines, Varley, Leacock, Dunne, and Smith, after which the meeting broke up, highly satisfied with the day's proceedings.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—THANKS TO THE SCINDIAN ARMY.—On Wednesday a Special Court of the Proprietors of East India Stock, was held at the East India House, convened by the Court of Directors, for the purpose of laying before the meeting resolutions to thanks adopted by the Executive body of the Corporation, by reference to the recent Anglo-Indian operations in Scinde. The Chair was taken by Mr. John Cotton, and the minutes of the last Court were read.—The Clerk then read the motion, which was an echo of the resolution passed by the Court of Directors.—Sir James Carnac, in moving the motion, said the motion, by Sullivan said he must object to the resolutions, to which he would give his most strenuous opposition. The hon. proprietor then went into the history of the Scinde wars, and the conduct of the commanders therein. He protested against from the "blue books," but as the matter has already been sufficiently referred to in the debates in Parliament, and at the East India House, it is not necessary to report the whole of his address to the Court. He contended that Sir Charles Napier had the option of preserving peace, but he preferred war. That gallant General had held the pen in one hand and the sword in the other. He (Mr. Sullivan) applied to the bull and vulture of Mr. Pitt, and had condemned his policy. He had resolved to attack the Ameers wherever he found them. The war was a bloody and wanton one, and therefore he could not thank Sir Charles Napier or the Scinde army. Every hour he pondered, the less necessity to move a single troop. He trusted the proprietors would not stain the records of that Court by having inserted upon them the resolutions that had been come to at the Court of Directors. He should move the previous question on them, and wished to ask for the proceedings of the Court of Directors on the subject.—Mr. Weeding said, had he known the course the hon. proprietor (Mr. Sullivan) intended to pursue, he would have come prepared to negative them, and wished to ask for the proceedings of the Court of Directors on the subject.—Mr. Weeding said, had he known the course the hon. proprietor (Mr. Sullivan) intended to pursue, he would have come prepared to negative them, and had that day been made. A perusal of the papers that had been presented relative to the affairs of Scinde, had convinced him (Mr. Weeding) that Sir Charles Napier deserved the bull and vulture, and Napier, but condemned his policy. He had resolved to attack the Ameers wherever he found them. The war was a bloody and wanton one, and therefore he could not thank Sir Charles Napier or the army. Every hour he pondered, the less necessity to move a single troop. He trusted the proprietors would not stain the records of that Court by having inserted upon them the resolutions that had been come to at the Court of Directors. ARMS AND EMPIRE.

The Army Estimates have been almost the only subject of importance discussed in the Legislature during the week. They are so exclusively things of figures and fact—come in so ordinary a shape, and are treated so much as matters of course—that very few reflect on the tremendous consequences involved in the subject. We are not going to enter into the question of what England would be without a military force, but it will not be out of place to ask what use she makes of the power she possesses? The following "extraordinary dispatch," which arrived on Wednesday morning, is an answer to the question too significant to require expounding:—

The Indian mail of the 1st of February announces the taking of Gwalior, after two battles, in which the Anglo-Indian army lost more than 1000 men in killed and wounded. The enemy sustained an equal loss.

For some time past such has been the general tenor of the intelligence from India. War, conquest, aggrandisement and extension of an empire which many reflective statists think is already too vast to be defended, too great to be turned to advantage, and too populous to be held in subjection, if the prestige attached to the European name should by any causes begin to be shaken among the native population—this continual widening of the circle from its centre has been going on for generations. Is the continual progress healthy? is the staying the tide quite impossible?

The laurels of an army are fed and nourished from the wealth—not always the superfluous wealth—of a people. Is the shadow they cast over the land where they are gathered a protection or a blight? If there is a doubt on the subject should we not be careful how we sow their seeds, which are plentifully scattered in the shape of the "Army Estimates."

The rightful use of an army is to defend the country against foreign aggression, to preserve internal peace, and to protect property. The world has not yet so far progressed as to enable any nation that has anything worth losing, to dispense with the provision of means of defence. Russia is semi-barbarous, having an almost unlimited command of the raw material of war—man—and does not lack the disposition to pour her wild hordes over the south and west of Europe—crushing liberty, civilization, and the arts, beneath the tread of the hosts from that "northern hive" which overthrew the Roman Empire. France is more civilized, but, with few manufactures, and little foreign trade, her population presses on the means of subsistence, and that population is essentially a military one, loving war for its own sake, and provided they believe that national honour is involved in the cause, careless with whom they fight, or about what they quarrel. Twice within the course of one century they have overran, conquered, and given laws to Europe; once under Louis the-Fourteenth, and again, beneath a leader far greater than the Grand Monarque—Napoleon. At the present moment the war party in France is very powerful—all but the predominant one; it is stronger in the Chambers, and more united against the pacific policy of M. Guizot than the English Liberal members are, or can be, against the policy of Sir Robert Peel; nor are French political leaders by any means so scrupulous as ours. The affair of the paltry island of Otaheite, and its poor sovereign Pomare—whom it seems almost a satire on Royalty to designate a Queen—has been outrageously magnified by this party: in every respect "Paris and its People" are inflamed to the highest pitch on a matter which no one here thinks worth a moment's attention. And this feeling is not without its effect on the "Army Estimates."

At the best, and notwithstanding the "friendly assurances" they are continually exchanging, peace between the different powers of Europe is little better than an armed truce; there is not actual war, but there is every preparation for it, and the first nation that shows unequivocal signs of weakness, will fall a prey to the rest. Poland has been divided among three great Powers; her population was a mass of unarmed serfs, and a band of oppressive nobles. Switzerland, with not a fourth of her territory, or a third of her inhabitants, has kept its independence, in the centre of Europe, for centuries; but every peasant bears arms, and well knows the use of them. Thus, there is a necessity for providing the means of defence; that it were otherwise is to be wished; but the world must be taken as it is, and our policy must be adapted to our circumstances.

Fully recognizing, then, the propriety of being on a level with other nations in this respect we still cannot so fully agree with the necessity of keeping up an army for continual conquest and aggrandizement. The present generation has no power over the acts of the past, and we may be obliged to keep what our Clives and Wellesleys have conquered, and to keep them by the same means as they acquired them. "The soil of India," said Lord John Russell on one occasion, "is strewed with ruined thrones and broken sceptres." The descendants of their possessors do not forget the grandeur of their fathers; were we to relax in our assertion of power, they would inevitably rise against us, and we should lose our place in the scale of nations. But maintaining our position does not seem to involve the necessity of continually increasing our territory. What have we gained by our more recent invasions? Nothing but sad reverses, or, in case of success, fresh embarrassments. Who would not wish that the events of the war in Affghanistan, with its disastrous retreat, and frightful suffering, could be blotted from the page of our history? We have taken Scinde; it yet remains to be seen what we can do with it, for the climate is so deadly, that the troops have lost more by disease than by the sword of the enemy. And now we have, as the despatch tells us, taken Gwalior; in what will the new possession be superior to Cabul or Hyderabad, neither of which have been—probably never will be—worth the blood and treasure they have cost us. To secure our new conquest, seven thousand men on either side have been killed and wounded; seven thousand human beings maimed and slaughtered, and the event is mentioned with as much coolness and indifference, as if human life and suffering were but as dust in the balance against the boast of acquiring a new possession, which we shall be unable to turn to any account.

That an army is essential to the strength and integrity of an empire cannot be denied; but the government of that empire is accountable for the use made of the instrument entrusted to it. The discussion of the "Army Estimates" affords a good opportunity for impressing that responsibility on the rulers. Yet we do not see this larger view taken of the subject; the controversy is all confined to points of detail and items of expense; we allow the use of the army, but complain of the cost of it. The process should be reversed—the purpose it is applied to should be criticised, and the cost of it, examined indeed, but if found not disproportionate to the numbers, allowed fairly, but not lavishly. The contest should be on the main point, but not on the minor one. We should reduce the numbers of the army, which would keep it strong enough for defence, yet render aggression more difficult; but having granted the number of men to be employed, the expense is almost a necessary consequence. Having given the sword into the hand of those who are to use it, the fashion of the hilt and the cost of the mounting are minor questions compared with the inquiry, is this weapon to be used for the legitimate defence and lawful protection of ourselves, or, in robber fashion, to be employed in seizing the property and cutting the throats of our neighbours?

HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF PRUSSIA.—DRAWN BY M. BAUGNIET.

ROYAL PORTRAITS.—No. III.

HIS MAJESTY FREDERIC WILLIAM IV., KING OF PRUSSIA.

This is another of M. Bauguiet's faithful portraitures of the Crowned Heads of Europe; and, for its vraisemblance, will, doubtless, be equally admired with either of its predecessors in our graphic gallery.

His Majesty Frederic William IV. succeeded to the throne of Prussia on the death of his father, Frederic William, in June, 1840. On his accession, it seems to have been expected that he would fulfil what were understood to have been his father's promise of a national representation. The King, however, in his answer, declared, that his father had been induced by the events that took place in other countries, to take into serious consideration the meaning that might be given to his words; that, reflecting on the sacred duties of the royal office confided to him by God, he resolved to fulfil his promises; but, keeping aloof from the prevalent notion of a general national representation, he should follow, for the real good of the people, and with the sincerest republican, the course best adapted to the German national character. The result was the establishment of provincial and district assemblies in all parts of the monarchy. Another popular part of the policy announced by his Majesty upon his accession was his professed intention to uphold the nationality of his Polish subjects. A painful interest has, therefore, been excited of late, by the fact of his Majesty having expelled from his dominions 2000 Polish emigrants; but we hope that this serious charge may admit of further explanation than has yet been afforded.

The King of Prussia, it will be recollected, early in 1842, visited England on the christening of the infant Prince of Wales, for whom his Majesty stood sponsor. And it is understood that during the ensuing autumn our most gracious Queen, and her Royal Consort, contemplate a visit to his Majesty.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, MARCH 5.

SPAIN.

We continue without positive information of either the proceedings of the insurgents, or the affairs of Spain in general. All the news published is that of the Government; private letters are afraid to write. If the Government organs are to be credited, the position of the insurgents is desperate.—Carthagena has demanded to capitulate; one of its forts has been taken; and General Roncali is preparing to lay siege to Alicant. Notwithstanding the dearth of intelligence, trifling observations frequently throw much light on grave matter; thus it is that the departure of the Minister of Finance, accompanied by Don Fernando Alvarez, Don Domingo Morere, and Don Salvador Bermudez de Castro, for Valencia, to receive the Queen Mother, is considered by those well informed not to be so much a visit of ceremony to receive Christina, as to prevent General Concha from influencing that august lady against Narvaez and Bravo. This fact, I believe, is admitted by the friends of the Ministers. If true, it shows clearly great dissentions in the Ministerial camp, and a want of confidence in the Ministers by the army. Be it as it may, important events may be shortly expected. Christina has entered Spain, she reached Gerona on the 1st, and left the next day for Matsco. The Spanish Government is likely to have a serious affair on hand, and it is reported that war will be declared against the Emperor of Morocco, on whose territory very lately the Spanish Consul was murdered. There were some trifling disturbances at Cadiz, on the 22nd. Some soldiers having been insulted by the inhabitants, the garrison was called out, and three of the perturbators slightly wounded.

FRANCE.

The affaire of Tahiti continues to occupy the columns of our Opposition papers, but with little interest to the readers. The opponents of the Government are determined, if possible, to make a Napoleon of Admiral Dupetit-Thouars; they not only have opened a subscription for presenting him with a sword of honour, but committees have been formed to ensure his election as Deputy for one of the Paris districts at the first vacancy. On this subject the Globe has the following article:—"The Opposition journals of yesterday continued the joke of a subscription being opened to present a sword of honour to Admiral Dup etit-Thouars. We are perfectly edified with the patriotic subscriptions of the republic. It will be with the sword of honour presented to Admiral Mr. with the million of the Irish; and with M. Dupetit-Thouars as with O'Connell, who deels at that if the million had been sent, it would not have been accepted. M. Dupetit Thouars is, in fact, a man of infinitely too much sense and good taste not to let himself be taken in by the compromising nonsense of the Opposition. He will perceive that the nation is rather with the imposing majority of the Chambers, who have disapproved of his conduct, than with the minority who hail him all their esteem, than with those singers of the Marseillaise, who will come between two Bacchanalian couplets, and bring their offerings to the office of the National."

We are likely to have a strong Chamber of Deputies, on the Secret Service Money Bill. The sum demanded yesterday by the Government was 1,000,000f.

Yesterday and to day rumours are circulating that a conspiracy to overthrow the Government has been discovered in one of the regiments in garrison in Paris, and that several sergeants and officers had been arrested. I cannot guarantee the fact, and am seeking out information, which shall be immediately forwarded to you.

Before yourcesive this, probably the Duke d'Angoulême will be no more. The last accounts from Gorits are of the most alarming character. They state that on the 23rd the Duke had the last sacrament administered to him by the Archbishop. The physicians, of Gorits, contrary to the opinion of those of Padua, still entertain hopes of saving the life of the unfortunate patient.

All the Legitimist Deputies (with the exception of M. Larochefoucault, not yet known,) who lately retired from the Chamber of Deputies in consequence of the vote, branding them with infamy for visiting the Duke of Bordeaux when in England, have been re-elected, and return to the house, their conduct approved of by their constituents.

It is reported that the Ministers intend bringing a bill for completing the Louvre. The sum demanded will be 15,000,000f.

During 1843, the Minister of War granted permission to 14,000 farmers and workmen to settle in Algeria; this is independent of those gone at their own expense.

Prince Oellenger Wallerstein, Bavarian Minister, is now in Paris. This is the second visit of the Prince to our capital since the Greek revolution.

Nearly al. the provincial papers received this morning contain frightful accounts of inundations in almost every part of France, and of considerable damage to property and loss of life. The mountains of Tyrol are covered with snow to a great depth, and several lives have been lost by avalanches. In the Grand Duchy of Baden all the rivers have overflowed their banks from the melting of the snow on the mountains. The Seine has risen to an unprecedented height, and its waters have overflowed several of the principal roads.

Preparations are making for lighting with gas the road from the barrier de l'Etoile to Neuilly.

The Bank of France intends applying to Parliament for permission to issue notes of 250 francs each (£10).

Mr. Ward, an English gentleman 64 years of age, was a few days since barbarously murdered at his residence, No. 4, Rue de Londres. Mr. Ward, although the possessor of a large fortune, lived very retired, and had only one servant, who, on entering his room on Friday morning found his master lying in the middle of the room bathed in his blood. It appears that the murderer struck the unfortunate gentleman at the back of the head with a heavy log of wood. Several persons have been arrested, but as yet the miscreant has not been discovered.

On Saturday Ricci's opera, "Corrado d'Altamura," was performed for the first time at our Italian Opera: its success was complete, and there is little doubt but that it will become a general favourite in England. Gris. and Brambilla were divine: the latter was enthusiastically applauded in a cavatina at the opening of the opera. Brambilla performed Guisnardo, and never was more justice done to a character. This lady, although (in a future letter I will notice the cause) not engaged for the London season, continues the great favourite of the Parisian fashionables, and is the delight of the soirées of the flite of the beau monde, where she is engaged the season of the day. Marie was in good tune, and continues a great favourite. It was said that we are to have, next week, "I Puritani."

"Le Lazzarone; ou, le Bien vient en Dormant," is announced for the 20th. "La Syrène," an opera in three acts, and "Le Jabot," in one act, are in rehearsal. The new ballet, "Lady Henriette," continues to draw good houses. "Cagliostro" daily increases in public estimation.

Our celebrated manufacturer of pianos, M. Pleyel, is seriously ill, his health having greatly suffered from his constant attendance on the last days of his lamented mother. The funeral of this estimable lady was attended by all the distinguished artists in Paris. Chopsi, although himself seriously ill, was literally carried to the grave of his departed friend.

I have just learnt, for a fact, that Madame Rosee Caccio died lately at Lisbon, after an illness of only three days.

M. Onslow, the celebrated composer, is now in Paris. Persiani left us on Friday last for London. Rossani quits us on the 10th, and will be in England on the 15th.

Madame Cinti-Damoreau continues a great favourite with the Americans: at least so we are informed by letter from the Havannah.

Pacini's "L'Ebres" is in rehearsal at Milan. The principal character is confided to Madame Montenégro. It will be brought out at the Scala. Coppola's "La Jouvanna di Napoli" has met with but indifferent success at Turin. Fioravanti's "I Zengari" has been well received at the Teatro Nuovo of Naples.

Cerito is the great favourite at Florence. Her ballet, "L'Allieva d'Amore" is delighting crowded and drawn overflowing houses.

PORTUGAL.

We have received letters from Lisbon of the 29th ultimo.

The Cortes re-opened on the 21st ultimo. The minister, Cabral, called on the Chambers for the continuation of the law of the 5th ultimo, suspending the guarantees of individual liberty, and the liberty of the press, till the 31st of March.

The official accounts represent the insurrection as nearly suppressed. Columna and Brigades, Generals, Barons, and Viscounts, appear to have been continually pursuing the insurgents from the 6th to the 24th, and never to have come up with them to the latter date.

The latest intelligence from the Baron de Leiria, states that the insurgents had not succeeded in entering the Douro at Lira, and that he counted within two days to be able to report the suppression of the revolt.

A change of ministry appeared to be at hand—had it occurred six weeks ago an insurrection might have been avoided.

THE UNITED STATES.

The packet-ship United States, Capt. Bulton, arrived at Liverpool, from New York, on Saturday last, whence she sailed on the 14th ult., and by her we have received advices five days later than those received by the George Washington. The news is not important. Her Majesty's ship Vestal (26), having on board the Hon. Mr. Fakenham, arrived at New York on the 13th instant. He immediately landed, and was staying there, but was daily expected to take his departure for Washington.

By the barque Serene, from Buenos Ayres, at New York, with dates to Nov. 25, we learn from Captain Adams that Monte Video was still blockaded, and it was thought that it could not hold out much longer. At Buenos Ayres all was quiet.

The New York packet-ship England, Captain Bartlett, arrived at Liverpool, at one o'clock, p.m., on Sunday, after a quick voyage of less than sixteen days, from New York

We have received by her papers two days later than the above advices; but they do not contain matter of much importance. There was a good deal of speculation in cotton at New York, and prices were kept up. Stocks firmly maintained the late advance. The rate of exchange was unchanged, say 109¼ to 109¾.

The severity of winter had again somewhat returned.

The packet-ship Oxford, seized for smuggling, was still in durance.

MEXICO.

By the John Barr, Captain Hollingshead, we received advices a fortnight later from Vera Cruz. Contrary to anticipations hitherto formed, General Thompson had not left Mexico. What reasons existed for the suspension of his departure we did not learn.

Intelligence had at last reached Vera Cruz of the arrangement of the difficulties between the English and Mexican Governments. This news was thought almost to be too good to be true, as the commercial interests were not a little disturbed at the prospect of a British fleet entering the harbour of Vera Cruz with hostile intent.

The Mexican steamer Guadaloupe and a schooner of war arrived at Vera Cruz, from Tobasco, on the 21st ult., with troops on board. Two British brigs of war and two French sloops of war were also lying at Sacrificios.

The tenor of the commercial accounts do not vary from those received by the George Washington. There has been a little tendency in the price of stocks to advance, but this was the result rather of speculation than legitimate business.

MONTE VIDEO.

We have received Buenos Ayres papers to the 7th of January. They confirm the accounts respecting the disagreement between the French Consul at Monte Video and the Rivera Government, which had induced the former to demand his passports, and retire on board a ship of war off the port. They also confirm the statement respecting the interference of Commodore Purvis to obtain the restoration of the property of a British merchant seized by Ochre's officer at Maldonada. The most important part of the intelligence is, however, contained in the message of Rosas, on the opening of the session of the Legislative Assembly. In that message Rosas broadly charges Commodore Purvis with the open violation of the blockade of Monte Video, contrary to the law of nations, and also to the assurances he (Rosas) had received from Mr. Mandeville, entrusted by the Government at home in the specific instructions given to that officer. The charge therefore rests no longer upon mere party newspaper authority and vituperation, but is deliberately made in the official communication of the President, in a form which must necessarily command the immediate attention of our Foreign Secretary to set the matter in its true light before the world.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Lord WESTMEATH, with reference to a previous statement of his, that the Rev. Mr. Myers, a Roman Catholic priest, had been superseded by his titular bishop for not assisting in the collection of the Repeal rent, and which had been contradicted by Lord Normanby, contended that he was correct in the substance of what he said.

The Marquis of NORMANBY read a letter received from Dr. Cantwell, the Catholic bishop of Mr. Murray's diocese, in which there was a total denial of any interference whatever on the part of the clergy in that minister.

Lord BROUGHAM presented a petition from Sir Augustus D'Este, praying the house to suspend one of its standing orders, so as to permit the Chevalier Bunsen, who is about to be appointed Minister to Rome, to be examined before the committee of privileges, touching the claim of the petitioner to the titles, &c., of the late Duke of Sussex. The noble and learned lord gave notice to move, this day, for suspending the standing order as prayed for.

On the motion of Lord BROUGHAM, a bill for the improvement of the constitution of the Jud cial Committee of the Privy Council, was read a first time, with the understanding that it will be referred to a select committee before the second reading.

A petition presented by the Marquis of NORMANBY, complaining of the appropriation to collegiate education of a bequest left for the establishment of a parochial school at Ballymena, in Ireland, led to some discussion. The amount of the bequest was only £7 10s. per annum, and as there were but few Presbyterians in the parish, it was contended that it should be appropriated to instruction upon the national system to all classes. The Duke of WELLINGTON said, if the noble marquis would let him have a copy of the petition, he would take care that it should be brought under the attention of Government. The petition was then laid on the table, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The SPEAKER informed the house that the sureties for the petition against the return for Devizes were unexceptionable.

Several Railway Bills were advanced a stage.

Mr. GLADSTONE submitted to the house the resolutions agreed to by the committee relative to the constitution of railway committees. The principle hitherto adopted with respect to railway bills had been to appoint the committee upon those bills from members connected with the local interest to which the particular bill might apply. The committee, after mature consideration, had come to the determination of departing in some degree from that principle, in respect to railway bills to be introduced to the house during the present session. The committee recommended, first, that a select committee should be appointed, whose duty it would be to declare what were and what were not competing lines; and, that point having been determined, the committee further recommended that the committee of selection should provide for the consideration of the bill by disinterested gentlemen unconnected personally, or through their constituents, with the competing lines, who would decide on their comparative merits.—Mr. LABOUCHERE thought that the great difficulty would lie to find members who were entirely free from private bills in which neither they nor their constituents had any interest.—Colonel SIBTHORP moved the postponement of the consideration of the resolutions proposed. — After a general discussion the house divided—

For the resolutions	.. ..	200
Against them	.. ..	3
Majority	.. ..	—197

The resolutions were agreed to.

In reply to Mr. B. COCHRANE, Sir J. GRAHAM stated that he intended to proceed with the Factory Bill before the Poor-law Amendment Bill, and fixed Monday next for going into committee on the former.

Mr O'CONNELL having inquired if the Government intended to introduce a measure relative to Roman Catholic charities in Ireland, was informed by Sir R. PEEL that it was the intention of the Government to do so, in fulfilment of the promise contained in the royal speech.

Mr. O'CONNELL gave notice that on Monday next, of his intention to introduce a bill to alter the law relative to Roman Catholic charities and religious uses in Ireland

Mr. BOREWICK complained of the delay in carrying forward the Poor-law Amendment Bill, and censured the general neglect evinced of the interests of the labouring classes.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM was aware of the importance of the subject, but thought that the best course to be pursued with respect to the interests of the labouring classes was first to carry the Factories Bill, and then he would urge forward the Poor-law Amendment Bill; for both of which he hoped there would be ample time.

On the motion for going into a Committee of Supply, in order to consider the Army and Ordnance estimates, Mr. WILLIAMS commented on the general amount of those estimates, complaining that in reckoning the police and embodied pensioners, in addition to the regular military force, we had a standing army of no less than 163,483 men, which was upwards of 83,000 more than on an average of the last 24 years. He complained generally on the constitution of the army, and asked if we kept up so large a military force, how could Sir R. Peel fulfil his pledge of taking off the income-tax in three years. To this Sir R. Peel replied, "I made no such promise!"—Mr. WILLIAMS proposed that the estimates should be referred to a select committee.—After a few words from Sir H. HARDINGE, the amendment was withdrawn.—Mr S. CRAWFORD complained of the evils attendant upon the maintenance of so large a standing army as this country kept up, and enlarged at considerable length upon the distressed condition of the labouring classes of the community. He concluded by moving an amendment to the effect that the keeping up so large a standing army was contrary to the constitutional rights and liberties of the country.—Mr. BOWRING and Mr. FIELDEN supported the amendment, which, on a division, was negatived by a majority of 97 to 8.

The house then resolved itself into a committee, and Sir H. HARDINGE moved the army estimates, stating that the number of men required for the present year would be 100,925, exclusive of those employed in India The total number would be 129,000, and the total expense would be £5,984,020.—Mr. WILLIAMS moved that the number of men should be reduced by 25,000, being of opinion that, now that the wars in China and Affghanistan were brought to a close, there could be no necessity for keeping up so large a standing army.—Lord HOWICK could not think it advisable to venture upon such a reduction as that proposed. He supported the original motion, as did also Mr. P. Howard, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. F. Baring, Sir J. Hobhouse, &c. The committee divided, and the motion was defeated by a majority of 114 to 12. The original motion was then agreed to.

After some further progress in committee the house resumed, and the Chairman obtained leave to sit again.

The house then adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS —TUESDAY.

At four o'clock the Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Horse Racing Penalties Bill, the Offences at Sea Bill, the Metropolitan Improvements Bill, and Sang's Naturalization Bill. T e Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Buccleuch, and the Earl of Shaftesbury. Their lordships then adjourned during pleasure. The ho. se resumed at five o'clock.

The LORD CHANCELLOR presented a petition from a person of the name of Samuel Gray, who stated that he had been tried four times for the offence of shooting at an individual in Ireland, and that on the last occasion he was convicted. An objection had been raised, he said, to the peremptory challenge which he had claimed. That question came on for discussion before the Court of Queen's Bench, in Ireland, and the case was reserved for him. He now wished very much to appeal to their lordships' house against that decision. He was, however, destitute of funds necessary for the purpose, and prayed their lordships to assist him with funds. The Lord Chancellor feared that their lordships had no means of doing that.

The petition was then ordered to lie on the table.

In reply to the Marquis of Normanby, the LORD CHANCELLOR stated that when the judgment of the house had been finally pronounced in the cases of the Presbyterian Marriages Appeals, he would immediately move for the reappointment of the committee of last year, preparatory to proposing any legislative remedy.

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE put the three following questions to the Earl of Devon, relative to the commission to inquire into Irish tenant customs:—First, whether the commissioners contemplated any alteration in the laws which affected leases or covenants between landlords or tenants entered into previously to the issuing of the commission? Secondly, whether it was intended to report on the proportion which rent bore in Ireland to the value of land in various parts of Ireland; and, thirdly, whether they would report the whole of the evidence taken before the commissioners? The Earl of Devon having fully explained the progress made by the commission, declined to answer the two first questions, but, to the third, replied that it was the intention of the commission to append to their report the whole of the evidence received by them. The noble earl added that there was nothing in the proceedings of this commission which should necessarily interfere with any measures tha might be contemplated for the improvement of the condition of the unemployed population of Ireland.

On the motion of the Marquis of NORMANBY, returns relating to the appointments of stipendiary magistrates in Ireland since 1841 were ordered, and their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The house, on its formation, was summoned to the House of Peers to hear the Royal Assent given by Commission to several bills.

On the motion of Mr. WILLSHER, the Yarmouth and Norwich Railway Bill was read a second time.

On the motion of Sir W. HEATHCOTE, the Epsom and South Western Railway Bill was postponed to next Tuesday.

Several other railway bills were advanced a stage.

Mr. WARD gave notice that, after Easter, he will propose a motion, the purport of which will be to institute an inquiry into the temporalities of the Irish Established Church.

Mr. WILLIAMS then moved that no opposed business or motion shall be brought on and discussed in the house after midnight. He complained of the long hours—the after midnight legislation—the habit of members rousing down from theatres, balls, routs, and parties, and giving their votes in moments of hilarity on questions of which they knew little, and had heard less—and of the strong temptation to pass bills containing legislative jobs and blunders, when brought on for discussion at unseasonable hours. Four-fifths of the session must be passed in idle debate (at this the ministerial benches cheered lustily) —as, for instance, in the Session of 1840, when the Ministerialists, then in opposition, occupied the whole session with party discussions, for the purpose of getting place and power by a change in administration, which has produced, on the good result to the people of this country.—Mr. BROTHERTON seconded the motion.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said he could not persuade himself that he was in earnest. He felt grateful for his concern for the health of members; but that was more in danger from long speeches than late sittings; and late sittings were caused by early long speeches He recommended Mr. Williams to leave the care of the house in the hands of Mr. Brotherton, who exercised his functions with so much urbanity and discretion.—Mr. BROTHERTON was for many discussions, but short speeches, and daylight legislation, in conformity with the custom of our ancestors, and the practice of other legislative assemblies at the present day. Regretting the want of success in the object, he would yet persevere in endeavouring to confine the house to decent business hours. On a division, the motion was supported by 16, and opposed by 146.

Mr. TUFNELL then proceeded with the select committee he had moved to inquire into the cost of the Metropolitan Police force, and the manner in which the sums levied as police-rate are assessed on the different parishes within the Metropolitan Police district. His speech was full of details, illustrative of the inequality of the operation of the present system, to the principle of which, however, he was not opposed, neither did he censure the conduct of the police commissioners.—Mr. M. STOTT, on the part of the Government, opposed the motion. An annual return of the expense of the police was regularly laid before the house; and the complaints upon which Mr. Tufnell founded his motion arose from the partial operation of the police, the increase of which, since the passing of the Police Act, was extraordinary, being no less than upwards of forty-seven thousand new houses, comprehending more than seven hundred new streets, squares, and roads. He hoped that the house would not, by this appeal to the magistrates, to get its inequalities rectified, without the necessity of any interference from the house.—After a few observations from Mr. BROTHERTON, Mr. TUFNELL did not think it necessary to persist in pressing the matter to a division, and it was, therefore, negatived without one.

The Lord ADVOCATE of Scotland was then called on by the SPEAKER, to ask leave, pursuant to notice, to bring in a bill to regulate the dispensing or dividing of extensive or populous parishes, and the erecting of new parishes, in Scotland. Leave was granted, without opposition, after a very brief statement.

Lord ASHLEY then moved for a select committee to inquire into the mode of administering relief to the sick poor under the Poor-law Amendment Act, which was agreed to.

The house rose at ten minutes to seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS. —WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

On the motion of Mr. TROTTER, the Croydon Junction Railway Bill was read a first time.

The Stamford Railway Bill was read a first time.

Lord SANDON presented a petition, signed by 7000 or 8000 inhabitants of Liverpool and the neighbourhood, consumers of tobacco, for a reduction of the duties on that article from fifteen pence to nine pence per pound.—The professors in the Scottish Universities are obliged to sign a declaration of their adherence to the canons of the church—a custom confirmed by the union with that country, and praying the house to adopt some measure that would sever the connexion between the church and the universities.

Mr. PAKINGTON presented a report from the Athlone Election Committee, stating that it appeared to the committee that the charge of whose cause was understood to be Mark Quin), whose evidence was essentia. to the establishment of the case, was confined in the goal of Roscommon for debt, and that his attendance could not be procured without the interposition of the house. The committee had ordered him to report the fact to this house, in order that such steps might be taken as the house should think fit. On the motion of the honourable gentleman, it was then ordered that the said Mark Quin should attend before the committee with the above individual on the 11th of March, in order to his being examined as a witness.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice that, on Friday next, in a committee of the whole house, he should submit a proposition for the reduction of the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer also gave notice that on the same day, in committee of ways and means, he should take a vote of eight millions on account.

The house then went into committee on the County Coroner's Bill.—The several clauses, up to clause 18, were agreed to.—Clause 18 was struck out.—Upon clause 20 being proposed, Mr. CRAVEN BERKELEY moved that the clause be expunged altogether from the bill. The clause allowed 1s. a mile for travelling. Upon the suggestion of the Chairman, he moved that the additional 3d. proposed to be given be disallowed.—A discussion then took place, and the committee divided—

For the clause	.. ..	93
For the amendment	.. ..	54
Majority	.. ..	—39

The clause, after some conversation, was agreed to.—The other clauses were then disposed of, and the house resumed.—The other orders of the day were postponed, and the house adjourned at a quarter to one.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The LORD CHANCELLOR took his seat on the woolsack at the usual hour. A number of petitions were presented on the subject of the Corn laws and with regard to the union of the St. Asaph and Bangor Bishoprics.

Lord BROUGHAM said he had not had an opportunity, owing to the state of the weather, to go over the new Houses of Parliament, and therefore he should postpone the question of which he had given notice respecting them, to a future day.

After transacting some other unimportant business their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

After the Speaker took the chair, the house was occupied considerably in the reception of petitions on the subject of railways

Mr. LABOUCHERE said he had observed, in a report of a speech made by M. Guizot in the French Chambers with respect to the commercial negotiations between France and this country, that the French Government, unless M. Guizot was wholly unrepented, consider the negotiations as completely at an end. From what he had heard the right honourable baronet say of the evils of keeping the public mind in suspense, he thought he should make some similar statement to do away with uncertainty on the subject in this country. The question he had to put to the right honourable baronet was this, whether he understood it to be the declaration of M. Guizot that the commercial negotiations between France and this country were at an end, and whether he was prepared to confirm that declaration? Sir ROBERT PEEL said he had seen the most authentic report of the speech of M. Guizot in the French Chamber of Deputies—"that given in the Moniteur—and he was bound to say, that on referring to that authentic report he could not doubt that in the opinion of the French Government there was no prospect of coming to any arrangement that would improve the commercial relations between the United Kingdom and the Brazils." He said, if there was a country in the world bound to cultivate relations of amity with this country, it was Brazil. Its great coast, inferior to no part of the globe—its fertile—its unrivalled rivers by which it was watered—its population, which amounted to upwards of 7,000,000—the simple and habits of the population, producing an abundance of articles which could not be produced in this country—its want of manufactures and shipping—all those circumstances showed that England and Brazil were two countries formed to have extensive relations with each other. Our trade with Brazil was at present regulated by a commercial treaty concluded between the two countries in 1827. That treaty was one eminently favourable to this country, as the Brazilians engaged to take our manufactures and produce under this treaty at a maximum duty of 15 per cent, ad valorem. We were free on the other hand to impose any duties we pleased on the produce of Brazil. The exports of this country to the Brazils, by official accounts, on which he could place most reliance, amounted annually to £7,300,000. In the article of coffee, their exports amounted to £3,000,000 sterling a year. Sugar was the next in importance and the exports of this article amounted to £1,300,000 annually. In the remaining £3,000,000 was made up from a variety of articles, such as cotton-wool, hides, and gold; but the three most important articles were coffee, sugar, and cotton-wool. Now with regard to these countries, they had a duty on coffee, which, in effect, is quite prohibitory, and which was intended to be prohibitory. They had a duty on the articles of £300 per cent, ad valorem. On coffee they had placed a duty which, though not prohibitory, was still very heavy, amounting to £300 per cent ad valorem. The only important article which they let in from the Brazils on reasonable terms was cotton-wool. This state of things had produced results which must astonish any one who had listened to what was stated by the last speaker, viz., that while we exported direct to the Brazils a great amount of British produce, we imported and introduced into the consumption of this country a very small amount in value of the produce of Brazil in return. The whole amount of our export trade to Brazil was about two millions and a half sterling a year—it had varied a little during the last two years—last year it rallied a little, but he was sorry to say that, on the whole, a most unpromising and declining trade than an increasing one, for reasons to which he should presently advert, but it was very considerable. In 1838 the export of English manufactures to Brazil amounted to £3,000,000. In 1842 since averaged rather more than two millions and a half annually, and till the year 1842, when it fell to £1,756 000. In the last year, 1843, it had increased a little, and it still amounted to £2,140,000 annually. This was the exact amount of our exports to the Brazils. The Brazilian produce imported for consumption into this country, was small in comparison, amounting to only between three and four hundred thousand pounds. This was undoubtedly a very anomalous and unnatural state of things; and it obviously arose from the heavy duties which Brazil levied on very great disadvantages in competing with those of other countries. The consequence of the existing system was, that the merchants of this country were obliged to resort to indirect procedure. British ships carrying out a cargo of British manufactures to the ports of Brazil, could not find a cargo to bring back again. They were therefore obliged to take their cargo of sugar, coffee, or whatever it might be, to some third country, consuming on their voyage with the ships of that country, which, as they are returning home, possessed an advantage over them with respect to the expense of navigation. They were obliged to return to this country in ballast, after suffering every disadvantage in their competition with the vessels of other countries. The effect of this state of things was so obvious that he did not think it necessary to cite documents at any length to illustrate it. He had accurate statistical returns before him from the Custom-House, which he would read to the house. They would show that while our commerce had not increased, the French commerce with the Brazils had been growing at a very great ratio. He found that in the year 1837 the exports from France to Brazil were, in round numbers, twelve millions of francs. In 1840 they had grown to sixteen millions of francs. In 1841 they had risen to twenty millions. Perhaps the exports amounted to twenty millions of francs. Now, let us compare with that statement with the diminished, or rather the stationary state of our commerce with Brazil during the same period. He would now read a statement of the imports into France from the Brazils. In the year 1837, they amounted in round numbers to six millions of francs. In 1840, they had fallen to 5,000 000 francs, but in the year 1841, they had risen to 9,000 000 of francs, the amount of imports being 7,693,000 of francs. He mentioned this to show, that if they wished to support our merchants and manufacturers, who were engaged in no honourable competition with countries in every part of the globe which they carried on with the Emperor of Brazil, they ought to see that they did nothing which would subject those manufacturers and merchants to greater disadvantages than they at present laboured under. The duty in France on Brazilian excavado sugar per cwt. was 65s. In France the duty on Muscovado sugar was 20s. 8d. In Australia it was 15s. 8d. (Hear, hear.) To the Zollverein, Germany, that great mart of consumption, the duty was 15s. 8d. and that duty was 15s 8d. per cwt. on Muscovado sugar. There was no country in the world which paid a higher duty than this country—Mr. GLADSTONE contended that the duty on foreign sugar was to encourage the continuation of slavery in that country, and whatever commercial advantage might be, they could not overlook the consideration of humanity. The predilections of the present Government in May, with regard to the importation of increased quantities of sugar, had been fully realised, and the prices during the last two or three years had been lower than at any period since the abolition of negro slavery. The cause of failure in many long-standing with the Brazils was owing to the excessive demands of the Brazilian Minister, who, whenever it was coming to the discussions which had taken place in that house, or to the language held by merchants out of doors had formed an erroneous idea of the importance of their commerce. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving the motion.—Mr MILNER GIBSON supported the motion, and went into the entire subject of protective duties, which he dealt with in a clever and argumentative manner. The duties in question, he said, were, in point of fact, of advantage to the West India merchant, and would die of their own accord if they were allowed, but the Government were determined to perpetuate them by means of an Act of Parliament. He could not approve them, however, that their bill would be opposed at every stage, and in every way that the forms of the house of Commons allowed. The other speakers were Lord Sandon and Sir Robert Peel on the Ministerial side, and on the other side Mr. Bright and Lord Palmerston. The house then divided, when there appeared—

For the motion	.. ..	142
Against it	.. ..	261
Majority for Ministers ..	.. ..	119

The house then adjourned at quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock. The only business of importance was that connected with a bill brought in by Lord BROUGHAM, respecting the Law Jurisdiction of the Privy Council, and by which it is intended to create three new equity judgeships for that Court. A considerable discussion ensued amongst the law lords, which eventuated in the bill being referred to a Select Committee up stairs. Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS FRIDAY.

After the presentation of a number of petitions, Mr. HINDLEY moved the following resolution:—That any member, whose constituents are locally interested in any respecting lines of railways, may be permitted to sit and vote upon the Committee appointed to decide upon their respective merits, though without being allowed to vote upon any question arising thereon. Mr. P. BORTHWICK seconded the motion, but the motion was ultimately withdrawn.

Mr. MACAULAY had a question to put to the Right Hon. Baronet the First Lord of the Treasury, and in doing so he wished to correct a misunderstanding which had gone abroad respecting what he had said the other night, as to the late proceedings at Gwalior. He was represented to say that those proceedings were in accordance with and in pursuance of a treaty which was entered into in 1805. On the contrary, what he did say was, that the proceedings were founded upon a treaty which was notoriously annulled in 1805. The Right Hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) now prepared to answer the question he put to him yesterday?—Sir ROBERT PEEL said the treaty referred to had been received and in the course of the day the Government had received their dispatches. He had every reason to suppose that the proclamation alluded to had been sent officially with them. If the Government abroad respecting what he had said the other night, as to the disclosures, and of course he had not yet had time at present to go through them. He assumed the proclamation was there; no doubt it was. The right Hon. the Member for Cornwall (Mr. Macaulay) had declared on his own authority that the treaty of 1804 was notoriously annulled in 1805. There had been hardly time since last evening to search into the matter, but so far as he knew, there was no treaty between the Government of the Maharajah of Indie and the Government of India. There was the treaty of 1803, the treaty of 4, and the treaty of 1805. The first, that of 1803, was a general treaty for peace, that of 1804, was a treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, and stipulating that Scindia, in case of necessity, should be entitled to call on the Anglo-Indian Government for assistance; and the treaty of 1805 was made to correct the defects in the treaty of 1803, and had no reference to that of 1804. The question, therefore, arose whether the treaty of 1804 was overruled by that of MACAULAY had no wish under the circumstances to prolong the discussion. The right hon. gentleman would lay the proclamation before them, and of course was not in a position at that moment to give a distinct opinion on the question put to him.

It was order of the day for the house resolving itself into committee on the reduction of the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. being read, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said, the subject which it was his duty to submit to the house, was one which would be acknowledged by every one to be of considerable importance. It involved the dealing with a large amount of the public debt; it also calculated to produce a great annual saving to the country which the public incurred on account of that debt; and if the house should agree to the plan which it would tend, in his opinion, to raise the character and the power of this country by evincing the extent of its great resources, and our determination to discharge with honour the national debt. (Cheers.) The alteration which he was about to recommend to the house was one dealing with a large amount of debt—an amount of debt absolutely larger than that with which any House of Parliament was ever before called upon to deal. It was no less—for only a few hundred pounds less—than 250 millions of the national debt. The evidence of the abundance of money was to be found in the price which securities bore at present; and it was notorious that the holders of Consols at par would be receiving little more than £3 1s. per cent., and upon Exchequer Bills little more than £2 4s. per cent. He was happy to say that happy was he to pay so just a tribute to the House of Commons he was now addressing—he was happy to say that by their exertions in the year 1842—by their economy, foresight, and determination—they had been able to place the revenue of the country on a footing to meet the exigencies of the service. They had now got a revenue more than equal to their expenditure, and they were thereby enabled to reap the advantages which a firm adherence to a principle of that nature was ever sure to give—and thus realise to the country the benefit not merely of a temporary reduction of a few taxes, but of the permanent obligations of the state. Looking, therefore, at the growing wealth of this country, looking at its capital, considering its vast resources, looking at the continuance of the most friendly relations with foreign powers, considering that the revenue had recovered from the temporary difficulty under which it laboured, considering that we are free from unfunded and floating debt, I think that I have made out a case to this house to shew that the time has arrived when those who have the management of the financial affairs of the country should make an attempt to reduce the interest on the National Debt. The debt we have to deal with on this occasion amounts to nearly £250,000,000, and consists of four several kinds of stock. The first is the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Stock, originally created in 1818, which is the foundation of stock of this description, and amounts to £140,000 000. The next is the Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cents., being a stock which was first established in the year 1726, originally as a Four per Cent. Stock, added to at various periods, and reduced to Three-and-a-Half per Cent in 1834, when Lord RIPON was Chancellor of the Exchequer. It amounted to £66,000,000. The next is the Three-and-a-Half per Cents., originally founded in 1784, at 5 per cent., and which has, in the gradual progress of the country, the growth of capital, and confidence in our resources, had undergone two several reductions—one in 1822, when Mr. VANSITTART was Chancellor of the Exchequer, from 5 per cent. to 4, and the other in 1830, when I had the honour of holding the office I now fill, and when it was reduced to 3½ per cent., at which it has ever since remained. The last stock is the one called the Old Three-and-a-Half per Cents, which was an Irish stock created in 1757, and had been from time to time augmented by the sum of £1,500,000. The whole amount of these stocks was £249,500,000, or, in round numbers, nearly the amount I at first stated. Now it must, certainly, have been legally correct to have dealt separately with these separate branches of the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. stocks; but I conceived that this course, though legally correct, would be essentially unjust. I thought it would not be becoming in a great country like this to take advantage of one or two particular branches of stock being of small amount, and to call on the proprietors who have invested their money in these funds to submit to a reduction, which, from their being small in number, they could not resist. I have, therefore, recommended that the same rule should be applied to all these stocks, and that the reduction of interest shall be made at once upon the whole of them. After a few more observations, the resolutions were read and agreed to, amidst cheers from both sides of the house.

The house afterwards went into a Committee of Supply on the Army Estimates, which occupied the remainder of the evening.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—NEWCASTLE.

(Before Mr. Baron Rolfe.)

ARSON.—William Cranson was indicted for having, on the 27th of September last, at Morpeth, set fire to a hay-stack, the property of W. Woodman. Mr. Otter and Mr. Addison conducted the prosecution; the prisoner was defended by Mr. Wilkins. It appeared that the prisoner at the bar was a person of respectable connexions, had undergone two several reductions—one in 1822, when Mr. Vansittart was Chancellor of the Exchequer, from 5 per cent. to 4, and the other in 1830, when I had the honour of holding the office I now fill, and when it was reduced to 3½ per cent., at which it has ever since remained. NORTHERN CIRCUIT.—NEWCASTLE.

(Before Mr. Baron Rolfe.)

ARSON.—William Cranson was indicted for having, on the 27th of September last, at Morpeth, set fire to a hay-stack, the property of W. Woodman. Mr. Otter and Mr. Addison conducted the prosecution; the prisoner was defended by Mr. Wilkins. It appeared that the prisoner at the bar was a person of respectable connexions at Morpeth, but that he had, as indeed his appearance testified, given himself up to a course of the lowest companions, loitering about the various public-houses until the owners would no longer permit him to remain, and then frequently passing the remainder of the night in any temporary shelter that chance might offer After he committed to goal, he made a full confession of the mode in which he had effected the conflagration in question to a fellow-prisoner, who was himself an approver, and evidence was given of the prisoner having frequently threatened the prosecutor, with whom he had a feud of a long standing. The jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," and his lordship, in a very impressive address, sentenced him to be transported for twenty years.

HOME CIRCUIT—CHELMSFORD.

On Tuesday morning both Courts proceeded to business, the Lord Chief Justice presiding in the Crown court, and Mr. Baron Alderson at nisi prius. Although there appeared to be a number of cases standing for trial, very few of them being referred, and others breaking down, the list was gone through by one o'clock, and Mr. Baron Alderson then proceeded to try prisoners in relief of the business of the Crown Court.

(Before Lord Chief Justice Denman.)

Michael Challis, aged 19, a groom, was indicted for feloniously setting fire to an outhouse, the property of Samuel Porter Matthews. Mr. Marsh conducted the prosecution. It appeared that on the alarm being given, the prisoner was seen running in a direction from the fire. The circumstances which led to the suspicion against the prisoner were the contradictory stories that he told, and after the fact that a piece of linen, which the prisoner made use of to cover his harness, was found to have a portion torn from it, and this piece nearly burnt and wrapped round some dry combustible material, was picked up near the outhouse that was burnt. The Lord Chief Justice went carefully through the whole of the evidence, and the jury, after a very short deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty. The prisoner was sentenced to be transported for fifteen years, and he left the dock declaring that he was innocent.

(Before Mr. Baron Alderson.)

Thomas Moore, thirty, labourer, was indicted for firing two stacks of hay, the property of Maurice William Bird. Mr. Baron Alderson went through the whole of the evidence, commenting upon the different facts as he proceeded, and the jury, after some deliberation, returned a verdict of "Guilty." The learned judge sentenced the prisoner to be transported for life.

OXFORD CIRCUIT.

The business at Oxford was brought to a close on Tuesday evening, when their lordships proceeded to Aylesbury, the seat of the Duke of Marlborough, on their way to Worcester, where the business was opened on Wednesday.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The March sessions of the Central Criminal Court commenced on Monday morning before the Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, the Recorder, Mr. Alderman Farncombe, and other civic authorities. When the names of those summoned on the grand jury were called over, several gentlemen claimed to be excused on various grounds. Amongst those was Mr. Simon Bligh Bligh, who claimed to be excused on the ground that he held the offices of secretary and clerk to the great seal in Ireland. The Lord Mayor, and therefore if he was obliged to attend the court, religious service would be suspended, and the children's education neglected, as the arrangement of all those matters was left to him as manager of the house. (Laughter.) You have not stated any legal ground of exemption in Mr. Oppenheim: To-day and to-morrow are holidays with the Jews—therefore I hope to be excused.—The Recorder: Your office appears to me somewhat similar to that of justice of the peace, which could not be pleaded as a legal ground for exemption; but under the circumstances the Court will excuse you. The Grand Jury having been sworn, the Recorder addressed them on the character of the calendar, which he said was unusually light.

THE QUEEN ON THE PROSECUTION OF LORD WILLIAM PAGET v. HOLT.

This was an indictment against the defendant, Thomas Holt, the registered proprietor of the Age newspaper, for a libel upon Lord William Paget. The defendant, who is already undergoing a sentence passed upon him in the Court of Queen's Bench for a similar offence against the Duke of Brunswick, was brought up by habeas corpus. Mr. Thompson and Mr. Doane conducted the prosecution; and Mr. Wordsworth, with Mr. Wilkins, appeared for the defendant. Lord William Paget was the principal witness for the prosecution, and after an opening and ingenious address on behalf of the defendant, the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty." The Recorder said he understood the defendant was already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment. Mr. Doane said no was, and for the purpose of the present description. The Recorder then said he should remand the defendant to the same custody from which he came, and that he would confer with the judges upon the subject of the sentence. If he were to pass a fresh sentence upon him at this time, it would have the effect of removing him from the custody in which he then was. The defendant was then removed in custody.

On Tuesday, Henry Janes and William Christie, who pleaded guilty to a indictment for misdemeanour, arising out of the Custom-house frauds, were placed at the bar to receive judgment. Mr Justice Patteson addressed the prisoners. It appeared from the written confession of Janes, that he had been induced by Christie, to whom he owed some money, to join him in executing those frauds. But still it should be recollected that he occupied a place of trust; and, on carefully balancing into the circumstances, it did not appear that there was any material difference between the guilt of the prisoners. The sentence upon them was, that they should be severally imprisoned and kept to hard labour for the term of one year.—There was another indictment for conspiracy against the prisoners, with James Christie, but it was soon proceeded, and two other indictments, one for forgery and another for fraud, were also abandoned.

BREAKING AND ROBBING A DWELLING-HOUSE PLEADED IN DEFENCE OF ALIBI.—Benjamin Law, aged 21, and James Dunn, 23, were convicted, on clear evidence, of feloniously breaking and entering the dwelling-house of James Leggett, and stealing a desk, a looking-glass, and other articles, value £5, his property. Mr. Ballantine conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Horry the defence.—An alibi was set up for the prisoners, but such was the nature of the evidence, and the manner of the witnesses, especially the father of Dunn, that the jury were disposed not to hear it concluded.—Mr. Ballantine, in replying, made some very severe and pointed allusions to the mode in which these defences of alibi were produced, and which, he said, was to the neighbourhood of the court. He wished, for the sake of the unfortunate prisoners themselves, that these persons should be exposed and punished; for the prisoners were frequently ignorant of the defence until they heard it for the first time in the court.—The Recorder said he would deal most severely with any person who would be proved to have concocted one of those alibis, which were masses of horrible perjury. No learned counsel should take a brief without knowing from whom he received it, and without a name of some responsible individual being endorsed upon it.—After a long altercation between the learned counsel, the Recorder repeated his observations with increased force. He then sentenced Dunn to ten years' transportation, and Law to six months' imprisonment.

NEW COURT.

(Before the Common Sergeant.)

Isaac Cohen was convicted of stealing a pocket-handkerchief from the person of a man unknown. Mr. Ballantine defended the prisoner, and, in the course of his cross-examination of the principal witness, a policeman, he elicited some facts which appeared to implicate Mr. Brand, the marshalman, and some of the police. It appeared that the prisoner had been brought up at the Mansion-house, on a charge of stealing a silver snuff-box and other articles, and he asserted that he had sold the duplicates of these articles to the marshalman, and a constable, named Child, could exhibit he was in custody. The Common Sergeant and Mr. Alderman Humphery said that the case must be sifted closely. The marshalman and Child were sent for; and shortly afterwards a message was received from the Lord Mayor (who had previously investigated the charge) that he sent the marshalman, of whose integrity he had satisfied himself, the constable Child should be sent as soon as possible. The marshalman was then questioned. He said that the prisoner had represented to him that his wife was confined, and had not even bread to eat. He (the marshalman) got him some money, to relieve his own and his wife's wants, and he did so out of pure charity. The prisoner then gave him the duplicates. The court and jury appeared quite satisfied with the explanation. The prisoner was then called on, and, without having been given of his previous conviction and imprisonment for eighteen months, and several other previous convictions, he was sentenced to the Common Sergeant sentenced him to ten years' transportation. (We have no doubt whatever of the marshalman's benevolent disposition, but he might find much more deserving objects than notorious thieves for its display; and the less constables and others have to do with the transfer of property of this kind the better will it be for their reputation. ED. I. L. N.)

On Wednesday, Joel Barnett, aged twenty-two, hawker, was charged with stealing three pieces of exchequer, value £89 2s. 2d., the property of Saul Yates, in his dwelling-house. Mr. Clarkson conducted the prosecution. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Wilkins. Mr. Justice Patteson summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," but strongly recommended the prisoner to mercy, under the impression that he had been merely an instrument in the hands of some other parties. The prosecutor begged to join in the recommendation last week for a situation. He received an answer to this advertisement; and the writer, who signed himself "W. Thompson," arranged an interview with him for Thursday last, at Woodhouse's Coffee-house, King-street, Westminster, to settle the appointment, and after some conversation with this Mr. Thompson, who said he was a merchant, and that his offices were in Philpot-lane, an engagement was eventually entered into, the advertiser being told that his primary duty would be to collect money from the customers. An appointment was made with him to meet him next morning at the Gun Tavern, in Pimlico, on Monday, when he was to be immediately set to work. On Monday morning he met Mr. Thompson at the place named, and received from him a letter directed to Mr. Smith, of the Three Nuns, Aldgate, with orders to return as soon as possible, and meet his master at Elliot's Brewery, in Pimlico. The last time he saw the Three Nuns, but no Mr. Smith was known there, and he left the letter with the waiter. As soon as he got to Elliott's Brewery he met Thompson coming out of the yard, who gave him a cheque for £6760 9s. 10d., on Messrs. Elliott, Barnett, and Co., of Bond-street, telling him to get the cheque cashed in large notes and sixty sovereigns, and to return to the yard to Ship, Charing-cross, and there wait with it until he came. The lad went to the banking-house, and in presenting the cheque, which purported to be drawn by Messrs. Elliot and Co., in favour of Mr. Thompson, he was told where he brought it from; and in obedience to the directions he had received, he replied to them, he mentioned that he was to take the notes and gold there and there wait for his master. After a short delay the cheque was paid, and the lad went away with the money, and proceeded at the Ship two hours, he became uneasy, and he went back to the brewery to know whether Mr. Thompson was still there. He was informed by one of the men in the yard that Mr. Thompson was not known there. The lad then returned to the Ship, and soon afterwards a police constable, and a person from the banking-house, came in, and asked him what he had done with the money. He said he had the sum still in his possession, his employer having not yet made his appearance. He was taken into custody, and the entire amount delivered up. The lad related his story, and his statement obtained credit. In corroboration of a portion of it, the person to whom he had spoken about Mr. Thompson in Messrs. Elliott's yard came forward, and said he recollected that such an inquiry had been made about the time named. A clerk from Messrs Elliott's said the cheque exhibited a double forgery, for the first was the imitation of a handwriting, and the signature was an imitation of his employer's. Mr. Marten, one of the banking firm, produced the cheque, which it appeared, had, in the first instance, created some doubt, but was changed into gold on the usual inquiry, after the lad had gone away with the money. As the lad had mentioned where he was to take the cash, an officer was instantly despatched there, in time to regain possession of it. Inspector Pearce and the officer who had's friends at Croydon, and he was satisfied of their respectability, and that the lad was an innocent instrument by which the fraud was attempted to be perpetrated. From the lad's statement, and from the corroborative circumstances, it was clear that he had been made a dupe, and had been solicited by this Thompson, because his country appearance would stand a better chance of disarming suspicion. Mr. Maltby was quite satisfied of the lad's innocence, and he should only require him to enter into bail, because his future appearance might be essential to attain the ends of justice. The lad was remanded to procure the attendance of his father, whose bail it was understood would be accepted.

QUEEN-SQUARE.—Mr. John Grover, of Belgrave-street, Belgrave-square, surveyor, who has been in custody some days, charged with having defrauded Mr. J. Grant, of 66, Lower Belgrave-place, of a large sum of money, was again brought up. Several other charges of a like nature were preferred against the author of the magistrate, Mr. Burrell said he should not entertain any new charges; he was unwilling to prejudice the other case, in which he had considered it his duty to send the prisoner before a jury. He consented to take bail for £200 for the prisoner's appearance at the Central Criminal Court, but there being no sureties in attendance, he was locked up.

THAMES OFFICE.—William Jackson, a notorious thief, was charged with breaking into the brig Rapid, lying of Hanover-hole Tier, Rotherhithe, and stealing the wearing apparel of two seamen. Some of the stolen property was found in the prisoner's possession. He was committed for trial.

MARYLEBONE.—Ellen Herbert, a woman about sixty years of age and completely deaf, residing at West-end, Hampstead, was charged at Marylebone with attempting to drown herself. Her husband had been supported for seven months' imprisonment for stealing. Prisoner had no means of supporting her family, and, under the circumstances, resolved on self-destruction. The police were directed to make the case known to the officers of Hampstead parish.

LAMBETH-STREET A GANG OF INGENIOUS PLUNDERERS. Mary Proctor, Jane Proctor, Sarah Proctor, John Melson, John Purday, Thomas Payne, were brought before Mr. Norton for further examination, on a charge of defrauding various persons out of property amounting in the aggregate to above £300. A great many more are less than thirteen cases involving the whole of the prisoners, and in all those that have been examined the case was similar. On finding out by advertisement or otherwise, where property of a particular description was to be disposed of, one of the party, in the dress and character of a groom, called upon the owner, and, after some pre-arranged, formed its owner it was such as his master was in want of. He also informed the person he waited upon that his master was a wine or woollen merchant, and a person of considerable property, and that he had no doubt he would give more for the articles for sale than the price fixed upon by themselves. By this means the parties were thrown off their guard, and the confederate, after making the purchase, and sending the property out of the way, generally managed to give a bill payable at seven days after date for the amount, to within a pound or ten shillings. This latter amount was generally paid in cash, and a receipt required as part payment, and out of this the person who acted as the groom or servant managed to get a per centage or present for himself. The most distressing part of the system is, that the prisoners have directed and confined their plunder to poor and needy persons, so that their practices have driven several of their dupes to absolute beggary. The prisoners were again remanded.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—REMARKABLE CASE OF FORGERY.—A good deal of interest was excited on Tuesday morning in consequence of an attempt to obtain a large sum of exchequer, value £89 2s. 2d., the property of Saul Yates, in his dwelling-house. Mr. Clarkson conducted the prosecution. The prisoner was defended by Mr. Wilkins. Mr. Justice Patteson summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of "Guilty," but strongly recommended the prisoner to mercy, under the impression that he had been merely an instrument in the hands of some other parties. AFFAIRS OF SPAIN.

CARTHAGENA.

CARTHAGENA.

During the past week intelligence has been received from Spain, stating the inhabitants of Carthagena to have already taken an active part in the insurrection; so that the place has become of interest akin to that of Alicant, engraved in our paper of last week. We subjoin the heads of the intelligence:—The Corréponsal announces that the bombardment of Alicant commenced on the 17th. The blockading force assembled before Carthagena consisted of 6000 National Guards and 4000 soldiers of the line. The Consuls of England and France in that city repaired to Murcia on the 17th, and left again for Carthagena on the 18th. It was believed that they had come to offer terms of submission on the part of the insurgents. The Junta of Carthagena published a bando on the 18th, declaring the town and province in a state of siege, and ordering all the inhabitants who did not belong to the militia to surrender their arms. An attempt had been made by the English and French Consuls to bring about an accommodation between the Junta of Carthagena and the Government, but the insurgents would not listen to any terms. The Queen's troops, to the number of 4000, were posted about half a league from Carthagena.

The Bulletin of the 19th, publishes a bando of the Junta, dated the 18th, declaring the approach of the besieging forces from Madrid and Carthagena in a "state of war," with the formation of a permanent council for the investigation of offences; ordering the surrender of arms from all who do not pertain to the militia, the illumination of houses on the alarm of an attack, &c.

General Roncali has threatened to march upon Carthagena at the head of his entire force. The Corréponsal mentions that General Concha had obtained possession of the Castle of San Julian, one of the outworks of Carthagena.

Our view of Carthagena is from Mr. Allan's "Tour." It has a spacious natural harbour, the entrance being between lofty rocky hills protected by several batteries. The town, exactly facing the sea, is built at the foot of a sandstone eminence, on which stands an old castle. The town hall and hospital are conspicuous objects, and built on a fortified quay, commanding the port. The arsenal is to the left of the town. The houses have an air of bygone magnificence and solidity, but are rapidly falling to ruins, as are likewise the arsenal and dockyard.

In the annexed column we give a portrait of Queen Maria Christina, whose return from Paris to Spain is now an event of considerable interest. The ex-Queen reached Perpignan on the 26th ult. The day before she was waited upon, at Narbonne, by Baron de Meer, who, after a long conversation with her Majesty, immediately returned to Barcelona.

Accounts from Madrid, of the 27th ult., state that the Minister of Justice had left on that day for Valencia, at the request of the Queen, to receive Maria Christina. He was the bearer of an autograph letter from the young Queen to her august mother, and was accompanied by Messrs. Fernando Alvarez and Domingo Moreno, two officers of his ministry, and M. Salvador Bermudez de Castro, Secretary of the Council of Ministers.

The Moniteur publishes the following telegraphic despatch:—

"PERPIGNAN, March 2

"Queen Christina was well received at Girona; all the houses were decorated with flags. Her Majesty was to have left to-day for Mataco."

CAMPEACHY.

CAMPEACHY.

By intelligence just received from the United States, we perceive that the Mexican steam-ship Montezuma left Vera Cruz on the 26th of Feb. for Campeachy, having on board the Yucatan Commissioners. It is now positively stated that all the difficulties between the revolted province and the Central Government have been amicably settled.

During the last twelve months, Campeachy has been a place of considerable interest. It lies on that portion of the Gulf of Mexico which is sometimes called the Bay of Campeachy, but more appropriately the Bay of Vera Cruz. The town contains about 18,000 inhabitants, and is defended by a fort; the streets are narrow, but the houses are somewhat tasteful, and some of the public buildings are ornamented and painted. The convent is a huge mass of stone and mortar; the walls of which bear the marks of the balls from the cannon of the besiegers of 1840, when the government troops fired upon the town. The cannonading was continued three days, but without doing much execution. The city, however, capitulated for want of ammunition and supplies.

Among the stipulations of privilege accorded to Yucatan in the recent adjustment of her difficulties with Mexico, which resulted in reuniting her to the body of the Mexican republic, was that of ordering her internal government as may suit her own well-being and interests, but without prejudice to those of the other departments; and of nominating to the governor of the department, persons for her own civil officers, among whom the governor shall choose.

Yucatan submits to the authority of the republic in ecclesiastical matters. She is exempt from federal imposts and contributions.

She is privileged to regulate her own duties on foreign goods, conformably to existing treaties of the nation; but cannot import nor export foreign goods from or to the other departments, except under the same prohibition of duties and forfeitures as by law established. She may use no banner but the national, and shall maintain the armed vessels necessary for defence and preventive service, whose commanders shall be commissioned by the Mexican President on the recommendation of the governor of the department.

Yucatan is to send her deputies to the General Congress to form the Senate; shall vote in the manner fixed by the constitution; concurring also in the choice of the officers of the Government.

CHRISTINA, EX-QUEEN OF SPAIN.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Londonderry are still detained at Paris, as the recovery of their daughter Lady Alexander Vane, from the effects of severe scarlet fever, is very slow and protracted. We hear the rest of the family are in good health.

DEATH OF THE DOWAGER COUNTESS BEAUCHAMP.—Her Ladyship died on Saturday morning, at her mansion in St James's-square, at an advanced age. She was relict of William Lygon, first Earl Beauchamp, and only daughter of James Denn, Esq., and by that Noble Earl, who died 21st October, 1816, her Ladyship had issue nine children, including the late and present Earl Beauchamp the Hon. Major-General Henry B. Lygon, the Hon. Major-General Edw. P. Lygon, the Countess of Longford, and Lady Louisa Lygon.

PRINTERS' PENSION SOCIETY.—The annual meeting of this society was held on Monday, at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of transacting the usual annual business, and electing six pensioners upon the funds, Mr. Richard Taylor in the chair. The report stated that the prospects of the society were encouraging, for, although a diminution had taken place in the amount of the annual subscriptions, they had been more than counterbalanced by an increase of life subscriptions, by which the society had fully met all demands, and also added £300 to its funded stock. The total receipts of the year were £1352 9s., and the disbursements £1185 6s. 7d., leaving a balance in favour of the society of £168 2s 5d.

SONS OF THE CLERGY.—There will be no grand performance this year in the body of St. Paul's Cathedral, as has been the custom for a century past. Objections having been made to the erection of scaffolding, which interrupted the daily service, the Archbishop of Canterbury, acting under the advice of the Bishop of London, has decided that the festival is to be confined to the performance of one of the old services, with some increase of the choir.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE.—We are happy to hear that the Noble Earl continues to improve in health. His Lordship has, within the last week, regained strength, and hopes are fully entertained of his ultimate recovery, although it will probably be some weeks before he can be pronounced convalescent.

PROJECTED ALLIANCES.—Miss Worsley Holmes, who is understood to be affianced to Lord Alexander George Russell, of the Rifle Brigade, ninth surviving son of the late and brother to the present Duke of Bedford, is sister to the Hon. Mrs. A'Court Holmes, of Westover House, Isle of Wight, and daughter and co-heiress of the late Sir Howard Worsley Holmes. A matrimonial alliance is on the tapis between the Duke de Glucksberg, chargé d'affaires at Madrid, and Mdlle. Lefori.

CAPTAIN CARNEGIE, M.P. FOR STAFFORD.—The Hon. Captain Carnegie has been prevented from returning to England and taking his place in the House of Commons by a serious attack of Syrian fever. The Gallant Captain had arrived at Malta on his way home, in order to be present at the opening of Parliament. The last account states him to be convalescent, but unable to take a sea voyage.

DEATH OF SIR FRANCIS WALKER DRUMMOND, BART.—We deeply regret to announce the death of Sir Francis Walker Drummond, of Hawthornden, Bart., which took place at his house of Midfield, on Thursday evening last. He had been long labouring under disease of the heart. He is succeeded in his title and estates by his son, Captain James Walker Drummond, of the Grenadier Guards.

DEATH OF MR. SERGEANT BOMPAS.—Mr. Sergeant Bompas died on Thursday, after a short illness, at his house in Park-road, Regent's Park, aged 53. He was for many years a leading counsel on the Western Circuit, having been called to the bar in November, 1815, and was made a sergeant in 1827. He was considered an able lawyer in criminal matters, common law, and in questions affecting real property. Mr. Sergeant Bompas was much respected in the profession, and possessed for years a very good practice.

LIBERATION OF BEAN.—This individual, who, it will be remembered, was taken into custody for attempting to annoy her Majesty by presenting a pistol at her Majesty's carriage, as she was taking an airing in St. James's Park, and for which he was tried at the Central Criminal Court, Old Bailey, and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment in the Millbank Penitentiary, was liberated on Saturday last, the term for which he was incarcerated having expired.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN MANCHESTER.

The most extensive and destructive conflagration with which Manchester has been visited for some years broke out shortly after 6 o'clock in George-street, in that town, on the morning of Saturday last. It appears that about the hour mentioned, smoke and some flame were discovered by some joiners and other persons in the ending and mending room in the basement story of Mr. W. Bryan's warehouse, No. 9, George-street. The alarm was quickly spread; and, before much time had elapsed, Mr. Rose, superintendent of the fire police, all the eight Manchester engines, and one of the Salford engines, were on the spot.

When Mr. Rose arrived, the flames were rushing out of the windows of the warehouse of Messrs. Nelson, Knowles, and Co.; and they had also extended to the back of a pile of buildings in Pine-street. Four of the engines were got into working order within ten minutes of their arrival; but, although there were crowds assembled, the terrific appearance of the flames by this time deterred men from volunteering to work the engines; and Mr. Rose found it necessary to send to the police-office for the soldiers to take this duty.

RUINS OF THE GREAT FIRE AT MANCHESTER.

There was a fresh breeze (west by south), which carried the flames towards York-street, and the whole of the great pile or block of buildings in which the fire originated was speedily enveloped in flames. The rapidity of the conflagration was the result of the construction of these warehouses, which were built only a few years ago. All the outer walls, and, indeed, most of the walls of the various floors, were lined inside with wood; every warehouse had its well-hole, and the whole were too much connected in the attic stories and roofs; so that when the fire reached the top of one warehouse, to which it speedily ascended by the well-hole, having made its way to the timber of the roof, it was carried by the breeze, like wild-fire, along the whole range.

At eleven o'clock all danger to the surrounding property was at an end. The flames were then quite subdued; and the workmen were engaged in pulling down such portions of the walls as, from their warped state, threatened to fall. At the lowest computation, including both the buildings and the stocks which have been consumed, there cannot be a less amount of property destroyed than to the extent of £100,000.

The block of buildings thus destroyed, is bounded on the northern end by York-street, on the western side by George-street, on the eastern side by Pine-street, and on the southern side by Chain-street and St. James's-churchyard. This block of warehouses was about sixty yards (twenty-four windows) in length, by forty yards (thirteen windows) in width, and was of uniform height, comprising seven stories above the ground of the basement story.

We have abridged these details of the catastrophe from the Liverpool Albion. The annexed sketch shows the ruins, as they appeared on the morning after the fire.

THE ARMOURY OF THE UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION.

THE UNITED SERVICE INSTITUTION.

On Saturday, the thirteenth annual meeting of this interesting and flourishing institution took place in the Armoury of their establishment, Scotland-yard. There was a large number of officers of both arms of the service present, amongst whom we noticed Majors Lambert and Evans, Colonels Alcock, Stanhope, and Gascoigne, Commissary General Heirson, Sir Frederick Nicholson, Sir Benjamin Smith, Major Clarke, &c. Captain Smith, R.N., in the absence of Captain Lord Prudhoe, took the chair, and, at his request, Mr. Turner read the report of the council, by which it appeared that the funded property of the institution amounted to £6700 Three per Cent. Consols. The number of members reported at last year's meeting was 4142, and that since then there had been an accession of 155 new members. The total number now was only 4095, in consequence of 137 deaths, and 75 withdrawals. The number of visitors last year was 28,000. The annual subscriptions amounted to £1400, while, adding to it £210, the interest of the funded capital, made the annual income £1601. The estimated expenditure for the current year was £1235 4s. The council had expended last year £237 in books, and especially referred to a donation of Chinese arms and implements, from Commander Hall, late of the Nemesis. The report having been put from the chair, was unanimously adopted. The gallant chairman then congratulated the meeting on the success of the institution; and, in conclusion, mentioned that the ensuing course of lectures would commence next month.

The United Service Institution was formed about twelve years since, and consists of a naval and military library and museum, as a central depository for objects of professional art, science, and natural history; and for books and documents, the delivery of lectures, &c. The museum and library are continually enriched by donations from distinguished members of the services; and a report of these presentations is published quarterly. The establishment is supported by annual subscriptions of 10s., and the public are admitted to the museum gratuitously, by tickets obtainable of any member. The principal apartments of the Institution are as follow:—

The Entrance Hall is chiefly hung with Chinese trophies, presented principally by Sir Edward Belcher and Captain W. H. Hall, of the Nemesis. Amongst them are two of the pendents of yellow silk with the Imperial Dragon; also chain-shot formed of two hollow hemispheres of iron, fitted together with a chain, which is not the case with the chain-shot used in our service.

On the left is the Library, containing a very valuable collection of naval and military works, and books of general information; and the apartment is ornamented with a bust of King William IV., by Chantrey.

On the right is the Model-room: in the centre is a very beautiful model of H.M.S. Cornwallis, built of teak-wood in India, by the son of Jemsetjee, the Indian shipwright. This model was constructed simultaneously with the ship, corresponding timbers being laid in each. Here also are a model of the entrenched camp, with Prince Maximilian's Towers, so graphically described in Kohl's "Austria;" and an ancient gun, from the wreck of the Mary Rose.

On the first floor is The Armoury, represented in our engraving; its arrangement is very tasteful. It is very deficient in plate armour; but the glittering points of bayonets and spears of every clime and age produce a pleasing effect; and the whole is ornamented by two elegant stars formed of arrows. Between the windows is a chronological series of fire-arms, from the time of James II. to George and William IV. Here, too, are a sulphur cast of a French shield of the time of Francis I.; a steel cross-bow, of the time of Henry VIII.; a group of ancient swords, three of them two-handed, one with a saw-edge. These, however, are but a few of the interesting specimens to be seen in the Armoury.

Upon the same floor is the Natural History Room, containing a valuable collection of minerals, presented by Capt. W. H. Smyth, and the Royal Staff Corps, together with a polar bear and wolf, shot by Sir George Back; and the skeleton of Marengo, the favourite horse which Napoleon rode at the Battle of Waterloo.

The upper story contains miscellaneous articles of ethnological interest; and a few antique specimens, Greek, Roman, and Egyptian.

Altogether, this institution presents one of the most rational and amusing exhibitions of the metropolis; and the courtesy of the Society in permitting its inspection gratuitously, is a valuable boon to the intellectual public.

NOTTINGHAM MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

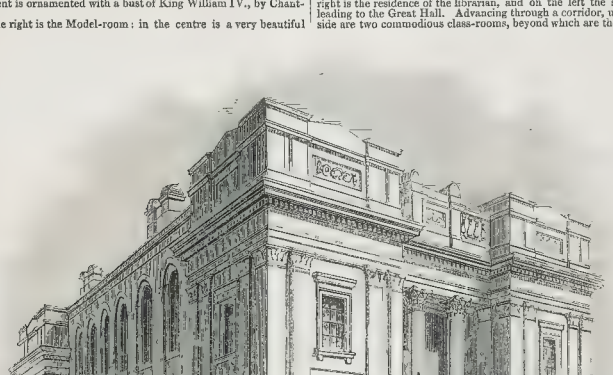
This handsome structure, of truly classic design, is now nearly completed for the accommodation of the members of the Mechanics' Institute, at Nottingham. The architect is Mr. Robert Jalland, of the Middle Pavement.

The engraving shows the principal front and side elevations, in handsome Grecian style. The capitals of the columns are Corinthian, from the Temple of Vesta, at Tivoli; and the pilaster caps, with the panels and terminals of the attic, are of enriched design. The external dimensions of the edifice are 124 feet long, and 61 feet extreme width.

By reference to the plan, we find the accommodation for the Institute to be very complete. Entering beneath the portico, upon the right is the residence of the librarian, and on the left the stair-case leading to the Great Hall. Advancing through a corridor, upon each side are two commodious class-rooms, beyond which are the Library 12 by 26 feet, and the Natural History Gallery, 50 by 19 feet 6 inches, with the apartment of the curator, and at each angle a staircase.

The one-pair is almost entirely occupied by a noble Hall, 80 by 45 feet, and 30 feet high, with an orchestra and platform. Under the orchestra is an upper gallery for natural history, 30 feet long, 8 feet 6 inches wide, and 12 feet high: also, a committee-room, apparatus-room, music library, &c.

The entire edifice is alike highly creditable to the taste of the architect, and the intellectual enterprise of Nottingham.



THE NOTTINGHAM MECHANICS' INSTITUTE.

SILVER CUP.

This elegant cup has been presented to the gallant officer, by whose timely aid several valuable lives were saved from the wreck of the Elberfeld steam-ship, detailed in our paper of last week. The cup bears the following inscription:—

CUP PRESENTED TO THE CAPTAIN OF "THE CHARLOTTE."

"Presented to Captain Richard Muys, of the smack Charlotte, as a tribute for his humanity in preserving the lives of Capt. R. Stranack, and Mr. William Bush, civil engineer, and part of the crew of the German iron-steamer Elberfeld, which was lost on the evening of Thursday, the 22nd of February, 1844, in the North Sea, about thirty miles eastward of the North Foreland Lighthouse, upon her passage to the port of London, and for his urbanity and benevolence evinced on so trying an occasion."

CHAIR PRESENTED TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.

This elegant little arm-chair is manufactured of English oak grown in Norfolk; beautifully veined, and highly polished by friction. The frame-work is elaborately carved; on the upper part of the back are a lion's head, coronets, the rose and the thistle, and entwined oak branches. The front legs rest on lion's paws, each grasping a ball. The cushion is of needle-work, and displays, on a buff ground, the royal arms, richly emblazoned, inclosed in the Garter and motto, surrounded with a highly-wrought wreath of oak-leaves and acorns. A beautiful wreath of flowers embellishes the edge of the cushion, finished above with blue and silver gimp. On the back is the Prince of Wales's plume and motto, surmounted with an ornamental shell and scroll; beneath are roses and lilies.

CHAIR PRESENTED TO THE PRINCE OF WALES

This elaborate piece of workmanship is the produce of the factory of Mr. Carse, upholsterer, of Lynn, under whose direction and superintendence it was manufactured for Mrs Paul, widow of the late Dr. Paul, whose needle-work adorns this unique and elegant chair, which is, altogether, a splendid specimen of English skill and labour. It has been presented to her Majesty the Queen, and has been "most graciously accepted."

THAMES TUNNEL.—The annual general assembly of proprietors of the Thames Tunnel, was held on Tuesday at the London Tavern. Mr. B. Hawes presided. The chairman stated that the number of persons that had visited the tunnel since the opening was upwards of two millions. The total receipts for the nine months amounted to £8129, and the expenditure to £4951. One item of reduction was in the amount paid to the directors. Some time ago £1000 a year was voted to them; that sum the directors reduced to £500, and last year they curtailed it to £350; the ensuing year it would be £200, and if there should be the slightest objection to that amount, the directors would be ready to do as they had formerly done for a period of ten years, to employ themselves in the service of the proprietors without any emolument. Mr. Lancashire inquired whether there was any prospect of a dividend (Laughter). The Chairman said this very much depended upon whether the government continued to require the whole of the interest of the money they had advanced upon the undertaking. Perhaps government, under the extraordinary circumstances of the case, might be induced to consider the situation of the proprietors.—Mr Lancashire: I should be very glad if they would take it off our hands.—The Chairman: I assure you we should be very glad to dispose of it. The report having been adopted, a statement of accounts was read and approved of. Resolutions expressing the proprietors' acknowledgments of the great talents and zeal of Sir Isambert Brunel, Mr. Page, the resident engineer, and Mr. Charher, the clerk of the company, were then unanimously carried, and a vote of thanks having been given to the chairman and directors, the meeting separated.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1844.

The Parliamentary proceedings of the week are not uninteresting, though there has been neither a party struggle nor a party debate, and though the House itself has risen on two nights at a comparatively early hour. Whether the motion of Mr. Williams, of Coventry—for not entering upon any public business after midnight—had any effect or not, is uncertain, but tacitly the House seems to acknowledge the reasonableness of the proposal, though, in the case of the publication of its debates, it will not give a common practice the sanction of an order. Except on the occasions of those party debates of which the result is to be a division testing the strength of factions and the relative numbers of the "ins" and the "outs," the main business of the House generally closes at a little after twelve o'clock. But it should be understood that this is a contingency, and is in a great measure due to the consistency of Mr. Brotherton, whose look directed at the clock when the House is in committee, is the certain prelude to a motion that "the Chairman do report progress." But if no Mr. Brotherton were in the House, we fear that measures of much importance would pass their "stages" with no discussion, or so little as to be valueless. Even as it is, there is too much midnight legislation, with too many of the casualties and consequences to be expected at such hours. Mr. Williams, in introducing his motion, did not overstate the case at all:—

> He had often seen bills of the utmost importance forced on the consideration of the House at one and two o'clock, and sometimes later, in defiance of every remonstrance against them; and he had also seen millions of the public money voted away at the same unreasonable hour, without any consideration for the interests of the country. At the unreasonable hours of one and two o'clock in the morning he had seen gentlemen come down to the house to vote on questions affecting the liberty, the property, and the lives of the people. They came from their balls, from the theatres, the opera, and from their parties, and voted on questions upon which they had no knowledge whatever.

It is now a piece of historical curiosity, that as late as 1702, the House used to meet as early as mid-day, and in 1714, there was a standing order against proceeding with any order of the day, after what we should now consider a very early hour indeed. Last session, indeed, the House assembled at twelve o'clock in the day, according to ancient usage; but the hour of rising was regulated by modern fashion and habits. After an unbroken sitting of fourteen or fifteen hours, Mr. Williams says he has seen business proceeded with when every member of the Government present was fast asleep, and scarcely any one awake but the Speaker and Mr. Brotherton! It is a question of practice rather than principle, and though the motions made almost every year, for introducing a change in the present system, have not succeeded, yet neither have they been without their effect. An application to postpone a measure that is driven by previous business on the paper to a late hour, made on the ground that it cannot then be properly discussed, is very rarely refused by those who have charge of the bill. This lessens the evil; but only some positive regulation can altogether remove it.

There is a proposal on foot to lay an additional tax on coals coming into the port of London, for the purpose of providing funds for embellishing and improving the City. We have no objection to the improvements, but several to the tax, and we have no hesitation in expressing those objections, because, in the first place, we believe the City is rich enough to raise the money in a mode that will be less severely felt by the poorer classes. In our climate fuel is an absolute necessary; to increase its price is to render it more difficult to procure to thousands, and the consequence is a great increase in the amount of human suffering. The port of London is so large, and the quantity of coals landed in it so immense, that it has always been a favourite article of taxation by the financiers of the City. St. Paul's, we believe, was built in great part from a coal tax—New London Bridge was constructed by a fund raised on the same great necessary of life. The City tax upon it is already 10d. per ton, in addition to all other expences. The proposal to increase it is exciting great dissatisfaction. Those places who draw their supply of coal from the Metropolis, though at a considerable distance from it, complain loudly of the injustice of making them pay a tax for beautifying a city, which hundreds of their inhabitants never see. A public meeting has been held at Hertford on the subject, and, from the statements made, it is evident that any further advance in the price of coals in London will compel whole districts to procure their supplies through other channels, to the great injury of the trade of the Metropolis. This point is worth the attention of the Corporation.

It cannot be denied that improvement has much to effect in the good old city, and embellishment much more; but if it is all to be paid for out of the one article of coals, what price will they be raised to before the narrow streets become wide, the crooked places straight, and piles of brick changed to mansions of marble? Why, a fire will be among the most expensive of luxuries, and the "blazing hearth" be, to hundreds, numbered with the things that were. We hope that some other means may be found for raising the money necessary for indispensable improvements, and if there is such a difficulty in providing the funds, no others ought at present to be attempted. There will certainly be considerable opposition in Parliament to the proposal of an additional tax on a great necessary of life.

It will be seen by our Parliamentary report that an important financial measure has been adopted by the Government—that of reducing the interest payable on the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities. It is a step that has been taken by former Governments with respect to other kinds of stock, and, from rumours that have been for some time in circulation, had been anticipated.

Spain, ever since the fall of Espartero, seems to have been under the influence of a "charm of powerful trouble;" almost every party has obtained a momentary ascendancy, only to be met by plots and pronunciamentos against it; these, again, repressed by shootings, massacres, and bombardments; among the confusion of all which, the only thing to be clearly seen is the ruin of the country and the suffering of the people. Another element of discord has just been added to those already existing; —Queen Christina has crossed the frontier of Spain, and stands again on the soil of which her daughter Isabella is the sovereign. Her star, which waned before that of Espartero, seems to be again in the ascendant. Preparations are making in Madrid to give her a triumphant reception on her arrival at the capital. Several of the principal public functionaries have left Madrid to meet her, and accompany her back; her queenly daughter has issued a proclamation in honour of her return; and, to crown all, has appointed her mother to be Colonel of the Regiment of Chasseurs of the Queen Dowager! She will, of course, be the centre of all the intrigues of the Court and its factions. She will command the services of the army, for she is rich; thus supported, and gifted as she is, with a strong though ill-regulated mind, the idea of such a child as Isabella exercising any authority will be ridiculous. Christina is now the real Sovereign of Spain. If she can remove the present blood-stained anarchy by which Spain is cursed, to anything like order—if she can make her power paramount to that of the several chiefs who have struggled for the ascendancy—if she can, in fact, form a strong Government, her return may be a fortunate event for the country. But the Carlists, whose hopes rise in proportion to the continuance of disorder, will not, we fear, allow her to consolidate her authority without a struggle. It is lucky for Spain, that "Young England" so completely failed in its recent attempt to draw an expression of approval of Don Carlos from the House of Commons.

Aquatics at Eton College.—The captain, Mr. Codrington, has just selected his crew for his eight-oared boat for the approaching season, which consists of the following Etonians:—Mr. Codrington (captain), and Messrs. Errington, Lurrell, Speake, Slade, Babington, Dixon, and Woodridge. Lord Cecil has been selected by the captain as coxswain.

REDUCTION OF THE THREE-AND-A-HALF PER CENTS.

The plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to reduce the Three-and-a-Half per Cents to 3½ until the 10th of October, 1854, and to 3 per cent to the 10th of October, 1874 (without any addition to the Debt), being a period of twenty years, during which the interest would not be reduced below 3 per cent

During his speech last night he stated that three plans were open to him, but that they were all similar to the existing debt

If the Three-and-a-Halfs were reduced to Three per Cents, it would add 10 millions, and if reduced to Two-and a-Half per Cents, it would add upwards of 50 millions to the debt. He, therefore, preferred a more gradual and a more equitable plan, which would not relieve the present generation too much at the expense of their successors.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by the Royal Family, arrived at Buckingham Palace on Saturday afternoon. The royal party took their departure for town by a special train, and on arriving at the Paddington terminus immediately entered three of the royal carriages and four, and proceeded to Buckingham Palace, escorted by a party of Light Dragoons. The royal standard was immediately displayed from the marble arch.

On Sunday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Royal Suite, and the Household attended divine service in the private Chapel at Buckingham Palace. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

The Queen held a Privy Council on Monday afternoon at Buckingham Palace. It was attended by Prince Albert, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Wellington and Buccleuch, Sir R. Peel, the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Hadding on, Sir E. Knatchbull, and the Earl of Jersey. A new sheriff was appointed for the county of Rutland. Her Majesty gave audiences to Lord Wharncliffe and Sir R. Peel.

On Tuesday morning the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the Royal Gardens of Buckingham Palace. The Prince rode out on horseback attended by Sir E. Bowater. The Princess Royal was taken an airing in the Royal Gardens.

On Wednesday, and during the week, her Majesty and her Royal Consort observed the same routine.

The Bishop of Chichester, Admiral Wollaston, and Mr. E. Gibbons, have been visiting the Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, at Arundel Castle, within the last week.

The Duke of Rutland, who has been indisposed at the residence of Sir Frederick Trench, at the Ordnance Office, in Pall-mall, is somewhat better. Dr. Fergusson and Mr. Liston continue to daily attendance on the duke.

Lady Augusta Fitzclarence, sister to the Earl of Munster, is to be united to Comte Boudé, a Swedish nobleman, of large fortune and very ancient family.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK.—The annual meeting of the shareholders in this bank, took place at their premises, in Lothbury, on Wednesday, when the report presented by the directors, exhibited a most prosperous state of business during the past year. A dividend of 6 per cent. per annum was declared, besides which the unappropriated profits amounted to nearly £ [illegible].

LONDON AND CROYDON RAILWAY COMPANY.—On Thursday last the usual half-yearly meeting of the proprietors was held at the station, near Londonbridge. Wm A. Wilkinson, Esq., presided. The report stated, that the traffic between London and Croydon had increased, on a stationary state, as might be expected from the circumstances under which it had been conducted. The report added, that it was the intention of the directors very materially to reduce the fares to the Brighton Railway line. After some reference to the transactions of the company with those of the South Western, Brighton, &c., the report stated that the directors have felt it their duty to promote by every means in their power the formation of a Railway Company, with a view to enable the inhabiting them to return to their native homes, by allowing them funds for that purpose. From the report, it appeared that, during the past year the operations of the committee had extended very considerably, the total sum received being £3948 10s. The number of pensioners on the funds during the year had been 53, which is the day's election of 15 made 70. The number receiving casual relief is now 284. It further appeared that 132 persons had been passed to their homes. Amongst the items of resources were the sum of £1340, received at the annual dinner, £103 from Her Majesty, £30 from the Emperor of Austria, who has signified his intention of becoming an annual subscriber. After the usual routine of business connected with the election of pensioners, thanks were passed to the chairman, and the proceedings terminated.

FIRE.—On Wednesday night last, considerable alarm was created in the neighbourhood of Old Bond-street, by the outbreak of a fire upon the extensive premises in the occupation of Mr. Charles Dinnsford, chemist and druggist, No. 172 in that street. The fire originated in the laboratory, where workmen were employed in conducting the process of distillation. Whilst thus engaged, the contents of the extracting vessel boiled over accidentally, and, from the extremely inflammable nature of the fluid, the fire spread among the laboratory with the rapidity of lightning, consuming in its progress every ignitable article with which it came in contact. Fortunately, the fire, which broke out in the basement story, was confined there by the adroit and persevering efforts of the inmates.

ACCIDENT AND LOSS OF LIFE.—On Wednesday, about four o'clock, a melancholy loss of life took place on the branch line of railroad which is being formed from the Bricklayer's Arms, in the Kent-road, to join the Croydon and Brighton Railway, at the back of the St. Helens Gardens at Rotherhithe. About four o'clock in the afternoon, the men were using a beam, when it was very act of doing it, and the beam had been nearly placed in its allotted situation, it touched another they had got up before, and down it fell. Matthew Whetlar, a child, was unfortunately, and he was crushed into the ground by the fall. The dead body was burned two feet in the earth. Another child, Stephen Edward Ward, was so severely injured that he is not expected to recover.

THE STRAKY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS, which Mr. Cross's energies and ability have raised to so high a rank among the Metropolitan places of amusement, was disposed of last week for a very large sum; Mr. Tyler, who was at one time connected with the Garden, in an official capacity, having become the extensible proprietor. The entire collection of animals was included in the sale, with the exception of the four Giraffes, which are to be sent again on their travels together with those picturesque and remarkable humans, their keepers. The retirement of the Messrs Warwick, the late managers, is one of the private charges under the new regime.

CHEATS OF HORSE DEALERS.—There is no species of fraud in which the metropolis abounds no plausible kind of robbery, whether practised by magsmen, duffers, or ring-droppers—which exists so notoriously, or is more frequently practised, even under the very eye of authority which almost obliged to wink at it—as the cheats which are daily perpetrated at the livery-stables and horse-bazaars of London. It makes one almost indignant to be obliged to repeat over and over again, in almost the identical same terms, the thousand-and-one knavish and fraudulent schemes which the London swell-mob and thieves of less courage resort to for the purpose of entrapping the unwary—it would appear as if persons with their senses perfect to be victimised with their eyes open, as to show how philosophical they are, and that they take a delight in encouraging talent so distinguished. A few days ago—and we regret to say that this is not the most recent case of gullibility that has occurred—an advertisement appeared in the Times, announcing a celebrated horse, by Emilius, for sale. Two young (green) gentlemen applied at the address given, and found a fellow in the garb of a groom, who professed to be the servant of the same name, the thousand-and-one rogue: he told the usual tale that his master was out of spirits for the loss of his wife, and after describing the qualities of the horse, which were, of course, first-rate, and for being a great favourite with his deceased mistress, he would sell them their only object in disposing of him was to get him a good master, who would treat him kindly and take care of him. He could not, however, think of parting with him without having a nominal value, and he consented to accept twenty-five sovereigns. He concluded by calling the horse "Charley," with all the coaxing airs of a hard-hearted, and the faithful and docile animal followed him about the yard like a good fellow. This was enough to win the affections of the two young gentlemen, and at this critical period a gentleman, calling himself Kelly, presented himself in the yard, and was referred to by the groom as the friend of his master who was deputed to receive the money. This individual affected to be rather annoyed at being obliged to relinquish some rather pressing engagement which he had on hand in order to attend to his friend's interests, and observed that he did not care that the horse sold for eight-pence—all he had to do was to get the value of the money. The money was paid, and the horse delivered, and it is hardly necessary to add that the nominal price mentioned by Mr Kelly was about the real value of the animal. "Charley" has been since sold for a few pounds, but by passing into clever hands, may live to be made the subject of many a similar narrative, and when he does—" may we be there to see."

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.—VISIT OF MR. O'CONNELL.—Mr. O'Connell having been invited to visit Birmingham, to witness a grand demonstration in favour of Ireland, arrived in that town by the eleven o'clock train from London on Wednesday last, and immediately afterwards had an address presented to him by the Reformers of that locality, to which he returned a suitable reply. The public meeting was appointed to take place in the Town Hall at one o'clock, at which hour every part of the building was crowded. The body of the hall was filled by working men, and in the side gallery the reserved seats were occupied by the more respectable inhabitants, amongst whom were a large number of ladies. The organ gallery, the front of which formed the rostrum, was also filled by the parties who had been most active in getting up the demonstration. At one o'clock Mr. O Connell made his appearance in the hall, and was received with very loud cheers, which were kept up and repeated again and again, for several minutes. When order was somewhat restored, Mr. Edmonds, one of the peace, was called on to preside, during the temporary absence of the Mayor, and opened the proceedings. He concluded by reading two letters—one from Mr. Muntz and the other from Mr. Scholefield, the members for Birmingham. Mr. Muntz stated that he could only attend the meeting at personal sacrifice, which the occasion did not justify him in making. Mr. Scholefield expressed his regret at his inability to attend, but at the same time was fully prepared to vote for Resolutions in favour of "complete suffrage," &c., were then moved and seconded by Mr Magan, solicitor; the Rev. Mr. M'Donnell, Roman Catholic priest, of Birmingham; Mr. Salt, one of the active members of the "Complete Suffrage Union;" Mr. Joseph Sturge, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Allbright, all of which were adopted. The chairman then introduced Mr. O'Connell, who was received with cheering and waving of hats, &c. The honourable and learned gentleman said he came to Birmingham for two reasons—first, to express his gratitude for the sympathy that himself and his country had received from the people of England since the late prosecution; secondly, to endeavour to conciliate the people of both countries, and to animate them in one great object, to put down class legislation by giving to the sacred principle of democracy full sway and entire power. In doing this, he wished to remove an error into which a large portion of the people of England had fallen—namely, that he wanted to effect a separation between England and Ireland. But first of all he wished to show them how the union was obtained, and then we should be able to judge whether the act was a fair bargain, or whether it was obtained by legal and honest means. Mr. O'Connell here gave a history of the circumstances preceding the union, &c. The Act of Union, he contended, had destroyed the commerce and manufactures of Ireland, and had reduced the people to misery and starvation. The Reform Bill he remunded the men of Birmingham, was only a mockery unless they obtained the extension of the franchise they had better at once set an example to the country by establishing a slave class and a master class, for the only distinction between the freeman and the slave is that the latter had no vote. He spoke of the laws for his government, and that others regulated this as well as the amount of taxes he should pay, and the rate of remuneration he should receive for his labour. The oppression of Ireland was the reason why they obtained the prosecution had been conducted, he characterised as one of the foulest attempts ever perpetrated to put down popular liberty; and if the people of England did not mark their sense of the outrage done to the cause of truth and justice, they might rely upon upon it that the violation of the law which had been committed in his case would be made a precedent in theirs. Mr. Sharman Crawford, who accompanied Mr. O'Connell from London, next addressed the meeting, and at the close of the hon. member's speech a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. O'Connell.

LINCOLNSHIRE.—INCENDIARISM.—A young man named J. Kidd, aged 28, a brushmaker, on tramp from Sheffield, has been committed to Lincoln Castle for trial at the approaching assizes, charged, on his own confession, with having set fire to a barley stack at Binbrook, the property of Robert Johnson, Esq., on the 16th of December, in company with two others, in revenge for having been refused relief by the servants when they were begging.

OLDHAM.—HATTERS' TURN-OUT.—On Monday most of the turn-out hat ruffers in Oldham and its vicinity resumed their employment, an advance of 3d. per dozen having, it is understood, been agreed upon.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The weekly meeting of the Association was held on Monday in the Conciliation-hall. The chair was taken by Captain Seaver, of Heath-hall. After the minutes of the last meeting had been read by the secretary, Mr. Ray, Mr. John O'Connell addressed the meeting on the subject of Mr. Duncombe's motion in the House of Commons, with regard to the Government reporters in Ireland, and took an opportunity of contradicting a statement imputed to Sir James Graham, that it was unsafe to make public the name of the reporter at present employed in Ireland for the Government. He said this was a most unworthy attempt to throw odium on the Repealers. Every one there knew the gentleman and his name. (Cries of "He's welcome here.") That gentleman, in the most fair and honourable manner, had apprised them of the nature of his duties. He came not in the character of a spy or an informer, but, openly and manfully, to discharge honourable duties; and he hoped them as high and as honourable a position as any gentleman in that hall. (Loud cheers.) Mr Hodge (the Government reporter, who sat at the front of the gallery, near the chair) said he felt it to be his duty to state that he had invariably experienced the greatest kindness, attention, and courtesy in that Association; and from every one connected with it he had met every possible facility in the discharge of his duties. (Cheers.) Mr. Smith O'Brien read an address transmitted by Mr. Henry Grattan to the electors of the county of Meath, which was referred to the committee. At the close of the proceedings, Mr. J. O'Connell announced that the repeal rent for the week was £495 4s. 9d.—Adjourned.

LAW ORANGES.—It is stated, in circles nearly to be well-formed on the subject, that Sir E. Sugden will shortly leave Ireland to take upon himself the high office of Lord Chancellor of England. Lord Lyndhurst would be better pleased, they say, to have another successor; but the state of his health will not allow him to hold on any longer: and the arrangement he desired cannot take place. Nothing has transpired as to Sir Edward's probable successor in Ireland. The native bar will be outrageous if another Englishman is sent over; but native or alien, it will not be easy to find a man in either country better disposed than Sir Edward to do justice without fear, favour, or respect of persons.

DREADFUL STORM AND LOSS OF LIFE.—CAPPOQUIN, March 2.—Yesterday this part of the country was visited with the most terrible hail storm ever witnessed. I have taken up some of the hailstones, and I assure you they were larger than the largest marble I ever played with. We had also the most terrible thunder and lightning, and, melancholy to relate, a woman had her son struck killed; the boy, fourteen years old, was sitting by the fire, and the woman was in the garden. There were also two children severely injured. This occurred in the parish of Saevegore, between Cappoquin and Clonmel.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT ON THE RIVER.—At half-past eleven on Sunday morning, as the wind was blowing very fresh from the southward, with the tide running up, a couple of youths, named Williams and Gregory, who were sailing a light skiff, got adrift from the yard of Messrs. Scott & Stephen Davies, of Somerset wharf, the boat immediately capsized, and both lads were precipitated into the stream. The lad Williams, however, succeeded in regaining his hold of the drifting skiff, and was saved; but the youth Gregory was washed away, and his body has not yet been found. Both youths were the sons of respectable parents in High-street, Southwark.

ALLEGED MURDER IN THE MISS. SOUTHWARK.—On Monday an inquiry was opened before Mr. W. Payne, City coroner, in the board-room of St. George's workhouse, touching the death of Elizabeth Doobs, who died on Saturday last. The deceased was a remarkably fine young woman, apparently about 35. The head and face were dreadfully bruised, and behind the right ear there was a contused scalp wound, about one inch in length. No other external injuries were observable. The deceased lodged with the house of a man named Carroll. On Saturday night she was intoxicated. She and Carroll's mother-in-law, and quarrelled. Other lodgers, overheard, heard scuffling below, and a cry of "murder." Deceased left the room, returned to one above, became sick, and died in a few minutes. There can be no doubt that the violence complained of was the cause of death. The inquiry was adjourned, to afford time for the apprehension of Carroll.

ATTEMPTED INCENDIARY FIRE AT MESSRS. GRISSELL AND PETO'S.—On Saturday morning the workmen and clerks connected with the extensive premises of Messrs. Grissell and Peto, situate on the Thames-street, York-road, Lambeth, were alarmed by a discovery which left no doubt that a most diabolical attempt had been made to fire the premises. The attempt is supposed to have taken place some time in the course of Friday night, as when the men left off, at half-past five o'clock, to all appearance the premises were safe. The spot fixed on by the incendiary was in a corner of the yard adjoining the workshed, which is 60 feet long by 50 in width, containing several thousand pounds' worth of property. Against this portion of the premises there was regularly built up, consisting of shavings, chips, and pieces of wood, and which, no doubt, would have formed some combustible missile. From some unexplained cause the fire only extended partially through the layer that was placed upon it, time the flame arising from it cheered the outside of the shed to a height of six feet, and about two feet in width, and, with this exception, did no further injury. A reward of £200 has been offered to any person who will give such information as will lead to the discovery of the offender, but up to the present time no clue has been obtained.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT.—On Wednesday afternoon as the carriage of G. Palmer, Esq., M.P. for Essex, drawn by a pair of beautiful horses, was proceeding at a moderate pace through the City-road, the irons that support the coachman's seat gave way, and threw the coachman and a stout elderly man, between sixty and seventy years of age (late butler to Mr. Palmer), to the ground. The coachman rolled off the horses, and the carriage wheels passed over him, fortunately not seriously injuring him as far as could be ascertained, but the poor old man clung to the driving box, coming in contact with the horses, which set off at full speed and dragged him between the carriage and a lamp post. The concussion was so great that the near horse's harness snapped like a thread, which released him, and he galloped away at a terrific pace, but was stopped near the Angel. Mr. May, Secretary of the National Animal Friend Society, was the first to cross the road, and promptly directed the efforts of the quickly assembled throng, by cutting away the harness of the off horse, and releasing the poor old man, who was completely entangled in the harness of the fallen horse. His thigh was dreadfully crushed, and his leg and arm broken, besides internal injuries. The sufferer was removed to St. Bartholomew's Hospital on a stretcher. There was no person in the carriage.

ATHLONE ELECTION COMMITTEE.—On Monday the General Committee of Elections met in committee-room, to select six members to try the merits of the petition presented in this case, complaining of the election of Mr. Collett as member for the above borough. The following were the members selected:—Mr. W. Beckett, Mr. W. O. Stanley, Mr. Lockhart, Mr. Currie, Mr. Cripps, and Mr. Ward. The chairman's panel was next called over, and the committee proceeded over the committee, and on Wednesday proceeded to consider the merits of the question. The counsel for the petitioner, Major Beresford, Mr. Cox, Mr. Morris; for the sitting member, Mr. Austin and Mr. Sergeant Wrangham. The committee re-assembled on Thursday morning at 11 o'clock; Mr. Farington, chairman. After two witnesses had been examined in support of the petition, Mr. Sergeant Wrangham would admit that he learned nothing which he thought it worth while to proceed further. Unless there was different evidence, the petitioner's evidence could not be established. Mr. Talbot was well aware of the difficulties he had to contend with; the witnesses had given a most correct description of what took place to day to that which they related on former occasions; and as the other evidence which he had to call would probably be of the same description, except Father Kilroe's, as he did not wish to give him trouble, he would at once state he consented to his learned friend's suggestion, withdrew the petit on, and retired from the contest. He would, therefore, not trouble the committee further.—Mr. Sergeant Wrangham said, after the evidence of the two witnesses it was only justice to all parties that the proceedings should be closed, and his learned friend had exercised a sound discretion in retiring. The committee had only to declare Mr. Collett duly elected. The room was cleared, On the readmission of strangers, the Chairman said, the committee had adopted the following resolution:—"Resolved, that John Collett, Esq., was duly elected a burgess to serve in the present Parliament for the Borough of Athlone." The committee then adjourned.

POSTSCRIPT.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL HALL.—We have received by the Queen's messenger, who arrived on Thursday morning, a letter from St. Petersburg, dated February 20, containing the following account of the sudden death of Admiral Hall. The writer states—"We had a very melancholy circumstance on Sunday before last during divine service at the English church. Admiral Hall, the much-esteemed friend of the Emperor, fell suddenly down in a fit, and expired, at the age of 60. He was formerly a Lieutenant in the British service, and was afterwards made rear Admiral in the Russian navy. The Emperor, in honour of a faithful servant, will attend his funeral."

AQUATICS.—The ensuing season promises to be one of the best, for some years, from the arrangements that are in progress, particularly as relate to the Thames at Putney. The particulars of the proceedings as to the amount of prizes have not been as yet made known. Lord Castlereagh has been appointed president of the Committee of Management. The first meeting for the year of the St. George's Boat Club was held at Messrs. Searle's Rooms, Lambeth, on Tuesday last. Several boats are at present being prepared for the season by Messrs. Searle.

OPENING OF THE METROPOLITAN BRIDGES TO THE PUBLIC.—A communication has been received by the Secretary to the Anti-Bridge Toll Company, from Sir J. Graham, stating that the Earl of Lincoln, Commissioner of Woods and Forests, has consented to grant an interview to the members of the Company to hear their statements on the subject of the opening of Waterloo, Southwark, and Vauxhall Bridges.

SOCIALISM IN LONDON.—The Socialists have at length been compelled to give up the premises, occupied by them in the Blackfriars Road, known as the Rotunda, through want of funds.

COMMISSION OF LUNACY ON VICE-ADMIRAL SIR T. BAKER K.C.B.—On Thursday a commission of lunacy was opened before Mr. Commissioner Barlow, and a special jury, at the Sheriffs' Office. Bed-lion-square, relative to the state of mind of Sir Thomas Baker, K.C.B., Vice-Admiral of the Red, and of the Shrubbery, Walmer, Kent. The gallant admiral, it appeared, is 71 years of age, and entered the royal navy when only eight years of age, and during that period has distinguished himself in many naval engagements, particularly in Sir Richard Strachan's victory over the French fleet, off Ferrol, in 1805; and, in the same year, when captain of the Phœnix frigate, after a desperate fight of three hours, he defeated and captured Le Didon, a French frigate of superior force. He subsequently brought his prize and prisoners to Portsmouth. For his services, he has been promoted to his present rank, with a good service pension of £500 per annum, in addition to his half-pay of £329 5s. 6d. From the evidence, it appeared that his mind was first impaired in 1841, from which he recovered, but the malady returned in May, 1843. His chief delusions are that persons are combined against him, by enchantment and electricity; that ulcers in his legs have been caused through his keepers having fired brimstone and white lead at him through key-holes, crevices, &c.; and to cure the ulcers, he applied snuff. He also imagined that a bronze statue at Hull had been charged with combustibles to injure him; that he possessed the power, by means of circles and screws to enlarge the cabin of any ship, to widen and improve the harbour of Hull, to steer ships, regulate the speed of steam-carriages, move houses and other objects, and also, by a panoramic action, to bring the Palace of Stockholm to Hyde-park, &c. His apparatus for performing these consisted of a few tin boxes and toys, and the moving-power compression. In other respects his mind appeared sound, his conversation intelligent, and his manners polite and agreeable, which was apparent in his introduction to the jury, to whom he made a long speech, interspersed with many shrewd remarks, in which, however, the existence of the delusion was so apparent as to induce the jury, after a short investigation of upwards of eight hours, to return a verdict, dating the unsoundness of mind from the 13th September, 1843.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT, Thursday.—(Before Lord Abinger and Mr. Justice Williams.)—On Thursday, William M'Gregor, 35, and Peter Lambert, 32, seamen, were indicted for feloniously attempting to make a revolt on board a ship called the Heather, upon the high seas, and within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Ballantine conducted the prosecution. The prisoners had no counsel. Mr. Clarkson stated the facts of the case as they afterwards appeared in evidence. After several witnesses had been examined, one of the jury requested Lord Abinger to ask the prisoners why they were undefended by counsel, and whether it was from want of money. Lord Abinger said he did not think such a question could be properly put to the prisoners. The prisoners had a right to avail themselves of the bar would undertake the defence he would pay him for it. None of the counsel present expressed any intention of interfering, and the trial proceeded. The case for the prosecution having closed, the prisoner M'Gregor made a long statement, commented addressed the jury, in which he detailed various grievances, he alleged himself to have suffered on board the vessel. He said that the mates did not understand their duty, and many of the crew were landsmen bricklayers and butchers—who were by no means fit for the duties they had to perform. He declared he had no intention of depriving the captain of his authority on board the vessel, and said that the handcuffs they were trying to put on him were much too small, and hurt his arms; and the second mate was trampling upon his neck at the time, and, with an oath, said he would choke him. While he was in this position he observed the captain take deliberate aim at Griggs, and shoot him, and he fell dead instantly. After this he consented to go to his duty on condition that he should be put on shore at the first English port, or handed over to the protection of a British man-of-war. He went on to say, that after Griggs was shot, the captain proposed to have him sewed up in a piece of old sacking, but he told him he might find him a coffin; and prisoner then got a hammock, and twelve shot were put into it to sink the body. The crew after this talked about whether it was proper for the murderer of the deceased to read prayers over him. The captain, he said, turned round three times, and then read prayers over the body. After this he asked the crew whether they did not think that he was justified in shooting the man, and none of them made any answer. The captain then sent for him to the cabin, and asked him whether he did not think he was justified in killing the man, and he replied that he should not give an opinion, as it would take a better man than him to decide the question. Lambert said he had nothing to add to what had been stated by his fellow prisoner. The learned judge summed up, the jury left the court about half-past one o'clock, and they were absent until past eight o'clock when they return d into court, and the foreman pronounced a verdict of "Guilty" against the prisoner M'Gregor, and acquitted the other prisoner. The jury coupled with their verdict the following statement:—That the jury are of a decided opinion, and strongly recommend, that the slightest punishment that the Court can pass ought to be inflicted, considering that there was much real cause for discontent and complaint, which complaint was not only manifested by the prisoners, but by all the crew, excepting the officers. The jury consider the captain and owners of the vessel highly reprehensible for not having provided sufficiently for the wants and comfort of the men.

THE LATE MURDER AT DEPTFORD.—(Before Mr. Justice Patteson.)—On Friday, James Dickinson, aged 26, was placed at the bar charged with the wilful murder of her son, George John Dickinson, aged three years, in the parish of St. Paul, Deptford, on the 10th of January last, by inflicting a wound on the head of the deceased, from the effects of which he died. The prisoner was also indicted on the coroner's inquisition for the murder of her child. On the prisoner being placed in the dock, she presented a most wretched appearance, and was evidently to be suppressed. She was labouring under most dreadful agony of mind and body, and her wretched state caused great consternation and joy in a crowded court. Mr. Justice Patteson directed that the prisoner should be removed from the dock, which was immediately done.—Mr. Doane shortly recapitulated the facts of the case, and then called a number of witnesses, but as the proceedings before the coroner's jury need only be published, it is unnecessary to proceed, it is not necessary to go into the distressing facts again. Several witnesses having been examined, Mr. Clarkson addressed the jury for the prisoner. There could not be a doubt but the unfortunate woman at the bar, at the time she committed the awful act, for which she was placed in the dock, was in an unsound state of mind, and not able to govern her own actions, consequently not a responsible agent. He thought that the jury would have no hesitation in coming to the state of mind of the prisoner by evidence which could not be doubted. Some of her family had been afflicted with insanity, and one of her relations died in a lunatic asylum. Several witnesses were then called, who proved in the most singularly satisfactory manner of mind to which the prisoner was at times subject. Her sister stated, before her marriage, on one occasion she was in bed for three days and nights without any food, and during that time refused all kind of food. On another occasion she sat up dressed in the kitchen for three nights. She had left church during the time of service, without any apparent reason, and often complained of her head. Other acts, tending to show a disordered mind, were deposed to by different witnesses.—Mr. Justice Patteson summed up, and the jury returned a verdict of "Not Guilty of the murder, being at the time in a state of insanity."

The unhappy woman was then arraigned for the murder of her younger child, and the jury returned a like verdict upon it.

OLD COURT, FRIDAY.—ROBBERY WITH VIOLENCE.—Ufford Bevis, James Bevis (brothers), and Joe Murray, were charged with burglariously entering the house of Mr. Neville, shoemaker, St. John-street, Clerkenwell, on the morning of the 7th February, and with inflicting several wounds on the person of the prosecutor, with intent to murder him.—Mr. Watkins appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Wylde for the prisoner Murray.—It appeared from the evidence of the several witnesses, that on the morning in question, between six and seven o'clock, the prosecutor heard a noise in the shop, and on coming down he found three men, one of whom struck him a violent blow on the arm, and a second on the head. A struggle ensued, and the whole got away, but their hats were left behind. They were subsequently apprehended by Kennedy, a policeof the G division of police. No property was actually removed, but several pairs of boots and shoes were removed from the window for that purpose. The house was entered by means of sickets of the window. The prosecutor was then injured that it was not until three weeks afterwards that he was sufficiently recovered to attend at the police-court. The jury found Murray and Alfred Bevis guilty, and acquitted the other prisoner. There was another robbery against the three prisoners, and James Bevis was again acquitted. It was then made known to the learned judge that Murray had been transported for seven years. Murray was sentenced to be transported for life, and the other prisoner for ten years.

HOW-STREET.—ROBBERY BY A MILITARY SERJEANT.—A Serjeant, named Kennedy, in the 90th Regiment of Foot, was yesterday (Friday brought before Mr. Jardine, at the police-court, charged with stealing a case of mathematical instruments, value £3 10s, and a valuable telescope belonging to her Majesty's Government, and a snuff-box belonging to Staff Serjeant Keevil, of the same regiment, from the Observation Room, in the St. Martin's Barracks. It appears that the serjeants have access to this room, and about six weeks ago the articles were missed, but it could not be discovered who had taken them. Suspicion at last fell on the prisoner, and, on inquiry, it was found that he had taken the property to a woman, named Ann Woodhouse, living at No. 1, Aunt-street, Westminster, who had pledged it. The snuff-box was found in her possession, and she appeared in court and gave evidence against the serjeant. Mr. Jardine remanded him till a future day, in order to find the property concealed, and refused to take bail.

FOREIGN.

ARRIVAL OF THE WEST INDIA MAIL.—The Royal Mail Company's steamer Forth, Captain Chapman, arrived at Southampton yesterday (Friday) morning, about half-past twelve. As she did not, how ver, come up to her usual moorings, there was not sufficient time to land the mails for the mor. train; she was half an hour too late. We have received a file of Jamaica papers down to Feb. 8, but they contain little of either commercial or political interest. The dates of Barbadoes are from Feb. 7; Antigua, Jan. 7; Nassau, Jan. 12; Bermuda, Jan. 21. The Forth brings home fourteen passengers, invalids from the army and navy, a large quantity of specie, both on merchants' account and for the payment of Mexican dividends, viz., about 1,200,000 dollars, 41 serons of cochineal, 10 bales of gum copal, and a quantity of gold dust and old silver. At Vera Cruz was the Pique frigate; the Rose attending on the British Consul. The Albatross was standing into Vera Cruz when the Forth left. At Tampico was an American corvette. The Tenios brought the mails to Bermuda for the Forth. The Dee was at Havanna, going to the Gulf. From Mexico we learn that the tariff has been increased. At Havanna there was great rejoicing for three or four days, in consequence of the Queen of Spain having become of age. The Captain-General was exercising his troops, and getting his fortifications prepared.

KNIGHTS OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF THE SWAN.

THE ORDER OF THE SWAN.

The august sovereign, whose portrait embellishes our front page, has issued a royal ordinance, bearing date last Christmas Eve, for the revival of the ancient religious order of merit, entitled "the Order of the Swan." His Majesty proposes to be himself the first Grand Master of the revived order—an order, he tells us, "founded four hundred years ago by his ancestor, the Arch-Chamberlain and Elector Frederick II., and never formally abolished."

In the construction of the new community, the principal characteristic is its profession of embracing "persons of both sexes, without distinction of rank or religious confession;" and its object is declared to be "the proof of Christian truth by deeds," or, as it is expressed in another part of the royal ordinance, "the proof of Christianity, not by dissents about creeds and forms, but in its spirit and its truth by life and deeds." Attendance upon the sick, the penitent, and the criminal—the alleviation, in short, of human suffering, moral or physical—are afterwards pointed to as the works particularly likely to furnish the means and material for the accomplishment of this end.

The Order of the Swan was exclusively peaceful in character: it bound the professor of its vows to no bloody deeds or superstitious pilgrimages; but, in its spirit, laws, and observances, was essentially beneficent, charitable, and religious. Very little of the history of the order is known. The badge was a swan, enamelled white on a green ground, adorned with flowers, and it was suspended from the neck by a triple gold chain. The robes of the order were generally similar to those of its contemporaries—loose, simple flowing, and nearly allied to the undress costume of the priesthood.

Our cut represents a group of the ancient knights, derived from authors in "Sanderus," "Flandria Illustrata," and Hugh Clark's "History of the Orders of Knighthood."

The statutes of the order are not yet published; but it is known that the new order is to be identical in spirit with the old one, and that women will be eligible for members. It will, in fact, be an order of mercy, founded on the better feelings of human nature.

"We notice this project," says the Times, "simply as forming one more effort, in addition to others of the same nature already made by the King of Prussia, to meet the peculiar exigency which distinguishes the present condition and formation of European society from those which obtained in times antecedent to the Protestant Reformation, by what appears to be an attempt to combine, without a sacrifice of principle, whatever of truth or good may be discoverable amidst the jarring and discordant mass of error which presents itself to be dealt with."

The Royal Buck-hounds.—Notwithstanding the extremely unfavourable nature of the weather and the flooded state of the country, her Majesty's staghounds met on Monday morning at Walk-end, Chobham. The field was the thinnest ever assembled, not more than a dozen horsemen being present besides the huntsmen and whippers-in. Upon the stag, Rory O'More, being turned out, close to the place of meeting, he went away to Shrub's-hill into Col. Challoner's plantations, doubling back to Broomhill Butt, and crossing the Bagshot road towards Old Windsor Common, going by the church, through the nursery ground, to Black-nest, on towards the Belvedere Tower, where he doubled back again to Shrub's-hill, crossing by Broomhill Hut, and nearly back to Walk-end. Rory then made for Pottnail, nearly to Fox-hill, leaving the hill to the right, and then away for Thorpe, by the church, down to the Thames, where he took water, and swam to the Middlesex side, landing at the village of Laleham, the hounds being taken round over Chertsey Bridge. The hounds upon again being laid on, took across the Great Western road on to Stanwell. At this point, the rain coming down in torrents, the scent lying as badly as it well could, with all the low lands under water, the pack was called off, and Rory O'More left in the vicinity of Sir John Gibbon's park at Stanwell, the run, up to this period, having lasted upwards of two hours, at tremendous speed, with the exception of the slight respite when the stag crossed the Thames. The country, from the late continued rains, was extremely heavy, and the horses regularly beat.

LIVERPOOL GRAND STEEPLE CHACE.

We detailed this great event, "the Derby of steeple chaces," in our paper of last week, and then intimated our intention of illustrating the spirited scene. We are now enabled to do so, from a sketch by a very competent Liverpool artist, who has not failed in characteristic accuracy.

Amongst the company present were the Earl and Countess of Sefton, Lord de Tabley, the Earl and Countess of Eglinton, Lord and Lady Craven, Lady C. Townley, Lord Curzon, Lords Macdonald, Maidstone, and Cosmo Russell; Sir G. Houston; Hons. C. Stanley, Fitzroy, F. Craven, and Captain Stanley; Sirs W. M. Stanley, R. Brooke, H. Brownrigg, and F. Bathurst; Messrs. Payne, Errington, J. Stanley, Milbanke, F. A. Milbanke, Bagge, D. Graham, J. Bell, J. White, Marc Heywood, Blackburn, &c. The Waterloo and most of the principal hotels were full ARRIVAL OF THE OVERLAND MAIL.—CAPTURE OF GWALIOR,—SIX THOUSAND KILLED AND WOUNDED.

The Indian Mail of the 1st of February announces two victories which have been fought at Gwalior, viz., Maharajpoor and Punniar; our loss has been severe: 141 killed, and 866 wounded. Nine officers have been killed or died of their wounds, viz., Major-General Churchill, Col. Sanders, Major Crommelin, Captains Stewart, Magrath, and Cobban; Lieutenants Newton and Leathe; and Ensign Bray. The loss of the enemy is estimated at between 3000 and 4000 killed and wounded, with the loss of 56 pieces of artillery. The army under the Commander-in-Chief was about 14,000 strong, of which 3000 was cavalry, and 40 pieces of artillery. The force opposed to this—15,000 infantry, 3000 cavalry, and 100 guns. The wing under General Grey, including the Sippree Contingent, 7000 strong, including 1800 cavalry, and 28 guns; the Mahrattas mustered about 12,000, with from 20 to 30 guns. The fort was immediately surrendered, and the chiefs came in and made submission.

Gwalior, the fort taken by our troops, is, from its strength, called the Gibraltar of the East. It covers the top of a hill nearly two miles long, but narrow; the sides are very precipitous, and the highest part, which is at the north end, is 340 feet above the surrounding plain. The rampart conforms to the brow of the hill all round; and the area within is full of buildings, reservoirs of water, walls, and cultivated land. At the foot of the mountain, on the east side, is the town, which is large and well built. It is 68 miles south by east of Agra. The British took it by a nocturnal escalade in 1780.

This description will account for the severe loss described in the despatch.

It is not our intention to occupy the country, but we insist upon the maintenance of a subsidiary force, consisting of seven regiments of infantry, with three cavalry regiments, with horse and foot artillery. These to be taken charge of by Company's officers solely and under our own control. The army retires to within its own territories immediately. Lord Ellenborough was to start for Calcutta on the 23d January. His Lordship was in the heat of the action at Maharajpoor on the 29th. The troops recover but slowly from their late sickness. The Punjaub remains in the same state as formerly.

Our last dates from China are up to the 28th of December. Business at Chusan and Canton is generally dull. Captain Brooke proceeds by steamer to England, as the bearer of the supplementary treaty and despatches from Sir Henry Pottinger. The port of Shanghae was officially opened on the 17th of November, by Captain Balfour, the appointed Consul.

Colonel Butterworth, Governor of the Straits of Malacca, arrived at Penang on the 21st of November.

We regret to state that some cases of plague are reported in Alexandria.

India throughout is tranquil.

The following are the details of this important event.

GWALIOR.—VICTORIES OF MAHARAJPOOR AND PUNNIAR.

The disturbances which have so long been maturing in Gwalior, have at length come to a crisis, and, in a manner, as creditable to our Government as to our brave and valorous troops.

GWALIOR.

The confederates of the now incarcerated Khageewallah, having, since his surrender, been supreme in the Court, every means have been used by them to weed the Maharanee from the confidence which she has begun to place in our professions. Having come to the determination of visiting the Governor-General in the camp, at Dholepore, and having gone a part of the way, she was advised, from the reports circulated by the Vakeels, then in our camp, on no account to visit it, as our professions of friendship were counterfeit, seeing that a large portion of the army were on their way to the capital, and had already crossed the river. This intelligence, combined with that brought by others, tending to the same effect, overturned all the resolutions which she had lately come to. Her first step on returning to Court, was to assemble all the chiefs and officers, and the resolution was come to of opposing the further advance of our troops. With this view, Colonels Baptiste and Jacob, were directed to oppose the advance of the right wing of our army, while Colonel Secunder was deputed to oppose our left. The first appearance of hostility was shown on the part of the enemy, by firing on the baggage party of Colonel Sleeman, and again on a reconnoitring party under Colonel Gardner. This, of course, decided the course to be pursued, and General Sir J. Thackwell, with the troops under his command, was directed to make an immediate attack on the enemy's left flank, supported by those under Major General Valiant. The enemy's centre was ordered to be attacked by the troops under the command of Major-General Dennis, supported by those under Brigadier Wright. To the left of this, with the view of threatening the right flank of the enemy, was the 4th brigade of cavalry, under Colonel Scott. The whole of this force, numbering 3000 cavalry, 12,000 infantry, artillery and sappers, with forty pieces of artillery, ten of which were howitzers and heavy guns, was about a mile in front of Maharajpoor, by eight o'clock on the morning of the 29th of December. It was found that the enemy had taken possession of the village the previous evening; some little alterations was requisite from the original disposition of the force, and General Lattler's column was directed to advance from the village, while General Valiant took it in reverse. These being supported by General Dennis's column, with the two light field-batteries. When these columns arrived in front of the village of Jourah, the enemy opened their fire from Maharajpoor, where several regiments, with twenty-eight guns, had taken up their position. The brigade having deployed into line, was ordered to advance on Maharajpoor, from which issued a galling fire. Her Majesty's 39th, supported by the 86th Native Infantry, under General Littler, then advanced on the fort with the view of taking it in front, and having made a charge, cheering as they went, pushed forward, bearing down every obstacle. So severe was this struggle, that the enemy's artillerymen stood fighting at their guns until cut down in great numbers. Within the village, where numbers of the enemy had taken refuge, a severe hand-to-hand encounter occurred, when the enemy, throwing down their matchlocks, resorted to the sword. Gen. Valiant, having at the time pressed upon, in order to take it in reverse, had to pass over six hundred yards of ground. In doing this he was assailed with rounds of grape and shot, and having stormed the battery he entered the village, carrying everything before him. Twenty-eight guns were here taken, and so desperately was this position defended that very few of the enemy escaped. Having finished this work at Maharajpoor, her Majesty's 39th, with the 86th Native Infantry, pushed forward towards the next position—Chonde. This was taken likewise, after a short but severe conflict. Here one of the enemy's tumbrils blew up, wounding Major Brag. A small work, mounting four guns on the left of this position, was assailed by the 39th Grenadiers, under Captain Campbell, supported by a wing of the 86th Native Infantry. This was taken possession of and the guns captured. The action lasted about three hours, and no less than fifty-six pieces of artillery, with nearly the whole of their baggage and camp equipage, fell into our hands. The Governor-General, with Lady Gough and daughter, and several other ladies, were on the field—his lordship at times in the heat of action, distributing money and oranges among the wounded.

The following is an abstract of the casualties sustained by the right wing of our army at the attack on Maharajpoor, :—

RETURN OF ORDNANCE CAPTURED FROM THE ENEMY BY THE RIGHT WING OF THE ARMY OF GWALIOR, ON THE 29TH DECEMBER, 1843.

Camp Choundah, 1st Jan., 1844.

Two 12 and one 18-pounder brass howitzers; one 4, four 6, six 42, three 5, fourteen 6, four 6½, two 6¼, three 7, two 8, and one 8½ pr. brass guns.—Destroyed, two 12 pr. iron howitzers; three 3, three 9½, three 6, and two 12 pr. iron guns —Total 35.

Several tumbrils of ammunition have been destroyed. In one of them cash to the amount of 3,141 Gwalior rupees was discovered, which will be paid into the military chest.

The left wing of our army, under the command of General Grey, were equally successful at Punniar, which lies about twelve miles from Gwalior. He had been directed to march direct on Punniar, for the purpose of hemming in the enemy, in conjunction with the right wing of our force. This, however, was frustrated, the enemy having sub-divided their force so as to meet both divisions of ours, and a portion having taken up a position at some miles distance from our right, completely screened by lofty hills, near the village of Mangor, a short distance from Punniar, where they began firing on our baggage. Brigadier Harriott, with a troop of Horse Artillery under Captain Bruce, took up a position beyond the baggage, where they returned the enemy's fire, but unable, from the impassable nature of the ground to bring them to close quarters, they returned to the rear under a heavy cannonade. The enemy, however, having changed their position to one four miles on the east of General Grey's camp, it was resolved immediately to attack them. This was done by her Majesty's 3d Buffs, with a company of Sappers and Miners, followed shortly afterwards by five companies of the 39th Native Infantry, some delay occasioned, it getting dark before the remaining force, amounting to 2000, could be brought up. The Buffs and Sappers then attacked the enemy's centre, opposed to a galling fire; they drove the Mahrattas from post to post, and captured a standard with eleven guns. Brigadier Anderson, with the 2d brigade, arrived only in time to finish the action. Having formed on the west of the hill, they attacked and routed the enemy, capturing the remainder of their guns.

Return of Casualties in the Left Wing of the Army of Gwalior, under the Command of Major-General J. Grey, C.B., in action near Punniar, December 29, 1843.

Camp, Punniar, December 29, 1843.

Staff—1 officer wounded.

1st and 3d Troops, 3d Brigade Horse Artillery.—1 rank and file and 1 horse killed

1st Company Sappers and Miners—3 rank and file wounded.

2d Light Cavalry—1 trooper and 2 horses killed; 3 rank and file wounded.

5th Irregular Cavalry—4 horses killed; 1 trooper and 3 horses wounded.

Her Majesty's 3d Buffs—1 officer, 4 sergeants, 7 rank and file, and 1 horse killed, 3 officers, 2 sergeants, and 56 rank and file wounded.

Her Majesty's 50th Foot—1 officer, and 8 rank and file killed; 1 officer, 3 sergeants, 1 drummer, and 36 rank and file wounded.

39th Native Infantry—1 sergeant and 12 rank and file killed; 2 European and 3 native officers, 5 sergeants and 39 rank and file wounded.

50th Native Infantry—3 rank and file wounded.

61st Native Infantry—1 rank and file wounded.

68th Native Infantry—1 rank and file wounded.

Sappers Contingent, 2 sergeants, and 24 rank and file wounded.

Total Killed—2 officers, 5 sergeants, 28 rank and file, and 8 horses. Wounded —7 European and 3 native officers, 12 sergeants, 1 drummer, 139 rank and file, and 3 horses.

Grand Total Casualties—217 men and 11 horses.

NAMES OF OFFICERS KILLED.

Captain Stewart, her Majesty's 3rd Buffs.

Captain Colman, her Majesty's 50th Foot.

NAMES OF OFFICERS WOUNDED.

Brigadier Valiet, 61st Native Infantry, severely.

Acting Brigadier Anderson, her Majesty's 50th Foot, severely.

Brevet Major Earle, 39th Native Infantry, severely.

Captain Magrath, her Majesty's 3rd Buffs, severely.

Brevet Captain Fullerton, 39th Native Infantry, severely.

Lieutenant Dorehill, her Majesty's 3rd Buffs, right side of chest by a jinjali ball.

Ensign Swetenham, her Majesty's 3rd Buffs, severely.

THE PUNJAUB.—This quarter still continues to progress in civil turmoil. Heera Sing, along with others, are implicated in abstracting considerable sums from the Lahore treasury, while some of the principal chiefs are withdrawing to the hills with the amount of their winnings in the game. Heera feels himself at the present in no pleasant position, in apprehensive of some sudden attack from us, he is adopting every means for meeting it, and this, with the numerous broils that are taking place among the chiefs, and the great discontent among the soldiery, it would not surprise us to see us set off for the hills soon. Our success in Gwalior has caused the chiefs here considerable vexation. Calculating on the reverse issue, it appears they had meditated an attack on our Scinde possessions. Sheer Mahomed is stated to be still near Candahar, and he is craving assistance from Heera Sing, but has not as yet received any answer to his requests. Goolab Sing has only withdrawn a portion of his twelve thousand to Jumboo; the rest are pocketed on the road between Lahore and the former place Hemadar Khoosyal Sing is said to have been implicated in the abduction of the young Maharajah, in concert with Jowahir Sing. He has twelve mile distance of consequence of this. Lena Sing is said to have been reconciled to the Prime Minister.

SCINDE.—The troops are recovering from their recent sickness, but very slowly. The 86th, on its way to Kurrachee, had about 500 sick, the 78th there had only about 80. The regiments at Sukkur had much improved; in Hyderabad they were otherwise. The 5th Native Infantry has been ordered to relieve the 4th Native Infantry at Shikarpoor, an attack from the Beloochees being apprehended. Sir C. Napier was about to start on an expedition somewhere about Sukkur, and proposes taking with him her Majesty's 78th Highlanders, the 86th, the 25th Native Infantry, with horse artillery and a detachment of the 2nd Cavalry. He is expected to start for Hyderabad early this month. The entire force of Bombay troops in Scinde on the 13th of January was 9870, of which 3990 were unfit for duty from sickness; the Scinde Horse, with the Bengal troops, to between 4000 and 5000.

The above intelligence was brought by the Great Liverpool steamer, which arrived at Malta, from Alexandria, on the 29th ult., bringing the overland India Mail, dispatched from Bombay by the Cleopatra steamer on the 1st inst., which reached Suez on the 20th February.

OFFICIAL DESPATCHES.

EXPLANATION OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH'S POLICY.

The following extracts from the proclamation issued by the Right Honourable the Governor-General of India will best explain the course of policy adopted by the noble lord:—

December 30, 1843.

On the decease of the late Maharaja Jhunkojee Rao Scindia, the British Government promptly acknowledged as his successor the Maharaja Jyajee Rao Scindia, who was nearest in blood to the late Maharaja, and whose adoption by the Maharanee, his highness's widow, was approved by the chiefs.

This declaration appeared to give general satisfaction. Nevertheless, after a short time the Mama Saheb was violently compelled to quit the Gwalior state in despite of the remonstrances of the British Resident.

The Dada Khasgee Wala assumed to the confidence of the Maharanee without possessing generally that of the chiefs, and by his influence various acts were committed insulting and injurious to the British Government.

The British Resident could not remain a spectator of transactions of which he vainly disapproved. On the expulsion of the Mama Saheb he was instructed to withdraw from Gwalior.

When it became known to the Resident that the Dada had withheld from the knowledge of the Maharanee and of the Durbar, a letter addressed to the Maharanee, conveying the sentiments of the British Government, the Resident peremptorily insisted upon the delivery of the Dada, as a necessary preliminary to the re-establishment of the customary relations with the Gwalior state. That act, on the part of the Dada, could not be regarded otherwise than as a virtual usurpation of the sovereign authority in the Gwalior state, which the British Government is bound to maintain in the house of Scindia.

The want of cordial co-operation on the part of the officers of the Gwalior state in the maintenance of order upon the frontier had long been a subject of just remonstrance, and various orders had been issued by the late Maharaja in accordance with the representations of the British Resident. These orders had but too often remained without due execution; but in consideration of the long illness of his highness, and of the consequent weakness of his administrations, the British Government had not pressed for satisfaction with all the rigour which the importance of the subject would have warranted. It knew the good disposition of the late Maharaja, and was willing to attribute his failure to effect what was right to the want of the power rather than of will.

But the recent occurrences at Gwalior, and the changed spirit in which the Administration has been conducted, no longer permit the continuance of this forbearance. The British Government must now peremptorily insist upon the adoption of measures for the establishment of order upon the frontier, and for the future security of its subjects.

The deplorable events which have last occurred at Gwalior, the hostile conflicts in the camp of the Maharaja at Indpore, and the practical suspension of all government of his Highness's territories, now impose upon the British Government the duty of intervention, not solely for the security of British interests, but for the execution, according to its true spirit and intentions, of the solemn engagement of a treaty.

By the treaty of Boorhanpoor, contracted with the Maharaja Dowlut Rao Scindia, the British Government engaged to maintain a force to be at all times ready on the requisition of the Maharaja, to protect the person of the Maharaja, his heirs, and successors, to overawe and chastise rebels or exciters of disturbance in his Highness's territories, and to reduce to obedience all offenders against his Highness's authority.

The tender age and the helpless state of the present Maharaja, rendered it impossible for him to address to the British Government such formal requisitions for aid as circumstances would justify him in demanding, and compel him to demand, under the provisions of the treaty of Boorhanpoor; but it would be inconsistent with the good faith, and injurious to the good name, of the British Government, were it to permit this inability to demand aid, which only gives the Maharaja new claims upon its protection, to deprive his Highness of that friendly support in its utmost need which it was the intention of Maharaja Dowlut Rao Scindia to ensure for ever by that treaty to himself, his heirs, and successors.

The Governor-General will, therefore, direct the immediate advance of forces amply sufficient to effect all the just purposes of the British Government—to obtain guarantees for the future security of its own subjects on the common frontier of the two states—to protect the person of the Maharaja, to quell disturbances within his Highness's territories, and to chastise all who shall remain in disobedience.

CAMP HINGONA, 27th Dec., 1843.

The British armies have entered the dominions of Scindia as the friends and allies of Maharaja, whose person and whose rights the British Government is bound by treaty to protect.

The British Government desires only to establish the just authority of the Maharaja over all his subjects, and to place upon firmer and permanent foundations that friendship between the two states which, for the mutual benefit of both, existed so long, and which, but the British Government, but the evil disposed advisers of the Maharanee, have now interrupted.

The British Government has no wish to dispossess those who oppose its armies, and are enemies to the Maharaja and disturbers of peace.

The chiefs will receive aid and treat as friends all peaceful cultivators and traders; they will pay for all supplies brought to the camp, give compensation for all injury that may be done to property, and protect, as far as they can, but such as act hostilely.

A strong government having been established at Gwalior, capable of maintaining the Maharaja's authority over all, and willing, as well as able, to preserve tranquillity on the common frontier, the British armies will return to their territory.

By order of the Right Hon. the Governor General of India,

I. CURRIE, Secretary to the Government of India, with the Right Hon. the Governor-General.

True Copies—

J. P. WILLOUGHBY, Secretary to the Governor.

GENERAL ORDERS BY THE RIGHT HON. THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.

Camp, Gwalior Residency, Jan. 4, 1844.

The Governor-General of India deeply laments the severe loss in killed and wounded which has been sustained in these operations; but it has been sustained in the execution of a great and necessary service, and the victories of Maharpoor and Punniar, while they have shed new glory upon the British army, have restored the authority of the Maharaja, and have given new security to the British empire in India.

The Governor-General cordially congratulates his Excellency the Commander-in-Chief upon the success of his able combinations, by which two victories were obtained on the same day, and the two wings of the army, proceeding from distant points, have been now united under the walls of Gwalior.

To his Excellency, and to Major-General Grey, and to all the general and other officers, and to all the soldiers of the army, the Governor-General, in the name of the Government and of all the people of India, offers his most grateful acknowledgments of the distinguished service they have performed; nor can he withhold the tribute of his admiration just y due to the devoted courage manifested by all ranks in actions so arduous, who yielded their numerous and well served artillery only with their lives.

The Governor-General's especial thanks are due to her Majesty's 39th and 40th Regiments, to the 2nd and 16th Regiments of Native Infantry, and to the 56th Regiment of Native Infantry, which took with the bayonet the batteries in front of Maharajpore.

Her Majesty's 56th Regiment had the peculiar fortune of adding to the honour of having won at Plassey the first great battle which laid the foundation of the British empire in India, the farther honour of thus nobly contributing to this, as it may be hoped, the last and crowning victory by which that empire has been secured.

Her Majesty's 40th Regiment, and the 2nd and 16th Regiments of Native Grenadiers, serving under the personal command of the Governor-General, gualified as soldiers, and well supported the character of the ever-victorious army of Gwalior.

To corps of Major-General Grey, suddenly attacked at Punniar, after a long march, carried the several strong positions of the enemy with a resolution no advantage of ground could enable him to withstand; and her Majesty's 3rd Buffs and 39th Regiment added new lustre to the reputation they gained in the Punjaub wars.

Everywhere, at Maharajpoor and at Punniar, the British and the native troops emulating each other, and united by the same spirit of devotion to their sovereign, proved that an army so composed, and united by the bonds of mutual esteem and confidence, must ever remain invincible in Asia.

The Government of India will, as a mark of its grateful sense of their distinguished merit, present to every General and other officer, and to every soldier engaged in the battles of Maharajpoor and Punniar an Indian star of honour, made out of the guns taken at these battles; and all officers and soldiers in the service of the Government of India will be permitted to wear the star with their uniforms.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is requested to furnish the Governor-General with nominal rolls of all the officers and soldiers engaged in the two battles respectively, in order that the star presented to each may be inscribed with the name of the battle in which he was engaged.

A triumphal medal, commemorative of the campaign of Gwalior, will be erected at Calcutta, and inscribed with the names of all who fell in the two battles.

The Governor-General directs that the words, "Maharajpoor" and "Punniar" shall be borne upon the colours or standards and appointments of the several regiments, troops, and companies, named below as respectively engaged in those battles.

A royal salute and feu-de-joie will be fired at all the stations of the army, on the receipt of this order.

(Signed as before.)

The fall of Major General Churchill and several other officers is thus alluded to in the despatch of Sir Hugh Gough, the Commander in Chief:—

"Several acts of individual heroism occurred on the day; none exceeded that of Major General Churchill, C.B., Quartermaster-General of her Majesty's forces in India, and Captain Somerset of the Grenadier Guards, your lordship's Military Secretary, whom you kindly allowed to act on my staff, and whom I sent with Brigadier Cureton's brigade to communicate to me the movements of that corps. The two gallant officers nobly fell, having received several wounds in personal reconnoitring. Major-General Churchill her Majesty's service will experience a great loss: he died during the night, after amputation of the leg; but I am glad to add there is every hope that Captain Somerset will do well, though severely wounded.

I regret to say that our loss has been very severe, infinitely beyond what I calculated on; indeed I find not do justice to the gallantry of my opponents. Their force however so greatly exceeded ours, particularly in artillery, the position of their guns was so commanding, they were so well served, and determinedly defended, both by their gunners and their infantry, and the peculiar difficulties of the country giving the defending force so great advantages that it could not be otherwise.

In the return of killed I have greatly to deplore the loss of lieutenant-Colonel Sanders, C.B., of the Engineers, than whom this army, with its numerous list of devoted soldiers, could not boast a more enthusiastic officer.

It is also my painful duty to record my deep regret at the loss of a most valuable officer, Major Cromwellin, C.B., of the 1st Light Cavalry, who died of wounds received when nobly leading his corps in support of the 5th Brigade of Infantry.

THE MAGAZINES FOR MARCH.

The present month's crop is not distinguished by any very seasonable vigour, although some of the continuations promise neverending luxuriance.

TAIT opens with a brief, but pithy article, on "the Session." With the exception of "Australian Sketches," of Mrs. Gore's "Blanks and Prizes," and some spirited poetry, the remainder of the number is exclusively reviews of new books, of sterling worth, as usual. The notice of Miss Bremer's "Strife and Peace" is especially attractive.

HOOD'S MAGAZINE is strongest in the poetical department; its prose drolleries are not uniformly successful; one of the papers, too, is but a feeble imitation of the masterpiece of Dickens. Here and there, in the other pieces, we find some traits of humour; but the magazine altogether wants a "feature," beyond its poetical contributions. The "Echo," explanatory of the delay of the number, is a very amusing piece of mondetein. Here is some droll advice:—

"If you want to grow a good crop of Hair, and more stummuck. And you ought to wear flannin, and take tonicks. Do you ever drink Hasses Pail? It's as good as cammomile tea. But above all, there's one thing I'd recommend to you, Steal Wine. It's here a sense to sun invalids."

THE NEW MONTHLY commences bravely with a legend by Ingoldsby, entitled "the Lord of Thoulouse;" a very sparkling affair, in quaint humour, equalling either of the celebrated legends. A paper entitled, "the Censorship of the English Drama," relates the circumstances under which the performance of a play, entitled "Richelieu in Love," has been prohibited by the licenser: the play is described as "a fine piece of true comedy writing." Mrs. Trollope's paper, "The Butt," is concluded: it is life-like and bustling throughout. Of "Enquire Within" (the confessions of a key-hole), we can scarcely say as much: the author is usually felicitous in the practical titles of his papers, but he rarely carries out their promise; still it is hard to shine in such a subject. "The Converse

In the third act he distinguished himself still more, but we have seen more enthusiastic receptions for inferior artistes. He was encored, but apologized by proxy for his unwillingness to repeat. At the fall of the curtain he was loudly called for, and made his acknowledgments in a most graceful manner.

We have not much to applaud in the getting up of the piece: the scenery is very mediocre, and the costumes, decorations, &c., of that kind which it would take more trouble to rummage out than cost to originate. The house was most crowded.

COVENT GARDEN.

Since our last the Promenade Concerts at this tastefully decorated salon have ceased, and where but lately the hall was resounding with the echoes of the greatest compositions of the first masters "now silence sits, all desolate and dark." "Where is the song sudden that Mac Murrough cannot find it?" the "scent of the roses will hang round the vase in which they twice once been distilled;" but music, when she departs, leaves nothing behind but a recreant memory that she could not stay for ever, and that like all sweet things she is born to die. All those who love to hear undivided and combined genius and talent, mingled in one splendid orchestra, must confess that they have been much indebted to the taste, judgment, and industry of M. Jullien. He has brought forward some of the greatest compositions in existence, and has taken care to have had them performed by the first artistes in the world. Altogether a greater assemblage of talent was never before convened, and we long for the time when M. Jullien will again commence a repetition of his delightful Promenade Concerts.

HAYMARKET.

An adaptation from "La Fille du Regiment," which, with Donizetti's music, was so popular at the Opera Comique, in Paris, was produced at this house on Wednesday night, and was triumphantly successful. It is the production of Mr. Buckstone, and is called "Josephine; or, the Fortune of War." The music, for Donizetti's sake, ought to have been omitted altogether, there being but two airs and a couple of choruses retained, which, in their English version, could not very well have justice done to them. The acting of Mrs. Fitzwilliam in the part of Josephine, "the vivandiere of the Twenty-first Regiment" (a girl who had been found when a child upon a battle-field, and subsequently reared as the protegé of the whole corps), was unutterable. Buckstone, too, was admirable, as also J. Bland, in the character of a rough but honest old sergeant. Altogether, we have seldom seen a more lively or effective piece.

ST. JAMES'S.

Mons. Achard is certainly a most versatile and able artiste—we regret that his engagement terminates this week. After his most excellent performance of Guillaume Mongeron, in the petite-piece of "Truman," he appeared on Monday last, in another, entitled "Trile-Talocheur; ou, La Tirelire," in which he earned the warmest approvals in a part admirably suited to his powers.

ADELPHI.

A new piece by the indefatigable Mr. Edward Stirling, entitled "Ulrica; or, The Prisoner of State," was produced at this house on Monday last, and was highly successful. The incidents are the old favourite melo-dramatics a little kalenteseoped into new forms. Mrs Yates's acting, as Ulrica, was in her usual style of energetic feeling and power. The production was announced for repetition amidst universal plaudits.

BAL MASQUE AT COVENT GARDEN.

On Monday evening, this long-announced entertainment was given with great éclat. The theatre was fitted up by Mr. F. Gye; and it is but justice to say that whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the propriety of the occasion, there was but one note of commendation as to the arrangements provided for it. The vast pit was entirely floored, level with the stage, and the whole was covered with a brilliant carpet. The distance from the entrance by the pit central door, to the extremity of the stage, appeared quite marvellous. From the ceiling of the auditory, around the great lustre, were suspended superb or-molu lamps; the fronts of the boxes were festooned with flowers, and in the centre front of each box was suspended a most splendid and emblazoned banner from the property-room. Thus, the appearance of the auditory was gay and festal in the extreme; and each circle of boxes and the two galleries were filled with company, who seemed to enjoy the scene as much as the actors in it. The stage was fitted up as a vast tent, with pink striped drapery; and at the back was placed the orchestra, containing nearly 100 performers, with M. Jullien at their head. On each side were ranged mirth as of blooming plants: this portion was brilliantly lighted, and the effect of the whole floated in mid-air, the fascinating words "Vive la Danse," in what appeared to be brilliantly burnished steel; then over this welcome command was suspended a star of the same glittering material; and both devices being kept in tremulous motion, by playing in the flood of light, had a most fairy-like splendour. In a large recess behind the orchestra were served the refreshments. We must not, however, omit to notice the pleasing effect of white drapery columns entwined with flowers—a truly classical decoration. We, who have witnessed nearly all the entertainments of this kind during the last 20 years, do not hesitate to affirm that no masked ball ever took place in England but the scene of Monday night been equalled. The musical arrangements were also of a very superior kind. Each change of dance was denoted by the waving of a coloured flag, inscribed, "Waltz," "Quadrille," &c.; and order was well preserved among the dancers by masters of the ceremonies, in court dresses, wands, &c.; until, towards midnight, the immense area became filled with company. The entertainment was, in plain English, a masquerade: the display of character dresses was occasionally superb, and rarely ill-appointed. Supper was served to such as were provided with tickets, soon after one o'clock, in the saloon of the theatre; and the entertainment was protracted until the streets in the neighbourhood began to re-assume their busy hum. M. Jullien has in this, as in every other instance, proved himself an admirable Heidegger, or master of the revels; though we fancy we hear a wag at our elbow say—

Oh! such a scene of uproar and drollery,
Nothing like the drollery of true wit—
But a soft oozing nesting of tom-foolery,
Where a body could'nt either stand or sit.

A clear idea of the gay scene at its meridian may be gathered by reference to our engraving of the Masked Ball at PARIS, in No. 44 of our journal.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

The proprietor of the English Opera House has at length found a lessee, whose long experience in theatrical affairs is likely to do some good towards the regeneration of the drama at this ill-fated establishment. Little Keeley, supported by gentlemen who are willing to advance money in the speculation, has taken the theatre for a given period; and as the company he proposes to engage will consist of many of the best actors in the legitimate school, there is no doubt that success may be depended upon. The house will be opened on Easter Monday.

Madame Thilon (formerly Miss Hunt), the celebrated cantatrice at the Opera Comique, Paris, is engaged at the Princess's Theatre, and will shortly make her first appearance in an English version of Auber's opera of "Les Diamans de la Couronne." The great composer will himself wield the baton on the occasion.

The new entertainment to be produced at the Princess's on Easter Monday will be from the pen of Mr. Albert Smith, who is now occupied in constructing an extravaganza upon the principle of the "Yellow Dwarf," the "Magic Mirror," &c.—pieces which have gained considerable popularity at the same theatre.

GOOD NEWS FOR THE ADMIRERS OF SHAKSPEARE. The engagement of Mr. Charles Kean at Drury-lane Theatre, will, it is reported, terminate on Monday next.

The new musical drama of "Josephine; or, the Fortune of War," is a new version of the same piece which was produced at Drury-lane last season under the title of "The Daughter of the Regiment," Mrs. Stirling playing the character which is now assigned to Mrs. Fitzwilliam.

The new piece to be produced at the Strand Theatre on Monday next, under the title of the "Soldier's Orphan; or the Fortune of War," is not an adaptation of Donizetti's opera, "La Fille du Regiment," but an original domestic drama, by Mr. George Bennett, the performer.

It is rumoured that Mr. Macready will, upon his return from America, become the lessee of Covent Garden Theatre.

The comedy of "Taming of the Shrew," is about to be revived at the Haymarket, the manager being desirous of producing the play in its original form, and not in the modern shape of a three-act drama, which is scarcely to be recognised as "from the text of Shakspeare." The policy of selecting this piece for representation is somewhat questionable; but after the decided manner in which the poet has been treated of late, it will be interesting to observe what the actors are capable of doing (even in one of the least popular plays) with the language and characters involved in the original work.

A new mythological burlesta, founded upon the story of "Dido and Eneas," is about to be brought forward at the Strand Theatre. The piece is an original one.

The new drama produced on Thursday night at the Haymarket, under the intelligible title of "Der Neust Teufel," is an adaptation by Mr Albert Sebbes, the publisher and proprietor of the "Bijou" Almanack. The Chamberlain having with more than usual scrupulosity, objected to the English interpretation of "Teufel," it was found necessary, in order to carry out the intention of the writer, to preserve the title in its original German.

The Italian Opera will be opened this (Saturday) evening, with Donizetti's opera of "Adelia," (in which Madame Persiani will appear), and a new ballet, by Perrot, founded on Victor Hugo's story of "Esmeralda." Mdlle. Carlotta Grisi will play the heroine; supported by Mdlle. Adelaide Fessi, M. Perrot, and M. St. Leon.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

We are enabled confidently to state that Rear-Admiral Sir George Seymour, Bart., one of the Lords of the Admiralty, will succeed Rear-Admiral Thomas, as Commander in Chief in the Pacific. It is said the gallant admiral will hoist his flag in a line-of-battle ship, and not a frigate, and that it will be either the Albion or Rodney.

THE EXPERIMENTAL 12-GUN BRIGS.—The five experimental 12-gun brigs now building for a trial of their increasing or decreasing rig rapidly, will all be launched in the course of next month, or early in May. They are to be armed alike with ten 32-pounder guns, and two 18-pounders, and to have similar masts, yards, and sails, and each a complement of 130 men. The following is the correct statement of the names of the vessels, the parties by whom they have been severally designed, and the places where they are being built:—The Flying Fish, designed by the Surveyor of the Navy, Captain Sir W. Symonds, building at Pembroke. The Daring designed by Mr. White, ship-builder, at Cowes, built at Portsmouth. The Mutine, designed by Mr. Fincham, the master shipwright at Chatham Dockyard, building at Chatham. The Espoir, designed by Messrs. Read, Chatfield, and Creuze, the committee of naval architects at Chatham, building at Chatham. The Osprey, designed by Mr. Blake, master-shipwright at Portsmouth Dockyard, building at Portsmouth.

The detachments from the depot in the Isle of Wight embarked on board the Resistance, at Portsmouth, on Monday. The Echo steam-tug, from the dockyard, was sent with two flat boats in tow to Cowes, and although the weather was excessively wet and wind blowing strong the troops were put on board without any difficulty, and in a short space of time; they consisted of 200 rank and file, as follows:—Royal Artillery Brigade, Captain Boyle and Lieutenant the Hon. P. Berrington, and 80 rank and file, for Halifax. The 71st Regiment Reserved Battalion, Captain Speer, Ensign Hackett 150 rank and file; 33d Regiment, Lieutenant G. Philipps, and 70 rank and file for Quebec. The Resistance sailed on Tuesday for Cork, where she will take in other detachments for Nova Scotia and Quebec. She will first proceed from Cork to Halifax, by which time the ice in the St. Lawrence will be gone, when she will proceed to Quebec.

The Prince George transport, Lieutenant Ward, agent, with troops for Bermuda; the Columbo, East Indiaman, and the Montreal, American packet, all sailed from Portsmouth on Tuesday morning.

The Victoria and Albert, Queen's yacht, had her masts and funnel taken out under the sheers on Saturday, and was brought into one of the shed-docks on Tuesday morning, from which the Magicienne was removed to make room for her.

The Styx steam-vessel, Captain Vidal, having had her repairs completed, went out of the mouth at Woolwich on Tuesday morning, and after the accident to the engineer, proceeded down the river, in company with the Rattler, on an experimental trip.

The Lucifer, 2, steam surveying vessel, Commander Frazer, sailed on Tuesday from Woolwich for the coast of Ireland, to relieve the Comet, part of whose officers are transferred to the Lucifer.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

DISTRESSING SHIPWRECKS.—The City of Cardiff steamer was completed on Wednesday morning, on a dangerous shoal a few miles off Mumbles Haven, on the coast of Lincolnshire, and the manner in which the crew escaped is truly miraculous. Soon after she had started from Honfleur, the wind commenced blowing very roughly, heavy falls of snow now and then falling. She still, however, made progress, notwithstanding the boisterous state of the weather, and at an early hour on the above morning the Skerries light at the entrance to Wainfleet harbour was descried. Just as she had made a point of Dogbank Sand, a dangerous shoal off that part of the coast, the snow began to thicken so much as to render it impossible to see more than a few yards ahead, consequently it was with some difficulty her course could be noticed. At that moment the greatest alarm prevailed amongst the crew, as the vessel was about to be carried on to the shoal. Notwithstanding the wind and snow still kept increasing, the crew manfully attended to the helm and other duties. Their exertions, however, were fruitless, for in a very short period she was driven with great force on to the body of the sands. The captain, anticipating that she might not be so seriously damaged as to prevent her being got off, directed some of the crew to use every effort to lighten her, while others were engaged in sounding the pumps and hoisting signals of distress. These endeavours had the desired effect so far as getting her off the shoal; but on her being once more afloat it was soon discovered that she had several feet of water in the hold, which clearly indicated that her keel had been carried away or bottom stove in. All hands instantly went to work at the pumps in the hope of saving her by running on shore. Ere many minutes had elapsed, however, the water got beyond their command, and was fast extinguishing the fires; and it appeared very evident to the crew that if they did not immediately retreat into the ship's boat, and shove off they would inevitably perish with the ill fated steamer, as she was then fast sinking. They accordingly did so, and had not gained more than two hundred yards from her before they perceived her gradually disappear. The crew then exerted every nerve in pulling towards the land, and were exposed to much danger; in fact, it was considered a miracle that the boats could have weathered the storm. After buffeting about for several hours, the life boat, under the command of Samuel Moody, of Saegress, proceeded to their assistance, and conveyed them safely into the harbour, although in a state of deplorable exhaustion. At Wainfleet they were treated most kindly by the inhabitants, and food and clothing were supplied them by Mr. J. Smith, the secretary of the Shipwrecked Seamen's and Fishermen's Benevolent Society, who also provided them with money to return to their homes at Hull. It is almost needless to state that the City of Carlisle is totally lost, together with the cargo. The damage done to the ship in getting off the coast during the late gales has been immense, more particularly off the eastern and northern, and it is roughly estimated that upwards of forty vessels must have been wrecked.

VESSELS LOADING IN LIVERPOOL.—We find, by the Custom-house list, that no fewer than 249 ships, most of them of large tonnage, are loading for foreign ports and our own possessions and colonies abroad. The ports for which they are destined comprise almost every accessible port or place of trade throughout the known world. Of coasting vessels loading the number is also greater than usual at any one time, being about 160. With the newest and largest and small, loading or discharging, the docks, spacious as they are, are filled to repletion. This affords a gratifying indication of a revival of trade.

Miss Simpson, of Bradley, lately deceased, was, it is said, possessed of a very large amount of personal property (estimated by some at £200,000), which falls to the families of Miss Simpson's sisters—the present Lady Ravensworth and the late Lady Paul.

The South Western Railway are now having wires laid down for an electric telegraph, on Bains's principle, one wire of which is in the Thames at Nine Elms, and the other in a river, about five or six miles off, the earth between completing the galvanic circuit. If this succeeds it is intended by the Admiralty to carry the telegraph on to Portsmouth.

The King of Holland, during a recent visit to St. Hubert, went to hunt in an adjoining forest. The party soon found two wolves, a male and female; the former escaped, but the latter advanced towards the King, who, when she was at the distance of 60 paces, fired and wounded her, and was a second shot killed the animal. This wolf, which is of extraordinary size, was forwarded to the Palace of Laeken, whence the Queen ordered it to be sent to Brussels to be stuffed.

The Semaphore of Marseilles relates that on the 28th ult., as it was coming on to blow hard, an English vessel wished to change her berth, and got better shelter by mooring nearer to the Quai aux Huiles. In attempting this she struck against a French ship, and after some words, the English sailors went on the deck of the French vessel, and so ill-treated her captain and the only two men who were on board with him, pulling down their flag that they were obliged to call for assistance. The captain of the port was obliged to interfere, with some of his men, to put an end to the fray.

THE CASE OF SUPPOSED TRANCE AT DARTFORD.—On Wednesday last, as on the previous days, several professional gentlemen, and others, visited the Oxford Arms, to view the body of young Mr. Pearce, or to make inquiries. The permission, however, has this week been very limited, in consequence of some persons having represented themselves as Mr. Bransby Cooper and Mr. Callaway, which, however, proves to have been a gross imposition. A London surgeon viewed the body on Saturday, and gave a certificate to the parents, it is understood, to the effect that decomposition had taken place. Mrs. Pearce, however, would not give up hope, and perseveringly, up to the present time, has applied warm water to the body. On Monday, a party from London arrived in a private carriage, with the intent to make a post-mortem examination, but were peremptorily refused. It is intended that a post-mortem examination shall be made when decomposition is beyond all doubt.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE BLIND GIRL, TO HER MOTHER.

Mother, they say the stars are bright,
And the broad flowers are blue;
I dream of them by day and night,
And think them all like you.

I cannot touch the distant skies—
The stars never speak to me—
Yet your sweet looks are
And bend with those of thee.

I know not why, but oft I dream
Of the far land of bliss
And when I hear thy voice, I deem
That Heaven is like to this.

When my sad heart is thine is pressed,
My follies all forgiven,
Sweet p easure warms my beating breast,
And this I say, is Heaven

O, Mother, will the God above
Forgive my faults like thee?
Will he for me our sins care and love
On a b und thing like me?

Dear Mother, leave me not alone;
Be with me when I die.
Lead thy blind daughter to the throne,
And stay in yonder sky

SARAH MELODIST.

EXALTED FEELING.

"Don't think of me," as the man said who was on the point of being flung over the gallery into the pit, "but recollect those beneath me."

A TRUE'S RESPECTABILITY.

In conversation we often wound the feelings of others without intending it. Mr. Davidson, talking with a Tung on the subject of a clever robbery, tells that "the lively, nay, ultra professional joy which illuminated his countenance tempted me to exclaim, rather unguardedly, "Perhaps you were employed in that little affair yourself, or it may have been exercised by some of your agents?" His manner immediately changed from "lively to severe," and with a look that might have frozen a much less innocent querist, he exclaimed, with a sneer, "No, Sir! murder, and not robbery, is my profession."

THE BIBLE.

The Bible is the most entertaining and instructive book in the world; and, even independently of its divine origin, and the importance of its moral truths, it is an invaluable treasure; and, as such, has always been esteemed by persons of true taste and correct judgment, on account of its interesting and important historical facts; its incomparably faithful and touching sketches of human character; the combined simplicity and sublimity of its eloquence; and the unmistake majesty, beauty, splendour, and correctness of its poetical imagery. Unlike the works of man, these beauties lose not their charm by familiarity; nor is there any danger of exhausting them by research. It is a fathomless mine; thousands in every age are intellectually and spiritually enriched by it; yet without one of its sacred stores being diminished; and succeeding ages will still find it full.—ESTHER HEWLETT.

VISIONS OF THE PAST.

Oh! mine own heart, where are they!
Visions of thine earlier hour—
When thy young heart's colours were Like those on the morning flower.
Where's the trusting confidence
Of affection deep and true?
And the spirit, sunshine like,
Which o'er all their gladness threw?
Gone, gone—they all are gone.

FALSE ESTIMATE OF CHARACTER.

Great characters are sometimes much-evous to mankind. It was thus that the high conception that had been formed of the character of Aristotle enabled him to retain mankind two thousand years in ignorance.

A COQUETTE.

She may be compared to tinder spread to catch sparks, but it is seldom she succeeds in lighting a match.

DUTY OF OLD AGE

A material part of the duty of the aged consists in studying to be useful to the race who succeeds them. To them it belongs to impart to the young the fruit of their long experience, and to warn them of the various dangers of life; by wise counsel to temper their precipitate ardour; and by precept and example to lure them to love piety as a virtue. Aged wisdom, when joined to acknowledged virtue, exerts an authority over the human mind greater than that which arises from power and station. It can check the most froward, abash the most profligate, and strike with awe the most giddy and unthinking.—DR. BLAIR.

THE USE OF PHILOSOPHY.

When Bernard Tasso remonstrated with his son on his indiscreet preference of philosophy to jurisprudence, and angrily demanded "What has philosophy done for you?" the son coolly replied, "It has taught me to bear with meekness the reproofs of a father."

A HINT TO WIVES.

When a woman seeks to guide her husband, it should not be like one who breaks a horse to his own purpose, using bit and spur, now checking, now goading his career; but like the mariner, who raises the ship, directs it by a single touch, while none can see the power that rules its motion.—MRS. S. C. HALL

THE FLOWER OF THE DESERT.

Why art thou thus in thy beauty cast,
O lonely loneliest flower?
Where the sun-ray hath never past,
From human hearth or bower.

I pity thee, for thy heart of love,
Thy gooning heart!
That fain would breathe out, with each wind to rove
In vain lost thing.

I pity thee for thy wasted bloom,
For thy glory's fleeting hour;
For the desert place, thy living tomb,
O lonely, loneliest flower.

MRS. HEMANS.

A NIGHT AT SEA.

Imagine us all creeping into our dormitories; not that we are sleepy, but the violent pitching of the ship makes it difficult, if not impossible, for any mere landsman to sit or stand. Indeed, it would not have been easy to sleep in spite of the concert that prevailed. First a beam in one corner seemed taken in labour, then another began groaning; plank after plank caimed in with its peculiar creak—every bulkhead seemed to fret with an ache in it—sometimes the floor complained of a strain—next the ceiling cried out with a pain in its joints—and then came a general wheezing sound, as if the whole vessel was in the last stage of a collapse. Add to these, the wild howling of the wind through the rigging, till the demon of the storm seemed to be playing coronachs over us on an Eolian harp, the clatter of the hail, the constant rushes of water round and over head, and at every uncommon pitch, a chorus of female shrieks from the next cabin aboard.

THE BELLES OF ST. OMER.

At the commencement of the season the head milliner receives an importation of caps, bonnets, cauer ne, and other articles de la dernier mode, from Paris. A day is appointed for their exposure, and that day may have a fair chance, the awful hour of six in the morning is appointed for the beginning of the show. The loadstone of fashion has power. French and English ladies rush from their beds to the scene of action, and the earliest riser is rewarded with the first choice of the most beautiful things in the world, while the laggard has the chance of the ugliest as a reward for her lateness.

THE FIRST INQUISITOR.

The inquisition was established in 1478, in Castile, by the united authority of Ferdinand and Isabella. Juan de Torquemadas, a Dominican, the confessor of Isabella, whom he induced before her marriage to take an oath, that if she ever ascended the throne, she would employ all her power in persecuting heretics and infidels, was the first Grand Inquisitor. In the space of fourte n years he summoned before his Holy Tribunal 200,000 persons, and condemned 6000 to the flames.—SISMONDI.

Great and romantic events never operate so fully, or at least so inspiringly, upon the generation when witnessed them, as upon those which succeed, when fancy aids her colouring to truth.

LONGEVITY.

The oldest man in France, and perhaps in Europe, M. Noel de Guersonnerre, living at Montmartre, near Paris, completed his 116th year on the 29th ult., and is in the enjoyment of the most perfect health. A few days ago, another centenarian, whose age was is not less remarkable, died at Charolles, in the department of Saone and Loire. M. V. M. Ducrerle, who had accomplished his 144th year, was car ied off on the 12th of February last, by an attack of apoplexy. He was a correspon ing member of the Academies of Cluions-sur-Marne, Caen, and Macon, and has left a great number of manuscripts, and about 200 chronicles on the former province of Charolais. His eldest son, M. Jean Ducrerle, who has just entered his 87th year, has not a single gray hair, and enjoys the most robust health.

POPULAR PORTRAITS.—No. XLIX.

RICHARD OASTLER.

Mr. Oastler is in all respects a remarkable man; and therefore entitled to as place in our gallery of national portraits. He is remarkable for his talents—for his habits—his physognomy—the expression of his countenance—his principles, and firm adherence to them—his perseverance—his energy—his courage—his moral and political position—for his vigorous oratory—and especially for the extraordinary controul which he exercises over the minds of great assemblages of working men, the secret of which is, his long-tried honesty, and his disposition and ability to promote the real interests of the poor and the oppressed. His motto is, "the Altar, the Throne, and the Cottage." In no instance of an active life has he been known to deviate from it.

MR. OASTLER.

Richard Oastler was born in St. Peter's-square, Leeds, on the 20th of December, 1789. He was the son of Robert Oastler—the youngest of eight children. His grandfather lived and died upon the paternal estate, at Moorhouse, Kirkby Wiske, in the North Riding of Yorkshire. His forefathers, and the forefathers of the present Earl of Harewood, were substantial yeomen, occupying neighbouring farms, and connected by business, friendship, and congenial disposition, for many generations.

In early life Robert Oastler formed an intimacy with the celebrated John Wesley, while under the fostering care of his uncle, John Oastler, at Thirsk; and this intimacy afterwards ripened into such close friendship that Robert Oastler's house was Wesley's home whenever the latter visited the town or neighbourhood of Thirsk in the prosecution of his missionary labours. In process of time Robert Oastler removed with his family to Leeds; and it is worthy of remark that the venerable Wesley, on the last visit he paid to that part of Yorkshire, and very shortly before his death, took the little Richard up in his arms, and solemnly and affectionately blessed him.

Mr. Oastler's father for many years followed the business of a cloth merchant, in Leeds, and most actively exerted himself in the cause of charity and local improvement. His mother was the daughter of Mr. Joseph Scott, of Hutchcroft, a member of an ancient and honourable family, and a woman of great but unostentatious piety.

At eight years of age, Richard, the subject of this sketch, was sent for education to Fulneck, near Leeds, the celebrated Moravian establishment; where, until he was sixteen, his mind was stored with useful knowledge; but more particularly was he taught the importance of religion, and the inestimable value of the Christian duties and virtues.

At seventeen, Mr. Oastler entertained a strong desire to be allowed to prepare himself for the bar, but his father's wishes were in the direction of the trade. Subsequently a kind of compromise took place: he was articled to Mr. Charles Watson, an eminent architect, then of Wakefield, afterwards of York; but this profession, after following it for two years, he was obliged to relinquish on account of weak sight. He then turned to business as a commission agent; in 1816 he married Miss Mary Tatham, a member of a highly respected Nottingham family. In 1819 he found the commercial vicissitudes which followed the change from war to peace press so heavily on him, in common with hundreds of others, that he was constrained to wind up his affairs, but he did so with an integrity of mind and purpose which gained him universal respect, and many proffers of assistance, which latter, however, he thankfully yet positively declined.

In July, in the year last mentioned, Mr. Oastler's father died, then holding the situation of steward to Thomas Thornhill, Esq., the owner of large estates in the West Riding. The vacant post, without solicitation, was offered to the son, who at once accepted it, and removed from Leeds to Fixby Hall.

From the time that Mr. Oastler gave his attention to politics to the present hour, he has been a zealous Church and King Tory, free, however, from the slightest taint of intolerance or uncharitableness; and so early as 1807 he actively engaged in the support of Wilberforce and Lascelles, and warmly advocated negro amelioration and the suppression of the slave-trade.

Mr. Oastler holds that the state should provide for the proper celebration of public worship, and give the means of Christian education to the mass of the people. But he is severe in his estimate of clerical duty. He tolerates no yielding in this respect to power, worldliness, or expediency. He was, therefore, strongly opposed to "Catholic Emancipation," for religious reasons as well as on political grounds. His notions of what he expects from the Church may be gathered from two of his works, "Vicarial Tithes," and "A Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury." These spirited productions arose both in the form of a memorable struggle between the parish of Halifax and its vicar respecting small tithes; in which contest the parish prevailed, and by the issue of which Mr. Thornhill's Yorkshire estates were benefited to the amount of from £15,000 to £18,000. Mr. Oastler's efforts on this occasion cost him six months' illness, and an expenditure of many hundreds of pounds, out of his private resources. In the district in which he lived, he was, notwithstanding the part he took in the Halifax struggle, a general peace-maker and arbitrator.

Mr. Oastler's philanthropy did not begin abroad and end before it arrived at home. In 1829, his attention was first attracted to the report of the Factory System, and the sufferings of the poor factory children. He began by calling public attent on to the subject in the local newspapers. At first his statements were received by the public generally as "exaggerations," "impossibilities;" and by the great body of the mill-owners with that bitterness of hostility which invaded interests too often prompts. Mr. J. Wood, of Bradford, however, stepped forward to his assistance, though himself an extensive mill-owner, and afforded the powerful aid of his practical knowledge and his purse. Oastler had rushed into the truly holy war single-handed, and alike courageously and ably maintained the fight; but backed, first by Mr. Wood, and afterwards by the talented Michael Thomas Sadler (whom he had known from boyhood), the "factory agitation," as it was called, spread rapidly over the woollen and cotton districts; committees were constituted, and meetings were held, to whom Mr. Oastler and Mr. Sadler addressed spirit-stirring speeches, and Mr. Sadler soon had the honour of piloting the question into the House of Commons, where he succeeded in obtaining a parliamentary inquiry, and afterwards brought forward (founded upon the evidence an report) the Ten Hour Bill. The Whig Ministers then in power, literally found themselves compelled, as it were, by public opinion, to take the matter up; and, though Sadler lived not to see it, a Factory Protection Bill was passed: vastly short, indeed, of the requirements of the case; yet this enactment, imperfect as it is, besides doing much good at home, has served as the model of laws for factory regulation in France, Germany, and the United States of America. That act, which gave rise to the ameliorations in other branches of labour obtained by Lord Ashley, is now about to undergo improvement.

It cannot be a matter of surprise that Mr. Oastler declared himself a strenuous opponent of the New Poor Law the moment that its character and objects became known. In one of his earliest letters on this subject, he predicted all that has since taken place. In 1834, he said: "Never was there such a libel on England shmen as the Poor Law—this Malthusian act—which is framed on the presumption that 'the labourers of England are idle, and will not work;' and that they deserve to be pined to death, or vanished from their native soil."

His movement against the New Poor Law, however, made him an enemy in a quarter where he had hitherto found a fast friend—Mr. Thornhill. That gentleman had encouraged Mr. Oastler in his factory agitation, but looked with far other feelings upon the Poor Law agitation. Mr. Thornhill, at first, satisfied himself with expressing his disapprobation in advice; from advice he advanced to command; and Mr. Oastler's prompt, but respectfully-worded, reply was, that he could give up his situation, but not his principles and sense of public duty. Some time elapsed. At length (May 29, 1838), Mr. Thornhill, having been insulted (as he supposed) by a handbill which some enemy or injudicious friend to Mr. Oastler had put out at Huddersfield, containing personal allusions to the honourable gentleman, he sent the zealous steward a formal dismissal.

Mr. Oastler received the intimation with regret, but not with surprise. He prepared for quitting Fixby, where he had resided, as his father's successor, upwards of eighteen years. The day of departure was a memorable one; he was escorted by at least twenty thousand persons, who accompanied him into Huddersfield, and there he took leave of his friends in a long and heartmelting speech, but in which, though delivered under circumstances of great irritation, and not a little wrong, there was not one word derogatory to Mr. Thornhill's character or motives.

Circumstances, nevertheless, led to a more decided rupture. For sixteen years out of the eighteen of service, Mr. Oastler had received a salary of no more than £300 per annum, though he had to keep up in some degree the hospitality of the ancient hall, and was subjected to frequent personal expense which did not form allowable items of stewardship account. The consequence was that Mr. Oastler made himself Mr. Thornhill's debtor (with the latter's entire consent) to the amount of about £2000, for which sum a note of hand was given in order to bring the account to a settlement. This was in 1836. The salary was then increased to £500, for the manifest reason that it was insufficient, but the accumulation was not cancelled. In two years, however, Mr. Oastler paid off upwards of £700 of the obligation, and would soon have liquidated the entire debt.

Mr. Oastler repaired to London, and lived in comparative retirement. Mr. Thornhill brought an action in the Court of Common Pleas. In that court a sort of accommodation took place. The learned leader of the plaintiff's case disclaimed all intention on the part of his client of imputing dishonesty, and the defendant at once acquiesced in a verdict for the balance, giving up at the same time various documents which had been retained for his own safety. He then turned his attention to the means of discharging the debt, and was making arrangements for that purpose, when, towards the close of 1839, he was arrested, and consigned to the Fleet Prison.

This was the origin of the Fleet Papers, which, for more than two years, consisted of a weekly epistle, on public matters, inscribed to Thomas Thornhill, Esq., and when the prisoners in the Fleet were removed under the new act, to the Queen's Prison, the weekly letter was addressed to Sir James Graham, the Home Secretary of State, and sometimes, under the feeling that wrong had been inflicted, the strain was rather that of the harsh trumpet than the "soft pleadings" of the lute.

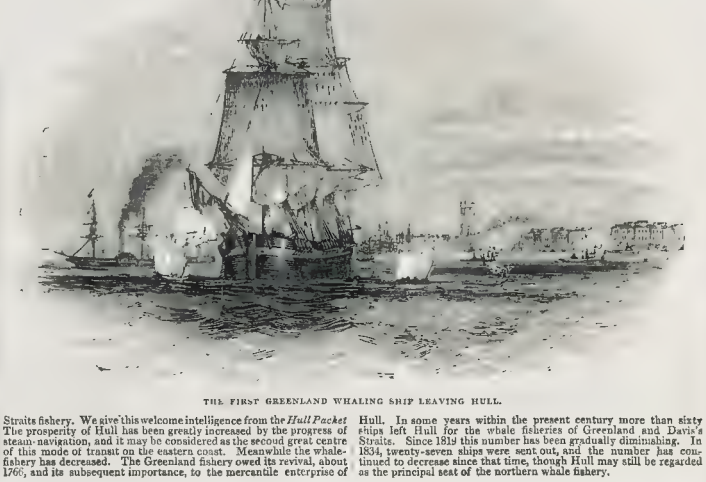
At last, after an imprisonment of three years and a quarter, sustained with unflinching fortitude, Mr. Oastler's health began to manifest visible decline. His Yorkshire friends came to a determination that one so valuable in all the relations of life, should not wear out existence in a prison. They held a meeting, and set a subscription on foot. Mr. Ferrand, M.P. for Knaresborough, long bound to Mr. Oastler by ties of friendship and community of political feeling, kindly undertook to attend meetings wherever requested to do so; he was present at from thirty to forty meetings, and advocated the cause with equal vigour and ability. The effort of these, and the exertions of other friends, was the realization of about £2500 at the close of the last year. In January, in the present year, the Central Committee came to a resolution to take steps for Mr. Oastler's immediate liberation. On applying to Mr. Thornhill's professional adviser, they found that a charge of about £900 for interest and law costs had been added to the amount recovered by the verdict in the Common Pleas. But their zeal was not to be overcome by a surmountable obstacle. An arrangement for the advance of the requisite sum was made with Messrs. Beckett and Co., the Leeds bankers, and twelve gentlemen, including Lord Feversham, John Walter, Esq., late member for Nottingham, and W. B. Ferrand, Esq., M.P., gave a guarantee for £1000; so that on Monday the 12th of February, 1844, Mr. Thornhill had paid to him the utmost farthing of his demand, principal, interest, costs, Sheriff's expences, &c., and the prison doors flew open. The Committee went to the Queen's Prison in a body, and brought forth Mr. Oastler with gratification and pride, though with no unseemly exultation. Mr. Rashleigh, M.P. for Cornwall, sent his carriage: Mr. Oastler was conveyed to the London Committee Room, at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street; Lord Feversham, chairman of that Committee, presided; and a vote of congratulation and confidence having been moved, seconded, and adopted by acclamation, Mr. Oastler addressed his deliverers in a speech, the appropriateness of which was felt by every one present, for "in all that goodly company" there was not a tearless eye. As one of the daily journals observed, in reporting what had taken place, "men, not given to the melting mood, wept like women, and the speaker himself was so overcome by emotion, that, though he retained the faculty of utterance, his voice was altogether changed."

On the Monday following, February 20th, Mr. Oastler made his re-appearance in public life by a public entry into the town of Huddersfield, amid at least 40,000 spectators. The ceremonial was admirably conducted.

The subscription committees are still in operation, both in town and country. The object is, not only to cover the sum advanced and guaranteed, but, if possible, to provide a life-annuity for Mr. and Mrs. Oastler. We wish success to the effort.

Mr. Oastler is a voluminous writer, as well as a copious speaker. Besides the Fleet Papers (now in the 4th vol., 8vo.), and innumerable letters in various public journals, some of them partaking of the character of treatises, he is the author of "Letters to the Duke of Wellington," "Facts and Plain Words," "The Right of the Poor to Liberty and Life," &c. He is no metaphysician—no better call flourisher—but for a statement of facts, an array of bold, impressive truths, an appeal to the warm and genuine feelings of unsophisticated nature, and a broadside upon the strong holds of selfishness or hypocrisy, he is rarely equalled. Mr. Oastler, however, has come out of prison deeply impressed with the nullity and impropriety of mixing up with public discussion anything like personal vituperation, and, henceforth, though inflexible in his adherence to his principles, he is resolved not to enter upon personal quarrels of any kind in connexion with political proceedings.

Mr. Oastler's public labours have brought him in close fellowship with men of rank and talent, and with most of those he is on terms of familiar friendship. Twice has he contested the borough of Huddersfield; the first time with Mr. Ellis, jun., when he lost by 50 only; the second time with the late Mr. Blackburne, barrister-at-law, when he was in the still smaller minority of 21. It has been said in some of the journals that he did this under the patronage of Mr. Thornhill. The fact is otherwise. In coming forward he obeyed the call of the Conservative and independent electors. The Ramsden family possess the entire soil on which the town stands, with a very slight exception, and it was in spite of that overwhelming influence that he so nearly succeeded; no other man could have come within 150. It is generally supposed that many months will not elapse ere Richard Oastler take a seat in the House of Commons for one of the boroughs where the success of an election mainly depends upon the working-classes.



THE FIRST GREENLAND WHALING SHIP LEAVING HULL.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. X.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE

Is a young Conservative member, of that section of the party which goes by the name of "Young England." He is the eldest son of Sir Thomas Cochrane, R.N., and cousin of the Earl of Dundonald. Family circumstances frequently determine the part that men take in public life.

Bearing the name of Cochrane, the young member for Bridport has had his attention turned more particularly to the state of Greece, of which country he knows a good deal from personal observation. It is in connection with Greece that his name is best known in the world of politics, he having on more than one occasion, in the face of considerable difficulties, brought the affairs of that country before the Legislature.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE, M.P.

He is an ardent friend of the cause of constitutional liberty of Greece, and the advocate of measures that might promote her internal prosperity. At the grand banquet given by the Greeks resident in London, to celebrate the peaceful revolution at Athens, by which a constitutional government was appointed, Mr. Cochrane was an honoured guest, and made a speech to the assembly marked with a generous enthusiasm, and a manly love of independence that was highly creditable to him. He was accompanied on that occasion by Dr. Bowring; and on seeing these two, so widely severed from each other on most questions, so well agreeing on this, we thought it spoke well for the zeal of each of them in the cause of a fallen nation, that they could throw all minor differences aside.

Mr. Cochrane is new to public life; he was first returned for the borough of Bridport, in 1841, when Mr. Warburton accepted the Chiltern Hundreds. He is tall, with light hair, and a somewhat florid complexion. He is a good speaker; one of the best, we should say, of the "Young England" school, but he does not often obtrude himself on the attention of the House. He has published the results of his observations in Greece, in a work on the "Morea."

THE GREENLAND AND DAVIS STRAITS WHALE FISHERIES.

The engraving is a gratifying indication of a revival of the spirit formerly evinced at Hull, in regard to the whale fishery. The vessels to sail from the port this spring will more than double the number of last year; and the circumstance is hailed with feelings of delight by all those who take an interest in the prosperity of the place. The brig Forth, Captain Toogood, the first ship of the season, sailed on Thursday week, for Greenland, and her departure was witnessed by a large multitude of persons, who heartily cheered her as she cleared the harbour. The following are preparing for immediate departure—The Twelove, Captain Parker, for Davis's Straits; the Abram, Captain Humphreys, for Davis's Straits; the Hebe, Captain Wells, for Greenland; the Sarah and Elizabeth, Captain Willis, for Davis's Straits; the Jane, Captain Brown, for Greenland; the Prince of Wales, Captain Coaldray, for Davis's Straits; the Anne, Captain Dean, for Greenland; and the Constantia, Captain Gravell, also for Greenland. We hear, too, on good authority, that Captain Thomas Lee has gone to Scotland to purchase another ship for the Davis's Straits fishery. We give this welcome intelligence from the Hull Packet. The prosperity of Hull has been greatly increased by the progress of steam-navigation, and it may be considered as the second great centre of this mode of transit on the eastern coast. Meanwhile the whale-fishery has decreased. The Greenland fishery owed its revival, about 1766, and its subsequent importance, to the mercantile enterprise of Hull. In some years within the present century more than sixty ships left Hull for the whale fisheries of Greenland and Davis's Straits. Since 1819 this number has been gradually diminishing. In 1834, twenty-seven ships were sent out, and the number has continued to decrease since that time, though Hull may still be regarded as the principal seat of the northern whale fishery.

SCENE FROM "THE MARRIAGE OF REASON," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.

The new drama, entitled as above, is one more of the million of things that find their way here across the Channel, at best but sorry affairs when they set out, and very much the worse through the seasickness, and being "done into English." The present is a very flimsy piece, indeed. The plot can be briefly told. A young gentleman falls in love with his foster-sister, a girl of mean extraction. His father, an old French general, to prevent the foolish match, sends his son to make the grand tour, and influences the girl to marry a kind of old Corporal Trim, who has been his companion in arms. The fair one is in great grief at first, but gradually becomes reconciled to her old lame spouse, and at last thinks him the best fellow in the world. This is really the only incident in the piece. The acting of Webster and Celeste was excellent, particularly in the scene chosen for our illustration, where Suzette reveals her love to Bertrand. We should not omit to mention that the matrimonial drolleries of Mr. Buckstone and Mrs. Humby, as Monsieur and Madame Pinchon, considerably relieved the piece; but the whole affair is not destined to a long life, and, moreover, never should have been born.

IZAAK WALTON'S HOUSE, STAFFORD.

In this humble homestead, at a short distance from Stafford, was born Izaak Walton, "the Father of Angling," on Aug. 9, 1593. At old Izaak's decease, the property was left to his son, on condition that he married before he arrived at the age of 41; and, if he were not then married, the house was to be given to the Corporation of Stafford. Singularly enough, the son did not marry within the given time, and consequently, the property was transferred to the Corporation.

NEW MUSIC.

Seven Songs (selected by permission from the Poetical Works of W. H. Heatham, Esq.,) composed by Percival Phillips. Phillips, Wakefield.

There is a good general design of effect about these compositions but "a plentiful lack" of skill in the arrangement. No. I. (a solo) abounds in erroneous and redundant harmonies upon passing notes; witness the first and fourth bars of the introductory symphony, and the 2nd of the voice part where the melody commits some strange octaves with the bass. Similar faults occur further on. No. II. is a duet, not altogether selon regle in its treatment. No. III. is a solo, abounding in the afore-mentioned errors of careless, but forbidden consecution of octaves and fifths. No. IV. is a composition for three voices: the author must entertain a peculiar notion of effect, if he think that a shake upon B, D, F (the dominant chord of the key), simultaneously executed, can be relished by "ears polite." No. V. is for a single voice, and is extremely simple and effective, although we should wish to see it harmonized somewhat differently. No. VI. is for three voices, and would be a rather graceful movement, if ———! No. VII. is another trio—but here, again, we have prohibited progressions familiarly treated, as if they were ornaments, instead of disfigurements, to music. The composer may, probably, be offended at these remarks: but ours is a task of severity; and, as Sir Matthew Hale said, "if the fact be evident, severity is justice!" The author of these seven songs (?) has, undoubtedly, a vein for composition, but a little more study of the rules of counterpoint would not prove unprofitable to him.

"True ease in writing comes from art, not chance."

Come Here's a Health to Thee and Thine. Song. The Poetry by Thomas Doubleday, Esq.; the Music composed by W. Jackson. (Masham). Novello, Dean-street.

There is considerable merit and ingenuity of construction in this song. It is worth a score of the trash-ballads of the day. We, however, object to the harmony of the second bars, in the second staves of pages two and six, more particularly as there is no necessity for the erroneous progression: careless consecution of fifths must offend every delicate ear. The introduction of the air "Auld Lang Syne" as the concluding symphony to the second verse, is ingenious and effective, although perhaps it injures the individuality of the whole.

Weippert's New Quadrilles, entitled the Collegians, composed expressly for "The Bachelor's Ball." Camoridge, 1844. (Weippert, Soho-square).

A very spirited and elegant set of quadrilles, and likely to be as universally popular as they were at the University Ball. The arrangement throughout is generally free from the vulgar errors we have so often to notice in this class of composition, and in fact might eminently useful to junior students of the pianoforte as a delassement from severer study.

Hamilton's Universal Tune-Book, a Collection of the Melodies of all Nations, adapted for the Violin, Flute, Clarionet, &c. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Hamilton, Glasgow.

This collection has been got up somewhat after the manner of "The Dancing Master," a work published in the 17th century, but is more comprehensive in its design, as it includes, amongst strictly national tunes, numerous airs from popular operas, &c., of all countries. Although it is professed that the melodies are arranged for violin, flute, clarionet, &c., many of them go below the compass of the ordinary flute; and it would have been advisable to have named which of the three clarionets most in use, viz., the A, B flat, and C, should be selected. Of course there is a predominance of Scotch and Scotch-claimed tunes, but the collection altogether is an amusing one, and will add to the amateur's stock of acquaintance with melody, if not to the musician's learning.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

Sir George Smart.—Concerts, musical soirées, and musical festivals throughout the kingdom, will find the loss of this orchestral disciplinarian's retirement from public life, it being his intention in future to devote himself solely to tuition. Phrenologically speaking, no man appeared to possess, in a stronger degree, the organs of method than Sir George, and the consequence was, that wherever he presided all went with precision and justice to the respective authors. Although he never signalised himself by any great effort of original composition, none had a keener appetite to appreciate the merits of others; and it will be long ere we see one who will bring to the task of conductorship, so much punctuality, judgment, and zeal, as he whose relinquishment of it now bequeaths a legacy of regret to all who love to hear good music done justice to in the cathedral, the concert room, the theatre, or private saloon.

National Music Lecturers.—There are so many of these delightful, and deservedly popular entertainments now before the public, that it is difficult "where to choose:" Hebrew melodies, Scotch melodies, Irish melodies, English melodies, all, in their several pretensions, equally advocated, and as ably illustrated by the different demonstrators. We have already expressed our scepticism of the genuineness of the Hebrew melodies; as to the others we have long been familiar with them, and have read the opinions of our forefathers respecting them; but, certainly,

However echoed in the lonely glens
To minstrel harp in other days, they never were made so generally popular as at present by Messrs. Phillips, Hornastle, Templeton, and Wilson. Each has a peculiar felicity in his own way, and affords a most interesting evening's entertainment; proving that however artistical foreign construction may be, our own island-melodies are the sweetest and most natural in the world. If Plato were alive now, he would not complain of airs wandering about in search of matrimony "to immortal verse;" for never, in any land, were such lyrical beauties wedded to tuneful partners as those presented by Moore, Burns, and a host of other worthies we could mention in the present day. These various lectures are well calculated to restore us a true sense of melody in its most genuine sense and feeling, and show that

There is a charm in simple, home-bred sounds
That all the foreign, learned art confounds.

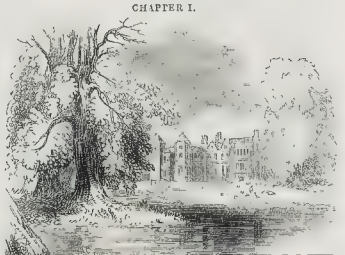
CHAPTER I.



THE centre column of the last page of the Times newspaper bore, one day towards the close of the year 1843, the advertisement which follows:—

MR. R. R. SAUNDERS has received instructions from the assignees to submit to public competition, at the Auction Mart, on the 22nd of November next, at Twelve for One precisely, all that extensive and beautiful property known as in the county of Sussex; comprising 734 acres of arable and meadow land, in high cultivation; together with an extensive and noble situated in the midst of a well-wooded and picturesque park, enclosed within a ring-fence, and well stocked with deer.

A FINE LAKE,

amply supplied with fish, and alike with water-fowl, terminates, with a magnificent effect, the far-spreading lawn and gardens by which the mansion is surrounded on three of its sides; while a dense wood of fringing, amphitheatrically, the rising ground in its rear, screens it from the northern blasts. The residence itself is of that mixed style of architecture so peculiarly English, and which so effectually blends

ELEGANCE AND COMFORT.

The dependences are all in the first order of taste and finish; the furniture modern and magnificent; the pictures rare and undoubted; the wines choice, and of celebrated vintage; the musical instruments by eminent makers; the plate splendid and massive; the equipages unique; and the whole well worthy the attention of a nobleman or gentleman

OF THE FIRST FASHION;

while the Library, consisting of

EIGHT THOUSAND VOLUMES, is much less remarkable for its extent than for the immense erudition displayed in its selection. Many valuable

OBJECTS OF VERTU

and

scattered over the magnificent reception rooms, will likewise be submitted to the approval and during the period of sale. Also (unless previously disposed of by private contract), that known as the reminding the visitor, by its beautiful and Arcadian arrangements, and exquisite tenue, of the celebrated model farms of

FINE TASTE OF THE PUBLIC,

FAR-FAMED BIJOU

THE EARL OF LEICESTER,

and of that illustrious foreigner,

THE PRINCE ESTERHAZY;

both of which distinguished personages have, at different periods, visited the Lime Farm, and expressed their unbounded admiration of this

TERRESTRIAL PARADISE.

The whole of the land is in an admirable state of cultivation, under an efficient and zealous steward, whose services may be secured by the

as well as the large stock of which cannot be surpassed throughout the kingdom, save by the collection of

It would be impossible, within the bounds of an advertisement, to enter into a detail of the

INNUMERABLE ADVANTAGES

presented to the

RICH AND NOBLE

by the present extraordinary opportunity; which has never been equalled since the transfer of but every information may be gained, and carte drawn may be procured, during the previous month, at the residence of Mr. R. R. Saunders, and at the Auction Mart, with cards to view the Estate.

Many an eye, alike idle and speculative, wandered over the eloquent elabora tion of the foregoing advertisement, and many a silent wish was, perhaps, formed—by one party that he could afford to purchase such a place; and by the other that, should he be tempted to meddle with the matter, he might make a good thing of it. How few, as it met their gaze, dropped a tear upon the fate of those who had just been suddenly and hopelessly cast out from thus, their earthly Eden; and sent forth into the midst of a cold, calling, selfish world, to make new and strange fellowship with misfortune.

Heaven is merciful! There was one of the unhappy group against whom the flaming sword of ruin had been raised, the sweat of whose brow was not to be wrung out by the labours and care of poverty—whose trial was over—whose debt of anguish and of love was paid!

Lone Grove was one of those noble and thoroughly English places which could gain little, even by the flowery diction of an ambitious auctioneer. Unlimited wealth and refined taste had lavished alike upon the house and grounds all the beauty and profusion which, when combined, they can always command in this country; and Mr Freeling, the proprietor of the property, was an admirable specimen of that important and fine body of men—the merchants of England. He had inherited Lone Grove from his father; and with it a business of great extent and respectability. One of those gigantic concerns, in fact, which, gathering gold from the four quarters of the earth, and making the sea itself tributary to the unabating spirit of enterprise, swallows in succession the ventures of the magnificent days of the merchant-princes of Italy. The elder Mr. Freeling had not, originally, intended to place its present possessor at the head of the house, for he had another son, whose tastes and habits were as entirely similar to a commercial and speculative career, that he at once decided on giving to Arthur—the Mr Freeling of our tale—a collegiate education, in order that he might qualify himself either for the church or the bar, as he should hereafter decide; leaving the elder brother to follow in his father's footsteps, and to inherit at once the honour able position and money-making anxieties to which the whole of his own life had been dedicated

The tastes of Arthur Freeling were retiring, studious, and refined; and he consequently dwelled unhesitatingly upon his future career; but before entering into any orders, he requested and obtained permission from his indulgent parent to pass a couple of years upon the continent, in order to enable him, not only to perfect himself in a knowledge of modern languages, but also to give him an opportunity of contrasting the magnificent scenery of the Rhine with the Rhenish and Roman churches, with the simple, pure, and holy rites of that to which he had resolved to dedicate all his best energies, both of mind and body.

Such were the dispositions of Arthur Freeling, at the age of three and twenty. left his paternal house, and traversed observantly a great portion of France and Germany, ere he passed into Italy. But here a change was wrought in his destiny, so entire and so utterly unexpected, that for a time he was indulgent almost bewildered, and quite incapable of acting with promptitude and decision

While travelling through Austria, he had made the acquaintance of a widow lady and her daughter, which had soon ripened into friendship for the mother, and affection for the child. Madame de Bethune was still young and handsome; so young and so handsome as to seem rather the elder sister than the mother of her daughter; but although hers had been a mariage de convenance, and that the Comte de Bethune had been five and twenty years her senior, she had never for a moment contemplated the idea of a second union; but had concentrated her affections entirely to the health and education of her beautiful Eugenie. Had Freeling been England as full of prejudice as many of his countrymen, this fair and gentle creature at once have shaved all the ungracious reasons of jealous bigotry. But was so simple, and so pure-hearted; so full of love for all around her, and so utterly forgetful of self, that her beauty, dazzling as it was, never failed after a time to be forgotten in her exceeding charms of mind and heart. No wonder then that the young Englishman was thrall-ed and enchanted by so sweet a vision, or that, when he discovered the happy lot that she professed his own faith, imbibed and blessed by the lips of her adopted mother, some time after he had seen a minister of the Reformed Church, he should yield up his whole heart without a struggle, to the passion which possessed it.

It was not, however, until Madame de Bethune had received the most undoubted proofs of his respectability, and had satisfied herself, by close and anxious scrutiny, of his personal worth, that she permitted the acquaintance to open into intimacy; or, the young traveller to linger for many an hour in their social sun, tendering to her beloved child all those little offices of courtesy and kindness, which, from their constant recurrence, grow into a want, felt by the heart before the reason is awakened to their importance. So in the case of Madame de Bethune had nothing to apprehend from the result of her indulgence, for Arthur was as frank and honest as tried to herself: and he no sooner became conscious that he loved Eugenie, than he was in the habit of making it known at once declared his affection to her mother; and explained to her his position, his prospects, and his hopes

His honesty of purpose was appreciated; and the Countess smiling consented that she should not fear to trust the happiness of her beloved child in his hands; but she nevertheless, reminded him of his own youth, and the fact that she whom he sought had only just attained her sixteenth year, and could not fail to impress upon him the absolute necessity of his father's approval; and his personal pledge, in the event of the non-interference of his family, that he would not ask to make Eugenie his wife for the next two years. The good mother of Freeling at once indorsed his acquiescence; without which, Madame de Bethune distinctly forbade all communication with her daughter during the four and twenty long months of probation; and, this point being arranged, and the lovers thereby somewhat astonished, permission of old Mr. Freeling to his son to prosecute his suit having been duly received, and letters of compliment exchanged between the respective parents, the happy pair once more betook themselves to their child under the protection of Arthur during their sojourn in Italy, where she treated that Superbe might breathe her breath, as well as perfect her taste for all that is bright and beautiful alike in nature and in art.

Thus, then, with hearts overflowing with gratitude and affection, did this calm party reach Rome; and they were in the full enjoyment of all its refined and enobling delights; contrasting the smiling present with the majestic past, and deriving new and bright subjects for reflection from the intellectual treasures which Arthur poured forth, as he gazed upon each spot of ground upon which they trod, and to every glorious remain upon which they looked—and the student, in his turn, listening with amazed delight to the graceful and gracious fancies of his promised bride, lending as they did the light of their own loveliness to the object by which they were elicited, as the tendrils of the wild vine and the ivy, drape into symmetry and into softness the stern outline of the ruin to which they cling,—even thus, young, happy, loving, and beloved, were they wearing away the bright days of their life's spring, without a thought, or care, or sorrow; when a letter reached Arthur, so tremulously written, that although he at once recognised the well-known characters of his father, the young man instantly felt that it was a messenger of ill! Nor did he deceive himself. He had no longer a brother; and he was peremptorily summoned home to relieve the bitter solitude of his bereaved parent.

That this change in his worldly prospects—for, Mr. Freeling, even amid his grief, had intimated to his son that he meant to make a partner of him—altered the thoughts of the church, and assume the sailing of a merchant—that this change, which must inevitably render him a much more wealthy man, could for an instant prove otherwise than agreeable to Madame de Bethune or her daughter had never occurred either to his father or himself; and it was consequently with an astonishment as great as his alarm, that he remarked the deep flush which mantled over the brow and bosom of the latter, as in trembling accents she spoke of the melancholy letter. Even shock as he was to the very soul, by the hapless fate of his only brother, who had been carried off by an illness of only two days duration, he could not mistake the expression of Madame de Bethune's countenance. Regret, sorrow, and perplexity, were alike legible upon her mobile features; and the unfortunate young man, who had expected ready and easier sympathy from the mother of his affianced wife, found no consolation save in an explanation of the cold and constrained manner of the usually warm-hearted Frenchwoman

"My dear Arthur," she said kindly, and as she extended her hand to him a tear swelled in her dark eye, "I am grieved to give you pain; but what shall I say to you? As Arthur Freeling, the barrister, I was content to overlook your want of rank, in order to ensure the happiness of my Eugenie. But now there were memories of my dear father—of my own happy childhood—of the blessing which follows so holy a vocation. But, ma commere, you must forgive me, my dear friend. The Bethunes have ever been proud of their virtue. Now that my Eugenie is my only child; in short, I do not think that I can, that I ought——"

"For pity's sake no more, my second mother," exclaimed the agonised young man. "Believe me when I tell you that none of your country, who have never visited England, can form no proper estimate of the position of an English merchant. You are aware—for I have never sought to conceal it from you—that I have always hitherto congratulated myself upon the prospect of a frugal and studious life. I have never had a taste for excitement or display; and while my unhappy brother lived, my poor father readily acquiesced in my desire to withdraw altogether from the turmoil and trials inseparable from his own occupation; but do not for a moment doubt my sincerity when I assure you, my kind friend, that the sacrifice, in a worldly point of view, was, in my case, a great one. I have now but one request to make, which is this, before you render me miserable for ever, and deprive my suffering father of his sole remaining son, you will consent to pass over to England for a few months; and as the cause of that time, should your determination continue unaltered, I pledge myself to submit to your decree for, dearly as I love your daughter, I could never stoop to receive even her hand, if it were grudgingly and reluctantly yielded to me, either by herself or her mother."

"That is but reasonable, my dear Arthur, and I consent to your terms," said the Countess; but the proud, cold look that she now addressed him as "her dear son." Let none, however rashly and ignorantly blame the stern, lest Madame de Bethune. As a Frenchwoman she knew nothing of commerce, save as it is understood by her own nation, viewed as a liberal occupation in a monarchy; and, as it was a subject which had never hitherto occupied her thoughts, there is slight cause for astonishment in her first words; and, above all, French womanly pride was such a portion of her original nature, that even born English Rather was there infinite merit due to her for the frank and ready generosity with which she met the rational and reasonable proposition of the young and anxious suitor. Her pledge given, Arthur Freeling at once journeyed to obey the summons of his father, and to proceed without delay to England. The parting of the affianced lovers was terrible; and the rather that for the first time since their betrothment, a cold and gnawing doubt of the future had come between them which all the warmth and sincerity of their mutual affection did but render the more bitter. Eugenie, bewildered and quite unable to enter into the scruples of her mother, even while she did not for an instant venture to oppose them, seemed to have merged all feeling in the one pang of parting from her promised husband; while Arthur, on his side, could not suppress the doubts, and fears, and misgivings, which, despite his better reason, pressed like evil spirits across his brain in shadow. Bethune should repent her misgivings, and offer his departure. Eugenie to visit England; if some new and unlooked-for obstacle should offer himself to her daughter; if—but, in short, it were tedious to recapitulate the spectres which Arthur conjured up as he travelled with all the speed that money and command could give him. To his credit be it remarked, however, that never once was the possible bad faith of Eugenie the bête noire of his many musings. Arthur would as soon have doubted the existence of his God; but with all his reverence the Countess he could not conceal from himself that, under the circumstances, she might, in bed, be induced to waver; and thus trail the banner of his best hopes in the dust. She was a woman of the world, too, and partly partial to the customs of Madame de Bethune. There are conventionalisms in France, which sometimes operate as something like a bar to that intimate union of the domestic affections, which is the chief charm of the English character. The high-toned calmness and unostentatious magnificence of the elder Mr. Freeling; the noble and liberal character of his establishment; the rank and importance of the friends by whom he was surrounded, the estimation in which he was held; all spoke, trumpet-tongued, alike to her understanding and to her heart; and she had not been a month on English soil ere she had learnt to look back with a smile upon the ignorance which had induced her original prejudi

Suffice it that the lovers were married; and that Arthur, happy in the possession of the woman whom he adored, struggled manfully to overcome his antipathy to the career of a merchant, which, indeed, was merely one of long years' standing. Eugenie, to whom the fortune and position were alike indifferent, to less his name of Arthur Freeling than his marriage, everything had combined to make him not only a happy, but also a wealthy man.

The delight of Madame de Bethune at the prosperity and devoted affection of her children made her quite indifferent to that return to her belle France, which, at the period of their union, she had considered as inevitable; and, on the birth of a grandson, the first-born of the Freelings, she almost resolved that she declared the very idea of separation from the cher ange to be torture; and accordingly consented to take possession of a Gothic "cottage of gentility," whose acres and gardens touched upon the outskirts of Lone Grove. She was but, however, half a long to enjoy her new home; for a neglected cold, having settled upon her chest, carried her off, after a few weeks of painful suffering, to the deep and sincere regret of Arthur and his wife

Still, for long years all went well with them. They were rich in love and happiness; they had won respect and esteem from all who knew them; "two, a set of friends" surrounded their hospitable board; and the name of Arthur Freeling was "good" in the City, where rich men congregate. But this world's prosperity had not power to overcome the natural taste of the active merchant. He loved the arts with as much enthusiasm as ever; and now that he possessed the means of indulging the predilection, he filled his house with rare and beautiful objects of ancient and modern skill; and although he occasionally stole away from his professional duties to wander again and again with his fair wife, upon the classic soil of Italy, and the glowing shores of Greece, he did not suffer the triumphs of art-quest pursuit to lead him to the chains of their merit. Many a struggling artist had cause, during his midnight labours, to bless his name of Arthur Freeling. Many an esquire he pelled be relieved: many a sinking heart did he unsham. If encouragement, words of warm sympathy, could not soothe, even in the midst of a bold, bleak, ungenial world; his destiny, like the lamp suspended in a sepulchre, irradiated all within its influence, and appeared to shine on, undimmed by the unsympathising darkness around.

But this was not to last. A century ago every man a position, who entered into any phase of commerce, whether extended or humble, was clearly defined, and its result could be calculated with tolerable accuracy. Now, however, in the case of a foreign trade, the draper vends among his cottons and linens the gewgaws of the imitative jewel er, and the ervatic tuneos of the milliner; and in like manner the head of a mercantile house, whose business was that of banking, there is planned at in a brief table like ours. This mania for combination, so fortunately for Freeling, possessed a fascination which his enthusiastic temperament could not withstand. There was a certain amount to the excitement derived from his judgment induced by the several speculations which he was persuaded to join; and as a first run of luck intoxicates the gamester, and impels him to increase his stake, and to double his chances of gain, so did the success of the first few adventures of another member of society, suffer himself, by a few turns of prosperous fortune in undertakings wholly unconnected with his ostensible profession, to become dazzled and deluded by the glare of wealth which seemed to surround him

Sir George Smart is about to retire from public life after a most honourable career of half a century, and will confine himself chiefly to music.

We learn, from Stockholm, that a silver mine, which is expected to be very productive, has been discovered near the town of Lindsberg.

A private letter, dated the 22d ult., from Berlin, contains the information that the King of Prussia had, for three days previous to the courier's departure from the Prussian capital, been suffering from the measles, of which it will be recollected his august consort, the Queen, was attacked, but all the symptoms were of the mildest form.

On Tuesday the directors of the railways terminating at London Bridge, caused to be posted at Greenwich, New Cross, and more distant stations upon the several lines a table, alphabetically arranged, of the coach and cab fares to 370 different parts of the metropolis.

On Tuesday Ralph Thompson, an engineer belonging to Woolwich Dockyard, was employed, by order of her Majesty's steam-frigate Sirius while engaged in repairing the floats of the paddle-wheel, the wheel was accidentally set in motion, and he was so crushed that he then almost immediately.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen have given orders for 20 more children to be admitted into the school belonging to Emmanuel Hospital. The aged inmates are to have their pensions increased to £24 a year, to be paid monthly instead of quarterly; and 10 more pensioners are to be placed on the foundation.

On Monday evening, the Brighton Theatre opened to fifteen persons in the pit, two in the boxes, and two in the gallery! There was no performance, and the money was returned to the audience!!!

From Alexandria we hear that the Pacha is about to rout one more of the monsters of the desert—by boring for water between Cairo and Suez, which he expects to find, somewhere in the depth of 1000 feet. For this purpose is awaiting an apparatus, ordered from England, calculated for boring to the depth of 1800 feet.

Mr. Samuel Lover, the painter, poet, and musician, has been for some time engaged in preparing an Irish entertainment similar to those which Mr. Wilson has rendered so popular for Scotland. We believe he will make his first appearance in the character of a lecturer and songster on the 20th of the present month.

The Caledonian steamer started from Liverpool on Tuesday morning, with the mails for Canada, Nova Scotia, and the United States. She was an excellent order. Upwards of thirty cabin passengers took berths by her, besides a party of fifteen of the Royal Sappers and Miners from Woolwich, who were accommodated with steerage passage by order of the government.

Meyerbeer's opera, the "Huguenots," which has been performed for many years at the theatre at Wurzburg, has just been interdicted, upon a representation of the clerical authorities of that city.

The union workhouse in Whitechapel has, until within the last few days, been the residence of probably one of the greatest paupers in her Majesty's dominions. This huge inmate of the poor-house, whose name was James Target, died on Sunday last, in the 70th year of his age. He stood six feet nine inches in height, and weighed upwards of twenty stone.

The first meeting for the season of the Noblemen and Gentlemen's Catch Club took place on Tuesday, at their house in Dean-street. T. H. Hall, Esq., in the chair. A great number of the professional members of the club were present, and the performances were of the highest order

We are glad to find that Mr. Charles Kean has so much recovered from his late severe indisposition as to enable him to appear on Monday next as a steward at the Covent-garden Theatrical Fund Festival.

Workmen have commenced operations by order of the Board of Works at the close of last week on the Old White Horse public house, at the corner of Stafford-row, and the house is now razed to the ground, the materials sold by private contract. The improvements in this part of Pimlico are expected to be proceeded with rapidly.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Although we had about an average supply of English wheat on sale, to-day, the demand for it was steady, at prices quite equal to those obtained on Monday. There was a moderate retail trade for foreign wheat, at fully previous rates The barley trade was in a depressed state, at barely stationary prices, with a good supply offering. Malt was a mere drug, and in fact quarter lower The oat trade was dull, at barely late rates. All other grain as on Monday

Tea.—Several vessels have arrived with bulk cargoes yet the stock of tea in London is only 34,000 packages against 57,856 packages at the same time in 1843. A sale of about 2500 packages has been held this week. The attendance of the trade was large, while the biddings were brisk, and the whole of the teas offered were sold at full rates. Low twankays were 6d, new congous 1d per lb. dearer. By private contract a large business is doing, and prices are generally on the advance.

Sugar.—In Mark Lane, only a moderate business is doing, yet prices are steadily supported Mauritius and Bengal sugars are in active request at full rates.

Coffee.—Most kinds of coffee are in fair request, and the sales to the quotations in mainsaised.

Provisions.—If ah butter is, on the whole, dull in sale, but foreign is more inquired for, and small parcels of fine Freeland are selling at 102s to 104s per cwt. The market for bacon is more active, at very full rates. In other kinds of provisions, we have no alteration to notice Spirits.—For rum, the demand is active. Leewards, proof, at 2s 1d to 2s 2d; and Jamaica 2s 2d to 2s 3d, per gallon. Calcutta rum is steady, at 1s 10d to 1s 11d. Brandy, of 18-22 vintage, 5s 1d to 5s 3d, per gallon.

Oils.—Linseed oil is in steady request, at full rates. In other kinds of oil, no alteration can be noticed.

Tallow.—Although we have to report the transaction of rather more business in this article, the general remain unaltered. P.Y.C. on the spot, 48s 6d, town tallow, 44s, net cash For the last three months little is done

HOUT. HERBERT.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The news from India is of much importance to our manufacturers, and must materially increase the activity in the manufacturing districts, to which we have so frequently had the satisfaction to direct the attention of our readers. At no former period have the preparations for shipments of large shipments to the Colonies, and to foreign nations generally, been so extensive as they are at the present moment, and the very favourable nature of the intelligence now received from our Eastern Empire must add considerably to the value of the shipments previously intended to be made to that quarter.

To our North American possessions similar remarks are, in a particular degree, applicable, for no small portion of the consumption of British goods, by the citizens of the United States, must continue to be smuggled across the Canadian borders, so long as almost prohibitory import duties are continued by the transatlantic republic.

To the different kingdoms in Europe, and to the new states in America also, the increase of spring shipments is very large, and on the money market there is a visible prospects of our foreign exchanges being, during the week, had very important effects

On the Royal Exchange, this week, the amount of bills drawn on foreign nations, even already, in part payment of the cargoes of Eastern Ships now in, has again very considerably exceeded the demand for foreign remittances—a circumstance the more we dwell, as occurring at a time when very small purchases of foreign grain and of foreign articles, produce have been made, and continue to be made, for shipment to this country, so soon as the season permits, and the rates of the foreign exchanges continue, consequently, gradually to improve, are the most favourable that the present position of the precious metals into the United is absolutely necessary. A combination of favourable circumstances is thus making to the already enormous amount of unemployed money, and the pressure in the English Stock Exchange is increasing from this cause. The Chancellor of the Exchequer as many months ago we ventured to state he would be compelled to do has placed before the House of Commons his plan for the reduction of somewhere about 200 millions of stock now bearing an interest of 3l per cent., to one paying a less annual amount, and his success will be attended by a saving of somewhere about one million yearly in the interest now payable on the National Debt.

In the London, since our last publication, a material advance has occurred, and the opinion entertained by many, who ought to be well informed on the subject of finance, is gaining ground, that our Three per Cents., both Consolidated and Reduced, must eventually reach par. The Three per Cent. Consols are this week five per cent. higher than they were last week, and a proportionable advance has occurred in all the descriptions of our public funds, with the exception of the now denoted Three and-a-Half per Cents

In the share market likewise, the money pressure has again had favourable result The business transactions in all of them has been extensive, and for various descriptions of these higher quotations have been obtained. York and North Midland, Eastern Counties, Ashton, and Manchester and Birmingham are from 4l to 4l 2 each dearer. In those of Manchester and Leeds, also investments have again been made at improving rates It is in the shares however, of several of the lines that agreements have been entered into at present, and which they cannot be obtained unless purchasers submit to the payment of a premium From London to Carlisle and from the latter place to Glasgow—from Leeds, by Normanton, and from it once to Edinburgh—lines are in contemplation, which must connect eventually, the South with the North of Great Britain, and the one from Rochester to Holyhead opens a speedy road to Ireland. The attention of capitalists is therefore, more or less, to all of these undertakings; and should they gain the good opinion of the public, pecuniary means in abundance will not be wanted for their completion.

On the Foreign Stock Exchange the usual weekly amount of transactions on the increase and higher prices continue to be obtained for the Bonds of those nations, kingdoms, and communities on which the last yearly dividends are now required paid. In some of these securities, likewise, on which there is a prospect of some dividend being paid, investments of money have been again made. Colombian Bonds without the authority of Venezuela, are fully 2 per cent. dearer than they were last week, and, on the whole, neither the money nor the commercial markets can be in a more sound or more flourishing condition than we find them when our present number goes to press.

THE DIRECTORS have DECLARED the following BONUSES to the Assurers for the Year 1844.

NOTICE is hereby given that all Persons who hold policies in the Office, bearing date prior to the year 1834, may receive the present value of the Bonuses which have been added to their policies, upon application at the Head Office, or to the Agents through whom the policies were issued

GEORGE BRAUMONT, Actuary.

MR. COCKLE'S PILLS for INDIGESTION and LIVER COMPLAINTS.

"If you are in possession of better remedies, in Heaven's name use them; it not, make use of these."—Hogarth.

This FAMILY APERIENT will be found a most invaluable in every form of indigestion, with torpid liver and inactive bowels, also in gout, bilious attacks, sick head-ache, and nervous irritability from a deranged state of the stomach, &c.—May be had of all medicine vendors

BIELEFELD'S PATENT QUAQUAVERSAL GLASS STAND AND ALBERT SHAVING GLASS.—Plate Glass Factors, Upholsterers &c. are respectfully informed that Stands for the above made on a new principle may now be had at the manufactory, 18, Wellington street North, Strand, and of most of the respectable upholsterers in London, where specimens of the improvements for which this patent has been obtained is perfectly sample. The Stands are very elegant in appearance, most convenient, and agreeable to use, and cannot get out of order.—Paper Mâché Works, 18, Wellington-street North, Strand.

EMPLOYMENT.—Persons having a little time to spare, are informed that Agents continue to be appointed in London and Country Towns by the ATHENÆUM SOCIETY, for the sale of their entertaining TEA (Offices, 5, Great St. Helen's Churchyard, Bishopsgate-street.) They are parked in showy leaden canisters from one ounce to a pound, with the prices and weight marked on each packet, and but little trouble is occasioned by the sale; the profits are large, and many Agents in the last seventeen years have realised considerable incomes by the Agency, without in. 1st or risk. Applications to be made (if by letter, post-paid) as above

NEW PERFUMES.—J. and E ATKINSON, Perfumers, beg respectfully to inform the public that they have received from the south of France their STOCK of NEW PERFUMES, the produce of last season, and that they are fixed that they have been for the present at their old establishment, 24, Old Bond-street, over the corner of Conduit-street, where their gardens of Nice Grass may be seen. They have also, several new Perfumes for the approaching year and they hope as newspapers will be found worthy of that patronage they have hitherto so liberally received.—N.B. A stock is always kept ready for exportation.—24, Old Bond-street. February, 1844.

EDWARD DODDS ANGLO-ROMAN STRINGS for VIOLIN, VIOLONCELLO, and HARP—manufacturer to H.R.H. the Duke of Cambridge—which Strings, for power of tone and durability, are equal to the best Italian Strings, at 50 per cent. less, and far superior to those in general use. They have a peculiar property of retaining the full harmonic tone, and are not affected by damp. Sold by Messrs. Roberson, Walker, Loder, Cramer, &c. &c. To be had of the music shops, and at the manufactory, 13, Vauxhall-walk, Lambeth. Each string stamped with a blue band with E. Dodd's Anglo-Roman Strings.—Please ask for E. Dodd's Anglo-Roman Strings. Also improved Silver Strings, warranted not to turn green.

THE AMERICA CHURN.—None is genuine unless they have Lock, Key, and Chaining pressed on the bottom. The Chain, so much admired by all who have visited America for the remarkable ease, pleasure, and expedition with which it churns the cream in less than five minutes. Sold at the Colonial Establishments of Lock, Key, and Chaining, No. 4, Regent street; Carpenter's hall, 85, London-wall, and William Cumming and Co., Hatton-garden. It is asserted with confidence that where the Churn is used no butter is ever found rancid or unsaleable, and approved of when known. The price, £1 8s., with a liberal discount to the trade. Wont peace and invalid's wife.

NAPLES SOAP.—The complaints of many Gentlemen of the difficulty they have in procuring good NAPLES SOAP, have induced J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, to appoint one of the most respectable houses in Naples to supply them with the above article, and they are now regularly in receipt of it, and can with confidence recommend they present stock as of the very finest quality; and as nothing so soft as all equal to Naples Soap should also be Washing, particularly where the water is hard, or liable to chapping, they are certain the more good Naples Soap is known, the more it will generally be used. The quality of its being lately in Carpate, is in consequence of the inferior quality of the Soap imported for sale by the Custom House Agents, the Country Drug Establishment with 2lbs. and upwards, at wholesale prices.—24, Old Bond-st. Feb. 1844.

ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL, specially patronised by her Majesty the QUEEN, H.R.H. Prince Albert, Family, and the several Courts of Europe This Oil will produce and restore hair, prevent it from falling off or turning grey, free it from scurf and impurity, and will render it as soft as silk, curly, and glossy. It is invaluable for the growth of the beard of a beautiful brown. Price 3s. 6d. and 7s. Family bottles (equal to four small), 10s. 6d., and double that size, 21s per bottle.

Caution.—The genuine article has the words "ROWLAND'S MACASSAR OIL," in two lines on the wrapper. Also the name of the Company, Day and Martin.

Sold at 20, Hatton-garden; and by Chemists and Perfumers.

STOOPING of the SHOULDERS and CONTRACTION of the CHEST, so injurious to young persons and oppressive to invalids and the infirm merely prevented, and greatly and effectually remedied by the occasional use of the Patent Mr. James's Chest Expander, which is light, simple, easily employed outwardly or inwardly, with out hands beneath the arms, uncomfortable constraint, or impediment to exercise. The great improvement it causes in the figure is immediately apparent, but the paramount benefit of this invention is its obvious tendency to prevent the incursion of Consumption and other Pulmonary diseases in Youth, and to afford a comfortable support to the Chest and Back in the Aged and Weakly, or those who are accustomed to sedentary occupations. Full instructions to be observed in using it. Sold by Mr. J. BINYON, at the Wholesale Depôt, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand, London; by inclos ng a postage-stamp.

TOOTH BRUSHES.—J. and E. ATKINSON, Perfumers, in answer to some complaints from the country, that Tooth Brushes purchased as of their manufactory have not answered their expectations, beg to inform the public that Brushes supplied by them to country shops are only warranted if their name is stamped on the handle. Cheap-priced Tooth Brushes are not only unpleasant, but much dearer in the end than a good Tooth Brush, as they soon fall out, and injure the teeth and gums. Messrs. Hair Brushes, and every other description of Brush. The Tooth Brushes stamped with their name are to be had in three sizes, the first is immediately apparent, but the paramount benefit of this invention is its obvious tendency to prevent the incursion of Consumption and other Pulmonary diseases in Youth, and to afford a comfortable support to the Chest and Back in the Aged and Weakly, or those who are accustomed to sedentary occupations. Full instructions to be observed in using it. Sold by Mr. J. BINYON, at the Wholesale Depôt, 40, Tavistock-street, Strand, London; by inclos ng a postage-stamp.

THE GIANT'S SISTER.

Mr. F. Randall, the "Devonshire Giant," (7 feet 1½ inches in height) who has lately caused so much stir in the metropolis, and has been on his passage to America, as an 8th edition at the American Museum, visited the Retail shipment of MOSES and SON for the purpose of ordering a Naval and General Outfit, previous to his departure. This stupendous specimen of human race this gigantic Statue—was measured for a superb costume which will do credit to the Establishment in which it was made.

We beg your pardon, Mr. Frederick Randall,
For making you an advertising bandit.
We only wish to let the public know
The manner you have honour'd our Depôt.
When thus we put your mighty name in print
Our motive is to give you no affront
That one who bears it (whether tall or short)
Is worthy of our best attention at his departure. This stupendous
And now we'll wish you a successful trip—
May no rough tempest ever take the slip!
MOSES and SON their hearty wishes send
To one who thus has shown himself their friend.
When you are landed on your dear old strand,
Tell the Americans of Britain's land
And if they will you what's the greatest sight
Tell them our Mart, and then you—just be right.
Show them your Outfits, which are sure to strike,
And say you'll return them nearly as big.
Tho. them how much our stocks are under,
And all connected with the word "Clothes Wonder."
If this you do, we never shall regret
The say that we and Frederick Randall met.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 98, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1844. [Sixpence.

LABOUR AND RELAXATION.

SOME of our readers may know, and many more probably do not know, that to-morrow is marked in the calendar as the festival of St. Patrick. It is to-day celebrated by a dinner at the Freemason's Tavern, in which conviviality and social feeling will subserve the cause of charity and benevolence. The recurrence of these days, which may be called the white days of the year, the bright spots in the dull monotony of existence, always seems to suggest two reflections; one is a regret that they are so few, and the other a still deeper regret that their celebration is confined to so limited a circle. Take the present instance as a case in point. The charitable object of the day receives the patronage of the Queen Dowager, a noble lord takes the chair, dukes and lords are among the vice-presidents, the stewards are honourables and M.P.'s, and gentlemen will no doubt be the guests at the festive-board. Certain it is that the day, though a festival, will not be a holiday in the usual sense of the word, that its celebration will not be general, and that like the many others that pass unmarked in the course of the year, it will bring no relaxation to those who stand most in need of it—the working classes. Never was a name given that was so well borne out by the condition of the class it describes; "working" indeed beyond their years, beyond their strength, beyond endurance, "working" to a degree that saps the health, breaks the constitution, and, giving little time to recover from physical exhaustion, leaves, too often, none at all for the cultivation of the mind. Intervals of relaxation from labour would give time for both; but intervals there are none, and the consequences are disease and ignorance in the living, and short-lived generations going to a comparatively early grave. But, say the political economists, England manufactures for the world! and by this "we have our wealth."

We are not going to follow in the wake of Lord J. Manners, and ask for holidays, to be by law established. Like many other things, this is one which the law by itself could not effect. A stern compulsion is over us; above the craving for rest and amusement is felt the necessity of living; and to live, or rather to exist, is to millions a ceaseless struggle, terminating only with life itself. The necessity is submitted to, as we see; but not without indications of uneasiness under it; we trace the endeavours to shake off the burden in the efforts making in many directions to obtain a little relaxation from labour—some small portion of the day for other purposes than the drudgery of business, a small portion of the hours to interpose between the active labours of the day and the "death of each day's life"—the poet's beautiful description of the hours of sleep. The classes confined to close shops and counting-houses, meet, combine, petition, agitate—we might almost say "conspire"—to obtain some limitation of their hours, and some measure of their toil. Lower in the social scale we find the workers in dusty factories forcing themselves on the attention of the Legislature, which is at this moment divided in opinion as to the policy or possibility of imposing restrictions on the hours of labour, and whether the daily space of toil shall be ten hours or twelve. These are divided efforts made by different classes, but at least one member of the Legislature has expressed his desire that there should be some fixed intervals of relaxation for all alike, in what he calls "national holidays." The proposal is praiseworthy for the spirit that prompts it, the plea is amiably made, and his arguments are not without some force and more skill; but the plan has the one great defect of being totally impracticable.

In considering all social questions as they apply to the present time, it is perfectly useless to hold up the example of the past. Our forefathers did as their age and time permitted them, and we can only do the same; it was not their superior wisdom that made it easier to them to live, than we find it now; the competition of trade with trade, and man with man, is fiercer and keener; in the days that allowed of "National Holidays," Great Britain had not twenty-nine millions of inhabitants, and eight hundred millions of debt. All have, in some shape, to work to support the one, and to pay the interest of the other, which enters into the cost of every comfort, and of some of the necessaries of life, making it, pro tanto, more difficult to every class of the community. It is this universal necessity of increased labour that makes the difficulty of legislating on the subject. The advocates of non-interference say that if hours of labour are limited, wages must be reduced; and that such a law would leave the operative in a worse condition than it found him. The advocates of restriction—the supporters of ten and twelve hours' bills—say that all this grinding and unceasing toil does but little good. They point, as one fact among many, to the glutted warehouses of the manufacturers, filled with unsold goods, and say the result of this wasted labour is but over production; that periods of unnatural activity are succeeded by periods of stagnation, during which the manufacturing workmen are reduced to destitution. Why not distribute the work more equally? they ask; the present system is all one way or all the other. It is stated that millions of yards of goods were sent to China last year, over and above the largest quantity the Chinese can possibly require for the next twelve months. The consequence will probably be a reaction of trade, stoppage of speculation and orders, and suspension of work in the factories. The objections are good as far as they go. But over speculation arises from the competition of capital against capital, as over work is caused by the competition of labour against labour, one is as unavoidable as the other.

And between these contending elements is "the life of life" to be ground out of human existence, as the grain is crushed between the upper and nether millstones? Surely, there must be some principle in existence which can give some alleviation. or the future prospects of mankind are dark and cheerless indeed Such a principle does exist, but it is neither commercial nor political; the development of commerce has done much to bring us to our present state; our political institutions are unable to give a remedy for it. The principle that alone can bring its "saving health to all nations" is the principle of RELIGION. The same spirit that now hallows the Sabbath, and forbids its being made a day of toil—that has preserved it from the desecration of worldly labour, while almost all other festivals and holidays have been merged into the common mass of days, whose mornings wake man to his toil, and whose nights consign him to a bed of wearisomeness—the same spirit, by a wide and deep extension of it, can alone rescue other days from the necessity that compels man to do violence to his nature. That spirit too must be universal, or its operation will be ineffectual. The Sabbath is revered and respected by Christians of all denominations. The days consecrated only by churches and councils have been disregarded from dislike or contradiction, by those who were opposed to them. It would be the same with any legislative enactment: the spirit of party would creep in, and incite men to neglect it, or defy it; and the breaking the injunction by one, or by a few, would almost necessitate its being broken by all. In our last state became worse than our first, by the amount of ill feeling and enmity that would be created. If education and a better training can reach men a better distribution of their efforts, and if Religion, by which education must be accompanied, can bring them to a common observance of certain days, there may be some limit placed to human toil. But it must be done by a change in the body of society itself. Laws will be powerless to effect it; indeed, an advanced state of civilization seems to demand this degree of exertion as its condition. There is a breath of nations, as of individuals, in which they seem to have more liberty, more leisure, and more heart to enjoy both. The pastoral age, with its pipes and shepherds, had no steam engines or power-looms. The increase of wealth and power seems to deprive a people at large of their cheerfulness. What we have gained we must keep, and, having advanced so far, it requires much effort not to retrograde. In this continual state of effort we exist: all classes feel it, all classes complain of it, none can be released from it. Legislators attempt to meet the giant evil, but it is too powerful for the law, and Mr. Oastler is nearly as far from curing it as Lord J. Manners. Nevertheless, the efforts of both excite discussion, and to this we must at present be content to trust much, hoping that the time may yet come when "Labour" will not be without its "relaxation."

THE O'CONNELL BANQUET.

Without at all attempting to enter into the controversy which for several weeks past has engaged the attention of our contemporaries, as to whether the once noble temple of the drama is desecrated by being made the arena of political discussion, we may venture to assert that never, in our recollection, was Covent-Garden Theatre the scene of so much brilliancy, enthusiasm, and devotedness, as on Tuesday evening last, during the reception of Mr. O'Connell at a banquet provided for him by his political friends and admirers. That there were many persons present upon that occasion who entertain totally different views from Mr. O'Connell on very essential points of political and religious doctrines, we have good reason for knowing; but there was something so elective in the burst of genuine feeling and enthusiasm with which his appearance was hailed, that even they were carried away by the irresistible force of popular applause, and, however perhaps the touches of the pencil of the graver with which we endeavour to depict the scene may be, or however vivid the description it, given by the various prose historians who have since recorded the event in the columns of the morning journals, still all must fail in conveying anything like an adequate idea of the real magnificence and thrilling effect of the scene.

The arrangements for the festival were excellent. The whole of the pit was boarded over so as to be on a level with the stage, and the tables for the large mass of the guests ran logitudinally from the front of the dress circle up towards the dais, at which sat Mr. Duncombe, the chairman, Mr. O'Connell, and the most distinguished persons at the board. Beneath the centre cross bench, occupied by members of Parliament and those who might be said to be peculiarly privileged to take an important part in the proceedings of the evening; what at the decorations were few and simple as possible, consisting but of the national emblems of Ireland, and, in variegated lamps, the three words—"Ireland," "O'Connell," "Justice," the nation, the man, and the professed, if not the real, object of all his struggles.

The dress circle, which, with the other circles and private boxes, was exclusively devoted to the fair sex, presented a dazzling array of beauty, made animated by the most lively enthusiasm. Ranks of ladies from the north and most distant regions of the roof, faces beamed forth from every chink and opening, and thousands of voices sent forth their shouts of exultation, not in the dying cadence of Monsieur Jullien's Irish echoes, but rapidly succeeding each other with increased fervour and intensity.

The great salle was illuminated by thirty elegant ormulu chandeliers, in addition to the great chandelier suspended from the centre of the theatre, and the smaller candelabras suspended over each box in the dress circle. The stage was adorned by mirrors at the centre and the sides, which produced a most picturesque and pleasing effect.

The dinner, which was a cold one, was provided by Mr. Rouse, of the White Conduit Tavern, who is entitled to great praise for the excellence, the variety, and the profusion of the viands supplied on the occasion. The wines, too, were of excellent quality.

The whole area of the stage was decorated with pale blue and pink drapery, arranged in the form of a tent, with a profusion of festoons, which, being reflected from large mirrors at either side, produced an extremely brilliant effect. The musical arrangements were under the direction of Mr. G. Stansbury, and among the vocal performers were Messrs. Young, Lloyd, Barnby, Hul, Martin, Stansbury, Shoubridge, Walker, Smith, T. Cooke, Gordon, Coward, Horne, J. O. Atkins, P. Bedford, &c. &c.

At half-past five the band entered the orchestra and commenced playing, and continued performing a series of popular airs until six o'clock, when a flourish of trumpets announced the approach of Mr. O'Connell [illegible] Duncombe, [illegible] Mr. O'Connell [illegible] Mr. O'Connell [illegible] was received with the most rapturous enthusiasm. winter, have again appeared on the mountains and borders of Modena, and that a battalion of infantry has been sent off in great haste to Massa-Carrara. All the political prisoners of Ancona have been transferred to Rome, where they will be tried. This measure was adopted in consequence of the assassination of the Criminal Judge, and the difficulty of finding a successor.

The Bey of Tunis has given the fullest satisfaction to the Neapolitan Consul. Seven of the principal offenders were to receive each 300 blows with the cane, and the remainder in long imprisonment and hard labour. The dispute with Sardinia remains still in a very unsatisfactory state; indeed it may be considered as having taken a very serious turn. The Porte, in a note to the Government of Sardinia, declares that the conduct of Genoa, and the measures adopted, have alarmed force being sent against the Bey. The Sardinians, in their reply, in the first place deny the right of the Porte to interfere, and that should that right be established, the Bey has acted immediately to entitle him to the just claims of the Sardinian Government to be satisfied. The last accounts from Sardinia are as certain that an imposing naval force was on the point of sailing for Tunis.

Italy has lost one of its most celebrated architects in the person of the Chevalier Luigi Canonica, who lately died, aged 82 years. This gentleman built the amphitheatre at the Gate Vercellena, and the theatre Carcano. He has left a fortune of upwards of £40,000.

GERMANY.

An extraordinary Diet of the States of Saxe Coburg and Gotha has been convened, to receive the written promise of the reigning duke—that he will maintain and support the constitution of the duchy.

The King of Wirtemberg continues much oppressed with a distressing cough and fever: by the last accounts, dated Stutgard, the 7th, his Majesty was something better, but far from being well.

Baron Bopp, the Minister of Finance to the Duke of Darmstadt, died on the 6th, aged 74. The baron was highly respected, and much frequented English society.

Letters from the Banks of the Danube state, that an immense number of political arrests had taken place in Servia; and that the greater part of the prisoners are priests, and agents of the Government.

Several parts of Germany have suffered considerably from the late inundation. A greater quantity of snow has fallen this winter in the neighbourhood of Kiel, than for thirty years past. All the roads are blocked up. Several villages in Lauenburg are literally under water, which has reached the first story of the houses. In the Tyrol, but principally near to Inspruck, the peasants cannot quit their houses, and a want of provisions is seriously felt. The quantity of snow which has fallen on the Jura is so great, that the first running of the new mail from Geneva to Paris has been postponed.

Letters from Gor ta of the 3rd state, that the physician of the Duke D'Augustenburg had lost all hopes of his recovery. On the afternoon of the 31st the royal patient was attacked with severe vomiting, which continued without interruption until the next day.

FRANCE.

Nothing of importance in the Chamber of Peers. The Chamber of Deputies decided that the second election of M. C. Lafitte should be annulled, on the ground that the suspension of imprisoning with the electors, which the Chamber had decreed it necessary to reprehend on the former occasion, still subsisted. The committee on the secret service money held, yesterday, a sitting, at which M. Guizot was present. One of the members having remarked that he trusted that application had been made to Lord Aberdeen for the recal of Mr. Pritchard, the British Consul at Tahiti, M. Guizot replied, that in the present state of negotiations he could give no positive information, but that he had not the least doubt the British Government would recall Mr. Pritchard.

Viger was appointed reporter to the Committee. The discussion in the Chamber will commence on Monday next. It appears to be positive that Admiral Dupetit-Thouars is recalled, and that he will be replaced by Admiral Hamelin, who will hoist his flag on board the Didon.

The following letter, which has been written by the Minister of Justice to the Archbishop of Paris, has created a great sensation, particularly as the Archbishop is known to be a great partisan of his Majesty

"Monseigneur,—You have addressed to the King a memorial connected between you and four of your suffragans, who, as such, as yourself, have affixed their signatures to it. In this memorial, examining the question of liberty of instruction, according to your view of it, you have attempted to cast blame on the establishments for public instruction founded by the state, and on all the persons engaged in public education; and you have directed offensive insinuations against one of the Ministers. A journal has just given to this memorial a striking publicity. I have no doubt that this last fact occurred without your concurrence: but I must not the less declare to you that the King's Government disapproves even of the paper which you have signed, as well because it offends against propriety, as because it is opposed to the true spirit of the law of the 18th Germinal, year 10. This law interdicts, in fact, all deliberations in an unauthorised assembly of bishops. It would be strange if such a proceeding could be eluded by means of a correspondence establishing a concert between the parties, and effecting deliberation without the necessity of holding a meeting. I hope that you will not have persisted in the course of the principles laid down in the organic articles of the Concordat for you to abstain for the future from attacking them."

The letter is dated the 8th of March.

The Republicans and Radicals continue most actively at work in getting up a subscription for presenting Admiral Dupetit-Thouars with a sword of honour. The sum already received amounts to 3267 francs. About 265 pounds of the Protestant School, who subscribed to the fund, have been punished with a forthnight's confinement to the school.

The garrison of Paris, at present moment, consists of fourteen regiments of infantry and cavalry, and 4500 municipal guards and veterans; in the suburbs there are seventeen regiments; making an effective force of 30,000 men.

The marriage of Mars, Versailles, and Courbilly, will take place during the months of April and May.

I have just learned that the murderers of Mr. Ward have been taken to the depot of the prefecture.

A new and curious experiment is about to be made in aérostation. A balloon made of sheets of copper is about to ascend at Versailles. It is supposed that, should it be pierced by the balls of guns, which are about 265 paces from the Hotel-Dieu School, who subscribed to the fund, have been punished with a forthnight's confinement to the school.

The following extract from the Boulogne Guardian of the 7th, is well worthy the attention of every Englishman who visits the continent. I remember once remonstrating with the Commissary of Police for charging me three francs, and threatened to report him to the Prefect of Police; his answer was, "I am not under the orders of the Prefect, but the Mayor of Boulogne; do as you please, but you shall not have your passport unless you pay three francs," and I paid it. The following is the article:—"An English gentleman has been tried by the Tribunal of Correctional Police of Boulogne for having instructed Messrs. Hengeret and Lusset the Commissaries of Police at the Passport office on the Port, in the execution of their duty; four witnesses were heard, who proved that the defendant, on the night set forth in the indictment, insulted the plaintiffs, both by making use of improper language towards them. The defendant, when called upon to state what he had to say in his defence, said, that on the night in question he landed at Boulogne and Folkestone, that on presenting himself at the Custom-house he was asked for his passport; that having been informed at the Secretary of State's office, where he had obtained it, that no one had a right to dispense him of it, he had refused to have it exchanged for another; that from hence arose the altercation with which he was charged, which had given rise to it, and for which he was marched off to prison. M. Marteau made a forcible and energetic defence on behalf of the defendant, and requested them of the imprisonment he client had already endured, and prayed that the defendant be not subjected to any further confinement. The court sentenced the defendant to pay a fine of 500 francs (£20), and costs. The case excited considerable interest amongst the English residents. The British Consul was in attendance during the whole trial."

Captain Hamilton Moray has been appointed Governor of the island of Bourbon.

The Commerce says that the judicial authorities at Marseilles, in the late affair between the Romulus and Laurentine, have declared the English to have been in the wrong, and caused a warrant to arrest one of the sailors of the Romulus, on a charge of tearing and insulting the flag of the Laurentine.

It is expected that the monument of Goethe will be erected at Frankfort, his native place, in the month of July next.

We have nothing fresh in the musical world. The ballet of "Lady Henriette" draws well at the Grand Opera. Last night Mario took his benefit at the Italian Opera. "Le Puritani" was well given: the house was crowded. Thalberg is expected in Paris at the end of March. An English family has just arrived in Paris; it is composed of Mr. John Distin and his four sons. These artists intend giving a series of concerts; they perform the most difficult pieces on five bugles

The musical festival, given by the Rhenish Bavarian Musical Society, will take place at Deux Ponts, on the 30th of July, and 1st of August. On the first day will be exec ted, Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Paulus," and on the second day, one of Beethoven's symphonies, a work from Marschner and Mendelssohn, "The Night of Walpurgis;" Benedict has met with great success at Berlin, in the character of Romeo. Schmith's Oratorio, "Moses," continues a great favourite in the Prussian capital. A new ballet has been brought out in Brunswick, called "Lurley," a Rhenish Legend: it is interspersed with trios, solos, and duets.

On the 11th instant, Clara Novello (born in London), was married in Vienna, to Count del Giglucci, a noble Venitian, Chamberlain to the Emperor, and the necessary of immense landed property. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Vienna, in the presence of most of the court and other high officers. The Countess, after appearing as Anna, in "Don Juan," quits the stage for ever.

A new opera called "The Robbers," the libretto from Schiller, has been brought out at Ofen, in Hungary. At Prague, Nicolo's "Cinderella" has been most enthusiastically received. A Russian composer, Paul Pauwitz, has written a most delightful opera, "Bramant," for the Riga theatre.

On removing some old furniture in the palace at Stockholm there has been discovered two love songs, composed by the great King Gustavus Adolphus, in 1615

Two young artists, of whom report speaks most highly, will make their début the end of this month in Madrid, in Rossini's opera, "Moses;" they are Signori Barba and the Signora Chimena.

Lucili Grahn is dancing with great success at the Scala. The report of the death of Madame Rosse-Caccia is contradicted.

TURKEY.

Our private letter from Constantinople of the 21st ult. states that the Porte appeared little inclined to give the written pledge required by the English and French Ambassadors, "that the punishment of death should not again be inflicted upon the subjects of the Sultan who embraced Mahometanism, might subsequently recant its tenets. The Turkish Ministers regarded the demand as an interference with their national independence and their religious laws, and were determined not to yield the point, and abide the consequences of their refusal. The last accounts from Albania intimated that a general insurrection would shortly take place in that province.

AMERICA.

ARRIVAL OF THE HIBERNIA.—This splendid vessel arrived at Liverpool on Wednesday evening from Boston and Halifax, having made a rapid passage, considering the time of the year. She left the former port on the 21st, and Halifax on the 3rd inst., entering the Mersey at twenty minutes to six o'clock, thus making the passage in ten days from the latter port. She brings sixteen days later news from America, a very short passage, and about forty passengers.

She brings intelligence of a very frightful calamity, by the explosion of the newly-invented gun of the Princeton, of which so much has been said of late. By the bursting of one of the great guns of this vessel, the Secretary of State, Mr. Upshur, the Secretary of the Navy, Governor Gilmer, Com. Kennon, Chief of the Bureau of Construction of the Navy, Vigil Maxey, Esq., and Mr. Gardiner, of Southampton, New York, were instantly killed, and six sailors are reported badly wounded.

The following is the account, as given in the latest papers:—"It seems that on the morning of the 28th ult. the President was about an excursion, having several hundred guests on board. The ship proceeded down the river below Mount Vernon, and on its return, when in about 20 minutes run of Alexandria, the large gun on the bow was fired, it being the second or third time it had been discharged with ball, and the usual service charge, and, exploding at the breech, spread death and destruction on the deck. Besides the victims that are named in the list, and several of the crew, belonging to the ship, several were killed or mortally wounded, and several others are missing. The breech of the gun was severed, and carried away the bulwark of the ship opposite to it. It was like iron fragments, it is supposed, which struck down so many on board, and who could not have been behind the gun. Colonel Benton and Captain Stockton were slightly injured. Colonel Benton's injury arose not from any fragment of the gun, but merely from the concussion. He was at the butt end of the gun, taking its range when it fired. He was not sensible of its stunning effect until he had called for aid to the bleeding sailors. He was stunned for a time, but was recalled to walk after reaching the shore, and has given a distinct account of the dreadful scene. Captain Stockton was burnt by the powder, but not seriously injured. The accident took place about sunset. A steam-boat from Alexandria, which was passing, was sent back to town, and returned with several surgeons. The Princeton yet lies at anchor at the place where the frightful accident occurred, with the bodies on board. Most of the guests have arrived in the city. The President of the United States, who was on board at the time of the explosion, escaped unhurt. One of the President's servants, a coloured man, has since died. Captain Stockton having, on successive days, extended invitations to call his ship to the Executive and Committee of Congress, and then to both houses, invited the ladies of the city to an entertainment on this, which was meant as the gala day of his beautiful ship. It opened brightly, but has closed in the most dreadful gloom with our community. The only circumstance calculated to relieve the all-pervading distress is, that of the multitude of ladies who were on board the ship, not one was injured. We understand that Mrs. Gilmer was upon deck when her husband fell. It was the third discharge of the gun (and fired at the request of Mr. Gilmer) that burst it. The daughter of Mr. Upsher, several of the family of Com. Kennon, and the daughters of Mr. Gardiner, were on board the steamer. A journal has just been given to the numerous striking publicity. I have no doubt that this last fact occurred without your concurrence: but I must not the less declare to you that the King's Government disapproves even of the paper which you have signed, as well because it offends against propriety, as because it is opposed to the true spirit of the law of the 18th Germinal, year 10. At the usual weekly meeting of the Repeal Association held at Conciliation Hall, on Monday, the following letter from Mr. O'Connell to the Secretary, Mr. Ray, was read by Mr. John O'Connell.

"London, March 9, 1844.

"My dear Ray—Nothing can exceed the enthusiasm of the reception I received at Birmingham. It would be impossible for any person who was not present to form an adequate idea of it. This delights me. It consolidates the combination of all genuine Reformers in both countries. We have everybody with us on English ground except the minions of the Government, on the one hand, and the dishonest portion of the Chartists on the other; for, I do assure you, that there are some honest men amongst the Chartists; not many to be sure, but still some. These artists mistook my object when on presenting myself at the Reform Club in Birmingham I declined to be introduced to the Chartists. Though not numerous, they are active, and continue, wherever they can, to tyrannize over public meetings. But they could not do so in a degree in the summer, and about 2 minutes less in the winter; but there are some days on which the whole are may not be more than 3 minutes, and on others it may be more than a degree.

THE HORIZONTAL FORCE MAGNET.

Next is a view of the Horizontal Force Magnet, viewed from a position S.W. of it. a, the Magnet. b, the Mirror carried by the Magnet, with the screws for adjustment. c, the Torsion-circle. d, the system of five pairs of small pulleys. e, e, two halves of a skein of silk, which, rising from the upper pair of pulleys, to another pair of pulleys, 7 feet 9 inches above them, f, then over the pulleys at g; and so down and over a single large pulley, not shown in the drawing, whose axis is attached to a string that passes down to the windlass, the handle of which is represented at h. i, a copper bar encircling the whole Magnet.

The magnet is of the same dimensions as the Declination Magnet. It is supported by a broad tripod stand, resting on the ground, and not touching the floor. The stand rises 11 feet 3 inches above the floor, carrying at the top the pulleys for the suspension of the Magnet, represented at f and g. The Magnet vibrates in a double rectangular box, similar to that in which the Declination Magnet vibrates. Part of the south side of the box is of plate glass.

At the distance of 6 feet 3 inches due S. of the magnet is fixed to the wall of the east arm, a scale of numbers, these numbers are seen with a fixed telescope directed to the mirror which the magnet carries. The telescope is fixed to a wooden tripod stand, whose feet pass through the floor without touching it, and are firmly connected with piles driven into the ground. Its position is shown (at c) in the ground plan; and it is such that an observer, sitting in a chair at o, can, by turning his head, look into the telescope of any one of the three magnets. This magnet is placed very nearly transverse to the magnetic meridian, and held there by the directive power of the two halves of the suspending skein, e e. The magnet is constantly endeavouring to move to the magnetic meridian, or parallel to the Declination Magnet, and as the magnetic power increases or diminishes, the two threads of the suspending skein become more or less twisted; and different numbers of the scale are seen in the observing telescope, from which the variations of the force are determined. It is found that at about noon the magnetic force is least, as the magnet is the least drawn towards the N. It then moves toward the N. till about 9 P.M.; it remains nearly stationary till 11 P.M.; it moves again towards N., is checked in its motion again at about 4 A.M., and arrives at 6 A.M. with its marked end at the extreme N. position.

THE VERTICAL FORCE MAGNET.

The next cut represents the South View of the Vertical Force Magnet. a, the Magnet. b, the Mirror carried by the Magnet, with the screws for adjust ment. c, one of the two steel Knife-edges; similar to the Knife-edge of a balance or pendulum. d, one of the two Agate planes, on which the Knife-edges rest. e, e, screws by which the elevation of the centre of gravity and the inclination of the magnet in its position of rest, can be altered. f, a brass frame on which the instrument is placed.

This magnet is of the same dimensions as the other two magnets. It is supported upon a block, connected with a tripod stand, which passes through the floor and rests on the ground. Its position, by referring to the ground plan, will be seen to be, as nearly as possible, symmetrical with that of the Horizontal Force Magnet in the opposite arm. The whole is inclosed in a similar double-box to those in which the other magnets vibrate, resting on the block of wood above mentioned. In this box, the magnet vibrates freely up and down. A part of the south side of the box is of plate-glass. A tripod stand (symmetrical in form and position with that for carrying the telescope of the Horizontal Force Magnet) carries a telescope, which, being directed towards the mirror, the observer sees in the telescope the numbers on the scale, which is vertical and fixed to the stand carrying the telescope, and whose position is indicated in the ground plan at A. As the magnet inclines more or less to the horizon, the numbers on the scale, as seen through the telescope, increase or diminish, from which the variations of the vertical force are determined. It is found that at two o'clock in the morning the marked end of this magnet is less drawn towards the horizon, and at four P.M. it is more drawn down than at any other time in the day.

ELECTRIC LIGHT APPARATUS.

The adjoining cut represents the apparatus at the top of the Electrical Pole. a, the lantern at the top; the lamp is always burning. b, the copper tube on which the lantern slides. c, the dotted lines represent a cone of glass, on which the copper tube carrying the umbrella A above, is fixed, to protect the glass from rain, &c. d, a wooden apparatus enclosing the lower part of the cone of glass; the lower part of the glass is hollowed out, and lined with copper, immediately under which is placed a lamp, represented in the drawing at e, which is constantly kept burning for the purpose of heating the copper, and thus keeping the glass dry. f, the wire communicating with the electrical instruments in the ante-room. g, g, iron rods upon which the whole apparatus slides up and down.

ELECTRICAL APPARATUS.

The Electrical Apparatus, as it appears in the window of the ante-room, is represented in the next cut. a, the hook, representing the connexion of the conducting wire with the apparatus. b, an umbrella to cover the opening in the upper part of the window, through which an upright rod passes, carrying the apparatus below. c, c, a double cone of glass supported by the upper part of the window, by brackets at each end. d, d, lamps placed nearly at the end of each cone of glass, for the purpose of keeping the glass dry. e, a collar encircling the glass, and by means of the vertical rod f supporting the hollow copper tube g, carrying the several electrical rods, which can be moved upward and downwards; by this means can be brought into connexion with the electrical instruments immediately underneath, and can be fixed by screws in any position. h, a Bohnenburger's single-leaf pendent-gold-leaf Electroscope, and a pair of Zamboni's dry electric piles. This instrument is extremely sensible to slight changes of electrical excitation, and it indicates, in a marked manner, not only the presence, but the kind, of electricity. i, a Galvanometer, for exhibiting currents of electricity in the atmosphere. k, an instrument to measure the lengths of the electrical sparks. l, another dry-pile apparatus, similar to h, but less sensitive. m, m, Straw Electrometers, much used in observing electrical changes in the atmosphere. They are furnished with graduated arcs, to estimate the amount of the electric force.

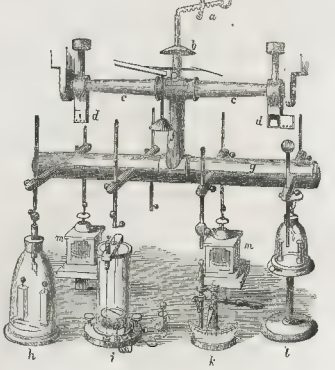
lantern a. The glass cone below it being kept dry is a non-conductor; therefore, the only way that the electricity can escape is down the wire f, and so to the several instruments h, i, k, l, m and m. As this apparatus has not been long in use, it would be premature to say much about the results; but, however, it seems certain that on the first appearance of fog, rain, snow, hail, or sleet, the electricity is generally negative, and often highly so, but it afterwards undergoes frequent transitions to positive and then again negative.

Electric sparks are frequently obtained. The colour of the spark is blue, and frequently violet and purple.

Our space will not allow us to detail the many other instruments in daily use at this active observatory. The following are some of the results which are constantly deduced:—the mean position on every day, in every month, in quarterly periods, and for the year; also at every even hour, in every month, in quarterly periods, and for the year; of the following instruments:—

Those of the three magnets which we have described

From the observations of the Barometer, its mean height.



THE ELECTRIC BELL, AND APPARATUS.

From the observations of the Dry Thermometer, the mean temperature.

From the observations of the Dry and Wet Thermometer, are deduced:

The temperature of the Dew Point.

The elastic force of Vapour in the Atmosphere.

The weight of a cubic foot of Air.

The weight of the Moisture in a cubic foot of Air.

The degree of moisture in the air—when completely saturated, being considered as unity.

From the Anemometer, &c., the direction and strength of the wind.

From the observations of the clouds, their mean state.

From the observations of the rain collected, its quantity, and many other results.

The business of the Observatory, it will be seen, embraces Magnetism, Electricity, and Meteorology, in their fullest senses.

There were only three assistants attached to this Observatory till 1842; this number was increased to four in 1843. With this number the observations can be kept up; but they are barely sufficient for computing the mass of calculation which the observations require.

QUEEN CHRISTINA'S PROGRESS IN SPAIN.

THE ARRIVAL AT BARCELONA.

PROGRESS OF QUEEN CHRISTINA, IN SPAIN.

On the 4th instant, Queen Christina entered Barcelona; and the whole place was a scene of veritable triumph. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed everywhere: the city was brilliantly illuminated. Our engraving represents the moment of the royal entry.

The second engraving is another scene in the triumphal progress—Hannibal's Bridge, on the Madrid road, about fifteen miles from Barcelona: this fine structure is said to have been built by the Carthaginian general.

CROSSING HANNIBAL'S BRIDGE.

Chatham.—Military Prisons.—The Committee on Military Prisons, composed of Major General the Earl of Cathcart, president; Colonel Grant, Grenadier Guards; Colonel Godwin, Royal Engineers; and Major Jebb, of the Royal Engineers, arrived at Rochester at twelve o'clock on Monday, and were received at the Bull Inn by Colonel Sir T. Wiltshire, Bart., Commandant of Chatham; Brigade Major O'Brien, Colonel Wright, Royal Engineers; and Major Smith, Barrack Master. At one o'clock they proceeded to the Military Lunatic Asylum at Fort Clarence, and made a minute inspection of the interior of that fortress, with a view to converting it into a prison for military offenders belonging to the different garrisons in the county of Kent. The committee afterwards visited the new cells in Chatham Barracks, which have not yet been opened for the reception of prisoners, and then left for London.

Chemmongers' Benevolent Institution.—On Wednesday the eighth annual meeting of the friends and supporters of this charity was held at the London Tavern; Mr. Davies, Treasurer, in the chair. Mr. Simpson read the report, and it appeared that the subscriptions for the past year exceeded those of the previous year by £32, and the donations also exceeded those of the previous year by £182. The receipts for the past year were £1034 10s. 9d., and the funded property was £5300. The pensions to aged and decayed members of the trade amounted to £360, and £300 stock was purchased during the year. Two pensioners were elected, making in all twenty-eight recipients of the charity's bounty.

Lord Clements and the Leitrim Grand Jury.—The following curious paragraph appears in the Limerick Chronicle:—"The Leitrim Grand Jury have felt much annoyed at the statement in the House of Commons by Lord Clements, as to the reverse of fortune of some member of that body, whose wife was obliged to milk cows. The grand jury addressed Lord Clements, requiring an explanation, which his lordship refused. Each married member then requested his authority, but this he also refused, adding that he had his information from a Protestant clergyman. The grand jury entered into resolutions contradictory of the statement, and the Rev. A. Hyde then stated that he had communicated the information to Lord Clements respecting a gentleman so reduced as to oblige his wife to milk her own cow, but denied having stated that it was a grand juror's wife."

CHURCHES OF THE METROPOLIS.—No. XL.

ST. GILES'S, CRIPPLEGATE.

This is one of the few churches in the City of London, which were not reached by the great fire of 1666. It is situated without the ancient London wall, and at the south-west corner of Fore-street, nearly opposite the ends of Redcross-street and Whitecross-street. The church was originally built and founded about the year 1090, by Alfune, the first Master of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. It was destroyed by fire in 1545; and the present structure was then erected. It is of the pointed or English style of architecture, is 174 feet in length, 63 in breadth, and 32 in height. It has a large and lofty square tower, with a pinnacle at each angle, and a low clocher in the centre. Within the tower are thirteen bells, if we mistake not; a larger peal than in any other church of the Metropolis.

This church is more remarkable as the burial-place of several eminent men, than for any architectural beauty: here rest the remains of the pious John Fox, the author of the "Book of Martyrs;" of Speed, the historian and topographer; and of Henry Welby, the Lincolnshire hermit, who lived in Grub-street forty years without being seen. Many of the actors at the Fortune Theatre, in Whitecross-street, are also buried here: in the chancel lie the ashes of Milton, whose memorial, a bust by Bacon, was set up in the year 1790, by the patriotic Samuel Whitbread; thus, the author of "Paradise Lost," "perhaps, the greatest continuous effort of human imagination," lay here nearly a century and a quarter without a monument to denote his resting-place. Oliver Cromwell, too, was married in this church; and it contains a tablet of one Constance Whitney, represented rising from a coffin, erroneously believed to have been buried alive in a trance, and restored to life by the sexton digging up the body, to obtain possession of a ring upon one of her fingers.

Over the south-east door of the church is a figure of Time, with his scythe, &c., beautifully sculptured. Part of the ancient City wall is still remaining on the south and east sides of the church-yard; particularly one of the bastions, which is close against the back of Barbers' Hall, in Monkwell-street.

The patronage of this church was originally in private hands, but it descended to Alemund, who granted it to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, in whom it still continues. The church is a vicarage in the city and archdeaconry of London.

The site of this parish was anciently a fen or moor, and its houses and gardens were accounted a village without the wall of London, called Mora, whence the district called the Moor and Moorfields. This village increased greatly, and was constituted a prebend of St. Paul's Cathedral, which it still continues under its ancient name; and the prebendary of More without the Wall of London, hath the ninth stall on the south side of the choir in St. Paul's Cathedral.

Colonelcy of the First West India Regiment.—The appointment to the Colonelcy of the First West India Regiment, vacant by the decease of Lieut.-General Sir G. H. B. Way, has been conferred on that distinguished officer, Major-General Sir G. T. Napier, K.C.B.

Removal of Convicts.—Early on Saturday morning, a large number of convicts, under sentence of transportation, were removed from the Millbank prison, and placed on board the Blundell and the London transport ships now lying off the Royal Arsenal, at Woolwich. The London (a fine vessel of 700 tons burden) takes out 250 of the lighter class of offenders, and is bound to Hobart Town. The Blundell carries 210 of the worst class, her destination being the penal settlement of Norfolk Island.

Fire on Board the John Bull Steam-ship.—On Tuesday evening, at about half-past five o'clock, a fire broke out on board the General Steam Navigation Company's steam-ship, John Bull, Captain T. B. Corbin, commander, lying off Devis a wharf, Horsleydown. The vessel, it appeared, was receiving a cargo, preparatory to sailing next morning for Hamburgh, and the crew had just completed it, when the engineer came up on deck and gave the alarm of the ship being on fire. The captain, observing that most part of the smoke issued from the main hold, gave orders for the cargo to be removed, which was immediately carried into effect; the remainder of the crew getting the hose and fire-pumps in readiness to play upon the flames. The fire was found to be in the forecastle on the starboard side under the main deck, and it was checked without occasioning any serious damage. The fire seems to have arisen from negligence on the part of some of the crew by leaving a lighted candle stuck against the bulkhead.

Fire on Board the Theresa.—Loss of Two Lives.—On Saturday morning, between one and two o'clock, the Theresa brig, Nicholls, laden with coals, and lying at the east side of the basin at Mutton Cove, near the dockyard, Devonport, was discovered to be on fire by the Custom House officer, and the policeman near the spot. The latter immediately proceeded to the station-house and dockyard, and gave the alarm, while the Custom-house officer went directly on board, and stamped with his foot on the deck to awaken the crew. In the shortest possible time the town engines arrived, and Lieut. Williams, R.N., the director of the police, with a party of the dockyard force and an engine, and Colonel Clarke and a party of the 76th Regiment, with another engine, and a party of Royal Artillery, was also immediately by the wharf, but the tide being out, it was with great difficulty they obtained water, and then the town engines were, from some defects, comparatively useless. The force under Lieutenant Williams, however, used great exertions, and did much service in extinguishing the flames; but the most efficient assistance was rendered by the engine of the Caledonia, flag ship, Capt Milne, son of the gallant Port Admiral, which was promptly in attendance. To Captain Milne great credit is due, for he was at the spot during the whole of the time, and judiciously directed the engine belonging to his ship. Soon after the engines arrived the mate of the Custom-house officer, on the deck of the vessel, brought a lad named Philp, about 14 years of age, to the companion ladder, and he was seen among the smoke and flames climbing up to the hatchway, and the officer and a man named Restarick made every effort to save him; but, unfortunately, the ladder was burnt through, and giving way, the poor boy fell back into the flames, and it was not until after three subsequent attempts had been made, that they were successful in getting him out, during which the parties exposed themselves very much, and Restarick had his hand burnt severely. The state of the unfortunate youth may easily be imagined, having nothing on but his shirt; he was actually roasted, and was altogether in a frightful condition when taken away to the workhouse, where he expired in great agony about eleven o'clock the same morning. The fire having been got under, the men proceeded to ascertain the damage the vessel had sustained, when in the steerage berth they found the body of one of the apprentices, named John Davis, aged 19, and a native of Devonport, burnt almost to a cinder. It was in a sitting posture, and the charred remains of one leg separate: he was the only person on board beside Philp. The whole of the cabin was destroyed, but the hold, being crammed with coals, checked the further progress of the fire. From the statement of the poor boy Philp before his death, it appears he was on board about nine o'clock on Friday evening, and having carefully put out the light, went to bed. It is supposed that the fire originated from some act of carelessness with the candle on the part of Davis, who is said to have gone on board late, as it broke out in the part in which he slept. The unfortunate youth Philp was the son of a clerk at Newport, and having a strong bias for the sea, against the wishes of his friends he was indulged by his parent in a trip in the Theresa. The brig is the property of Mr. Thos. Billing, of Devonport, and was not insured.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1844.

SOCIAL questions seem taking the place of political ones in the attention of the Legislature. The very decided preponderance which one party had over the other, makes the discussion of political, in the sense of party, questions, too much of a "foregone conclusion" to be very effective. In the last great debate on Ireland, the majority was calculated to a nicety, long before the division; and even in that controversy social evils were as much mixed up as political principles. But that contest over, for the present, the house seems to have fallen back entirely on social subjects. Lord Ashley, a lauded nobleman, endeavours to shorten the hours of toil to the manufacturing operative; Mr. Cobden, a monied manufacturer, asks for an enquiry into the effect of import duties on farm tenants and agricultural labourers; Mr. Hume has assailed the high tax on tobacco; Mr. Labouchere the duties on sugar; the corn-law itself is but part of our social and commercial system, and is only made a political question by perverting it. Law reforms, whether civil, or minal, or ecclesiastical, are but other branches of the same great system. All these may be, and some of them are, discussed on other principles than those which are brought to bear upon party questions. But the result of the discussion is pretty much according to the mode in which they are dealt with; it is not every question that comes from under the hands of the Legislature improved in its bearing on the people.

Among the subjects on which that rectifying instrument for all things that go wrong in the body politic—a bill—has been framed and brought in, is the question of the Inclosure of Common Lands. The question of inclosure has always been viewed with extreme dislike by the people, meaning by the term all except those who benefitted by the process. It has more than once been the cause of local rebellions, which anticipated the violences of "Rebecca and her Daughters." But the rich being the strongest, the poor have been continually deprived of the enjoyment of old rights and customs—the pasture for the cow, the right of turf-cutting, the assistance of the soil in providing the cotter with food and fuel, has gradually been taken from him; from the condition of a man standing erect, with something like an interest, however slight, in the land of his birth, he is reduced to the dreary level of pauperism, with no right but that of admission—in the last stage of destitution—to the union workhouse. For all these Inclosure Acts there was a thin pretence of an anxiety to benefit the poor themselves by giving them additional employment. They get it—for a time—for hedges cannot be raised and planted, nor fields drained and ploughed without labour. But after the first period of activity, the labour returns no more, or only at long intervals, and the fields and inclosures remain shut to the peasant—the property of another—in which he cannot set his foot without the fear of the law of trespass before his eyes. This increased employment to the labourers, so much talked of, it should be remembered, can only be given where the inclosed lands remain in tillage. But this is a mere contingency; in most cases the chances are that after the first few crops, which exhaust the vigour of the land, very rarely of superior quality, the soil returns to its old state of wildness, and becomes what it was before—heath or down; but the right of the poor man to graze a cow or keep a pig upon it never revives. It remains private property, even though almost useless to the possessor; doing certain injury to one class, and good to no one. We have seen cases of this kind in the south of England which amply bear out our assertion. They were inclosures made during the continuance of war prices: a few corn crops were obtained—an immediate profit was probably made; but the poor of the locality to all after generations have been and will be impoverished. In other cases, the inclosures are intended for plantations; in this case, the land gives no employment to labourers after the first outlay. Here the plea of increased employment is again little more than a blind and subterfuge.

The evil of all these encroachments on recognised rights is, that those who suffer from them have no voice in the matter: and that those who benefit by the change are the framers and disposers of the law that effects it. All inclosure bills have been brought in by landlords, and passed by a house of landowners. But this separate dealing with each case as it arose having been found tedious—and withal expensive—the present bill is a general measure, preventing the necessity of applying to Parliament at all as before. In the description of the bill there is not even a pretence of any benefit to the poor; it is proposed simply to save expence to the landowners; the object of the Act is thus stated by the Chronicle:—

With the view of relieving landowners from the heavy expense of procuring local Acts of Parliament in each case for enclosing, or otherwise dealing with THEIR lands—which cannot be calculated at less than from £400 to £500, even under favourable circumstances—Lord WORSLEY proposes to substitute, in lieu of Committees of the two Houses, an unpaid Commission, to which is to be entrusted "the responsibility of deciding whether the" intended "enclosure ought to be proceeded with."

Will any peasants, labourers, small tenants, or cotters be allowed a seat in the Commission, even though it is to be "unpaid?" We imagine not. Thus, the parties most benefitted are made the judges in their own case, to the doing a manifest injustice, and the perversion of the principle of the law of the land, which regards the soil "on which a nation resides as the property of the community." The bill has passed its second reading, but not without considerable opposition, unfortunately stronger in arguments than in numerical force. Mr. Sharman Crawford opposed it on the old principles of the constitution, as formed by our Saxon ancestors; Colonel Sibthorp, because it would injure the poor both in condition, health, and recreation; Mr. Hume, on similar grounds. Some Members assented to its principle, but would not pledge themselves to support its details; while Sir R. Peel himself thinks that in the vicinity of towns too rigid an inclosure of land is detrimental to the health and morals of the people. Holding such an opinion, we wonder he had not opposed more strongly the principle of a measure that seems to give indiscriminate power of inflicting wrong, and extraordinary facilities to usurpation.

THE most interesting event of the week, out of the House, but immediately affecting the parties within it, has been the banquet given to Mr. O'Connell, at Covent-Garden Theatre, which we have illustrated and alluded to elsewhere. The most important discussion in the House has been that caused by Mr. Cobden's motion for a select committee to enquire into the effect of import duties on the condition of the tenant-farmers and labourers. The Times, that on this point may be quoted as a witness certainly not prejudiced in Mr. Cobden's favour, says that he stated his case "with great temper and moderation," and regrets that the Conservative party should by neglect have allowed the question of the condition of the agricultural class to fall into his hands at all. The motion was rejected by a majority of 91—the exact number, it will be recollected, of the majority Sir R. Peel obtained in the elections of 1841. The recent divisions on the more important questions between the great parties, show that the Conservative members are firmly held together, with no signs of discord in the camp. Their majority on the Irish debate was 98; they have mustered only a few less in numbers against Mr. Cobden and his wish to benefit the farm labourers. Very many of the facts he used with such effect, were singularly enough derived from the Reports of the Committees of Enquiry, formerly appointed by the party that now refuse one.

WHILE the Emperor of Russia is banishing the Jews from his frontiers, breaking up societies and families, destroying property, and breaking the hearts and hopes of thousands of this ancient and persecuted people, the Emperor of Austria is doing honour to an individual of the same faith and nation, but in all other respects how different from the many sufferers by the barbarous despotism of the Russian Autocrat. The following appears among the foreign news of the week:—

VIENNA, Feb. 29.—The Emperor, by letters patent of the 15th inst., countersigned by all the Ministers, and sealed with the grand seal, has granted to Baron Salomon Rothschild, the head of the firm of Rothschild, in our capital, and to his male and legitimate heirs, the right of purchasing and holding real property of every description in the provinces of Moravia and Silesia. He thus acquires a right which is denied to all the Israelites throughout the Austrian monarchy. The title of honorary burgess of Vienna, conferred upon him last year by our municipality, secures to him a similar privilege in our capital.

Such is the effect of the "money-power," the talisman that softens the hearts of Emperors, and opens the eyes of Kings, enabling them to see in one individual of a race, "a man whom the King delighteth to honour," while thousands of the same blood they crush to the earth by an ukase or a decree. The common herd are swept from their territories as if they polluted the soil; they are driven forth with as little ceremony, and much less care, than if they were so many head of cattle. But the possessor of gold—the charm, the spell, without which even an Emperor, were he ten times a Bourbon, would be despised—cannot be injured. There is a circle round him that not even the ukase of a despot can cross, or perchance the dazzle and glitter of the court, or the appointments of some half-dozen crack regiments, would vanish like frost-work in the sun. Compare the position of a Rothschild, one of the real "Lords of Europe," with that of a poor Jew of Lithuania—can any two human conditions be wider asunder? It is unavoidable; we may modify the old adage, and say, "money is power;" and having so much of both, holding such sway, not over the hearts but the necessities of Kings, and being able to do so much to serve or thwart the projects of Ministers of State, could not a Rothschild interpose with at least some effect between the imperious despot and his poor fellow Jew driven at the lance's point through the snows of Russia, from a home where he at least existed, to a place where it is a matter of chance if he will be able to exist at all?

AN appeal "To the Benevolent," which appears in our advertising columns this week, is one which eminently merits the attention of the humane.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

HER Majesty and Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens on Saturday forenoon. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen and Prince Albert, and partook of a déjeuné with her Majesty and his Royal Highness. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert rode out afterwards on horseback, attended by Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Albert, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel in Buckingham Palace. The Rev. Dr. Little Courtenay officiated.

On Monday the Queen and Prince Albert walked in the royal gardens during the morning. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent again visited her Majesty, and afterwards dined with her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert.

Precisely the same routine was observed at the Palace on Tuesday.

On Wednesday the Queen held her first levee for the season, at St. James's Palace. It was fully attended, the presentations being unusually numerous. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the royal suite, arrived from Buckingham Palace in state carriages, escorted by a squadron of Life Guards, and were received at the garden entrance of St. James's Palace by the Lord Chamberlain (Earl Delaware), and the Lord Steward (the Earl of Liverpool), who conducted them to the royal closet. The Queen and Prince Albert, attended by the cabinet ministers and officers of state, then proceeded to the throne room, when the foreign ambassadors and ministers were presented. His Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington wore their uniforms as field marshals. Among the earlier arrivals were the Lord Chancellor, Sir Robert Peel, the Marquis of Conyngham, Lord Stanley, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Jersey, Marquis of Salisbury, the American, Saxon, French, Austrian, and Prussian Ministers, with their respective suites; Viscount Canning, the Duke of Leeds, Sir Robert Chester, the Master of the Ceremonies, &c. The Lord Mayor, and Sheriffs Musgrove and Moon, were presented by Sir James Graham, the Home Secretary. The guard of honour was furnished by the Grenadier Guards. Several gentlemen were disappointed in their presentation to the Queen, in consequence of not having borne in mind that the Court was in mourning for the demise of Prince Albert's father. The difficulty was easily obviated by the officers of the army and navy, the household, deputy-lieutenants, &c., by placing crape round the left arm; but not so with those who were dressed in claret-coloured coats, with steel buttons, white silk stockings, &c.

ST. JAMES'S PALACE.—Wednesday being the first occasion upon which the state apartments have been thrown open since they have been newly embellished and furnished, their improved appearance was a subject of general remark at the levee held by the Queen. The usual business connected with the manufacture. The draperies in the Throne Room and the Queen's Closet, are composed of crimson and gold tissue-de-verre, relieved by crimson velvet, which it was allowed might be changed on occasions with the appointments of the throne, for a tissue of the foreign loom. The walls are hung with crimson brocade. The hangings of the throne are of crimson silk velvet, emblazoned with gold. Her Majesty's seat is formed of the same materials, edged with deep mallon fringe of a costly description. The window curtains are elastely embroidered. The two large drawing-rooms are finished in a style of corresponding magnificence. The valuable paintings which cover the walls of the apartments have also been cleaned. The effect of these renovations is extremely good, and elicited general approbation.

Confident hopes are entertained in the highest quarters of a visit to this country of the Emperor of Russia. In the feeling of gratification we are sure that all our countrymen will cordially join. Many persons in the political circles have been inclined to suppose a certain ulterior design of conciliation with France, as well as amity to our gracious Sovereign, on the visit of an Imperial Majesty; and have thought that this auspicious visit would coincide with that of the King of the French to England; but we consider those conjectures as utterly unfounded. We have only further to state that the visit of the Emperor is expected to take place in the month of May.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

INDIGENT BLIND SOCIETY, SOUTHWARK.—The annual meeting of the subscribers to this charity was held on Thursday last, at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill. The usual business connected with the statement of receipts and expenditure having been gone through, the proceedings terminated.

IRON AND METAL FOUNDERS' INSTITUTION.—The first anniversary meeting was held at the London Tavern on Thursday last, when the chair was occupied by Mr. Alderman Thompson, M.P. for Westmoreland county. The proceedings having commenced, the chairman made some introductory remarks, after which the secretary read the report, which congratulated the members on the success that had attended the operations of the committee during the first year. It appeared that the receipts were £822 8s. 1; deducting the small amount of expenses, a balance of £784 14s. 10d. remained with the treasurer. The report having been received and adopted in the usual manner, the officers, &c., were appointed for the ensuing year, after which a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Alderman Thompson for presiding. The meeting then separated.

BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.—The annual meeting of the members of this institution, was held on Thursday last, at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street. The chair was occupied by Cosmo Orme, Esq., who having opened the proceedings, the report was read by the secretary, which commenced by detailing the statement of receipts and disbursements, from which it appeared that the total receipts had been, including a balance from the former account of £108 14s. 3d., £1424 ... d., there being, deducting the expenditure ... of £108 7s. 3d., with the treasurer. It appears that the sum of £12 17 8s. is invested with the commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt. The amount of unreserved being £483 16s. 11d. It further appears, that ... the year 20 persons had been relieved by the fund according ... The total number of members is now 416, viz.—His members, 266, annual subscribers 132, honorary members 48. The report refers to the proceedings of a former meeting, at which an erection of an asylum for decayed members was suggested, and stated that the expense of such an institution could easily be realised, from the large amount of subscriptions for the purpose ... received and adopted. A discussion then took place with reference to an alteration of one of the rules. After which the meeting separated.

Royal Masonic Institution.—On Wednesday evening the anniversary festival of the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys, was held at the Freemasons' Hall. The chair was filled by Benjamin Cabbell, Esq., M.P., and about 200 gentlemen sat down to a very splendid repast. Although there was not a member of either Lords or Commons present, the subscriptions amounted to above £400, including £25 from a Mr. Rewards, a resident in China.

The Literary Fund.—The annual general meeting of the members of this corporation was held on Wednesday at the society's chambers, in Great Russell-street, Bloomsbury. Sir Benjamin Hall, Bart., M.P., in the chair. There was a full attendance of members. The report stated that the sum distributed in relief to distressed author- their widows, and children, during the past year, was £1145, making a total sum of £23,705, annually applied to the same benevolent purposes since the foundation of the society. The Marquis of Lansdowne was re-elected president. The Marquis of Northampton, Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, Sir R. H. Inglis, &c., were re-elected vice-presidents.

New Post-office Arrangements.—The arrangements for communication between Ireland and England, so far as they have transpired, are as follow:—The mails from the interior of Ireland are to arrive in Dublin on and after the 15th of April, at 6 A.M. Letters brought by them for England will be dispatched from Kingstown for Liverpool at half-past 9 A.M. the same morning, and such letters as shall be for London will be delivered there on the following morning about 8 o'clock.

Meeting of Country Bankers.—A numerous meeting of country bankers was held on Thursday at twelve o'clock, at Herbert's (late Brown's) Hotel, Palace-yard. The reporters were respectfully informed, that as the meeting was a preliminary one, it was not desirable that the proceedings should be published; they were obliged to the press for its attention, but on this occasion reporters would not be admitted. We understand that Mr. Plumptre, M.P., presided as chairman of the meeting.

The Namur Mortar.—The stupendous and splendid trophy, taken at the siege of Namur by the army under Sir R. Goodricke, in the reign of William and Mary, and which was exhibited in the Armoury at the Tower previous to the fire, when the carriage was destroyed, has recently been landed at the Tower from Woolwich, where it had been sent to be refitted. It is now placed opposite the Ordnance-office; and from its immense size, being 18-inch bore, excites much interest and attraction.

Address to Mr. O'Connell at Covent Garden Theatre.—A meeting to address Mr. O'Connell was held on Thursday evening last, at the above-named establishment, which was crowded in every part, although the tickets of admission were charged for according to the regulations of the committee. Shortly after seven o'clock, Mr. O'Connell, accompanied by several friends, entered the meeting amidst the most enthusiastic applause. Mr. William John O'Connell who took the chair, stated at some length the objects of the meeting, which he said had been called for the purpose of presenting an address to Mr O'Connell, expressive of disapprobation at the conduct pursued by the Government during the late state trials. The chairman then read a complimentary address, which was presented to Mr. O'Connell, who acknowledged the compliment in a few words. The Irish gentleman said, that previous to coming to England, he had resolved upon attending a meeting of the Repealers of London for the purpose of expressing his thanks to them on the part of the members of the Loyal National Repeal Association, for the assistance they had afforded that body. He congratulated the people of Ireland on the fact of the popular voice of England being now raised in their favour. He was sure that the people of Ireland would not be ungrateful, and he hoped that the interests of the oppressed people of both countries would be reciprocally cultivated. After a very lengthened address, Mr. O'Connell concluded amidst the loudest demonstrations of respect and applause.—The meeting was then addressed by other gentlemen, whose observations were not of much importance. The proceedings then terminated.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

The Bishop of London intends commencing his course of confirmations for the present year at Christ Church, Newgate-street, on Wednesday, April 24, and not on May 8, as previously intended.

The Bishop of Hereford has consented to preach at the one hundred and forty-third anniversary of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, which will be held at St. Paul's on May 3.

The Lord Bishop of Exeter has instituted the Rev. Reginald Hobhouse to the rectory of St. Ive, Cornwall.

The Rev. Dr. Frederick Iliff has been presented to the incumbency of St. Philip's Church, Liverpool.

Ordination.—On Sunday, the 31st inst., the Lord Bishop of Carlisle held an ordination, in the parish church of Dalston, when the following gentlemen were admitted into holy orders, viz.:—Priests.—George Mercer Tandy, B.A., of St. John's College, Cambridge; Joseph Bland, B.A., of Trinity College, Dublin; Deacon.—Jackson Gilbanks, Student of Civil Law, of St. John's College Cambridge.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

MIDLAND CIRCUIT.—Lincoln.

(Before Chief Justice Tindal and a Common Jury.)

(Clarke v. Tatam.)

Mr. Hill and Mr. Whitehurst were for the plaintiff, and Mr. Humphrey for the defendant. The Litigant parties in the case stand in the relation of uncle and nephew to each other the former having been a captain in the 11th Regiment of Foot, but retired and living now as a property at Moulton, in the county; the latter being what is termed a gentleman farmer. It appeared that the plaintiff and defendant had been engaged in certain law proceedings respecting a right of road, which ended in the defendant having to pay the costs. It was suspected that had aggravated him; for on the Sunday next after the costs had been paid, he followed Captain and Mrs. Clarke, and their son, from church, and, overtaking them, saluted them with a shower of shabby, slanderous epithets on the uncle, and telling the plaintiff he was a——lying scoundrel, that he had got his——lying affidavit, and he would publish it to all the world. The defendant was also very abusive to Mrs Clarke. This kind of assault was repeated on Sunday in December last, when Mrs Clarke was obliged to take refuge from Tatam's violence of language in the house of a neighbouring gentleman and magistrate, before whom, subsequently, the depositions of the parties were taken. Mr. Humphrey, for Tatam, contended that if when the parties had gone before the magistrate, the defendant had been bound over to keep the peace, that would have been all that would have been required—Mr. Judge said, in his opinion, the assault was entirely unprovoked, and required not large, but temperate and substantial damages, such as would have the effect of keeping the defendant in check. The jury, to the surprise of many, gave the plaintiff 1s., whereupon the Chief Justice immediately said he should certify for costs, and, in his opinion, the assault was as premeditated as it was unprovoked.

POLICE.

Worship-street.—On Wednesday, James Burton and Henry Edwards were brought up for final examination before Mr. Broughton, charged with having been engaged in the manufacture of spurious money. In consequence of the police having received information that a gang of coiners had established themselves in a house situated in Green's-court, St. Luke's, between Golden and Hall, of the G division, they proceeded thither in company with constables Redmond and Cole on the afternoon of Wednesday se'nnight, in order to effect their capture. Finding the street door open, they proceeded upstairs to a room, the door of which was fastened, but, on knocking, it was immediately opened by a man, who, on looking into the room they observed the two prisoners, who were actively engaged in their nefarious occupation. They were both seated in front of a strong fire, on which a pipkin was placed, containing molten metal, and the prisoner Burton was in the act of pouring some of it from a large spoon into a plaster of Paris mould, which was held by the other prisoner. On observing the officers the prisoner Edmeads immediately thrust the heated mould into his mouth, and began destroying it with his teeth, but Sergeant Brennan, who had in the meantime advanced to the transom, instantly seized him by the throat, and forced him to disgorge the fragments, which he made a desperate attempt to swallow. On searching the room they discovered a quantity of files, scissors, and other instruments used in the fabrication of counterfeit coin, together with three perfect moulds, and some half-crown pieces which had evidently been recently cast. The whole of the apparatus and other materials were secured, and the prisoners were taken to the station-house. Sergeant Brennan stated that the prisoner Burton had been convicted of highway robbery, and had been since repeatedly in custody for counterfeiting. Mr. Powell, jun., who attended on the part of the police-office, also proved that Edmeads had been convicted of uttering spurious coin, for which he had been sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The prisoners, who declined saying anything, were committed for trial.

Guildhall.—Elizabeth Earnshaw and Emma Wells were placed at the bar for the purpose of being finally examined on various charges of shoplifting. Mr. Alderman Challis remarked, that the best course to adopt would be to take the depositions in all the cases which were perfect, and bind the witnesses over to prosecute, which, being done, Mr. Clarkson said that as the prisoners had now been one month in custody, and during that time the officers had done all in their power to ascertain whether the money in the two savings banks, standing in the names of the prisoners, was the produce of any robbery, and they not being able to trace it to such a source, he now applied to have the books given up to enable the prisoners to obtain such assistance as was necessary to their defence. Upon the principle of humanity it ought not to be withheld. Mr. Alderman Challis said, that a vast quantity of valuable property had been found, and although not traced, yet he was sure they could be traced without a great deal more forward and even if; besides, further evidence might be obtained, which would show the money might be the result of other robberies. Mr Clarkson: If not, you will let them have it?—Mr Alderman Challis: Certainly. Another of the prisoners asked to say something he would have, otherwise he should fully commit them for trial on the several charges: but they would be brought up on Monday, the 10th of April, and, should nothing transpire, they would then be sent to Newgate. The prisoners were then fully committed.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Fire in Fleet-street.—On Monday morning, shortly ... a fire occurred in the front cellar of Anderton's Hotel, 164, ... cellarman, in taking down a candle, for the purpose of decanting some wine, accidentally let fall a spark among the straw, which immediately ignited, and spread considerably before it was extinguished. Mr. Braidwood reports the damage done as follows:—"Burnt and damaged, two casks of wine, wood partitions, and joists of ground-floor in the front cellar severely scorched."

Awful Death.—On Wednesday last, an inquisition was taken before G. Thompson, Esq., coroner, within the precincts of Appleby gaol, touching the death of Edward Rolph, aged 18, killed on the tread-wheel the previous day. Rowland was one of the four youths committed since January last, for poaching on the Earl of Lonsdale's property, near Shap, and the circumstances attending his melancholy death will be found in the following evidence:—Thomas Thwaites, governor of the gaol, said:—On the 8th of January last deceased was committed to my custody, for night-poaching, for three months' hard labour, and to find sureties to keep the peace for twelve months afterwards. The hard labour consists of tread-wheel labour, and occasionally grinding malt with the hand-mill. Yesterday, about one o'clock, the deceased, with three other prisoners, was at work on the tread-wheel, and all went on correct till about five minutes to two o'clock, when the turnkey called to me and said that Rolph was killed on the wheel. I went immediately, and found deceased at a kneeling position on his right knee, and his head near the wheel; he appeared to me to be dead. The tread-wheel is divided into six compartments, by boards, which prevent the prisoners from seeing one another; deceased was in the fifth division, and the sixth was empty. The wheel consists of twenty-four steps; it revolves round twice a minute, and at each revolution a particular step strikes a bell with a wire. When deceased was taking his rest, he had nothing whatever to do in the wheel-house, but had gone there, and I am of opinion that he had fallen down, intending, by inserting his arm, to strike the bell, and so during, was drawn under the wheel. While prisoners are upon the wheel I consider it necessary that some one should be present; but there is no one present at such times either. I had not before been in attendance at the Insolvent Debtors Court, and had only just returned. At the time I received the alarm, I was making an entry of the discharge of an insolvent debtor.—Robert Watson said:—I am turnkey, and it is my duty to see that the prisoners perform their work at the tread-wheel. Yesterday, deceased, and three others were on the wheel; three of them were on, and one off, in rotation, at five minutes' rest. About half-past one o'clock in the afternoon I was in the passage of the prison, when I heard a noise, as if from the tread-wheel. I went immediately, and Joseph Graham, prisoner of the fourth division, said, "Ned has got his head fast between the wheel and the bell." I had been to open the door, and was returning when I heard the noise. I might be absent about a minute or a minute and a half, but was within ten or twelve yards of the wheel when the accident happened.—F. M. Dawsonne:—I am a surgeon at Appleby, and was called in to attend deceased. He was dead when I arrived. I have examined his skull, and found it extensively fractured; the upper part of the right arm bone is also fractured. Death was produced from the fracture of the skull and compression of the brain. The injuries which deceased received were such as to produce instant death.—Verdict, "Accidental Death."

Daring Robbery at the Bank.—On Thursday last the following robbery was committed in the drawing-office of the Bank of England:—A gentleman from King William-street was in the act of paying money to one of the receiving clerks, having previously placed his pocket-book on the counter, while he engaged some daring thief contrived to pursoin the pocket-book, which contained a Bank of England note for £20, one for £10, one for £5, and £7 17s. 6d. in gold and silver, being in all £42 17s. 6d., with the whole of which he got clear off.

Fire.—On Wednesday morning at three o'clock, an alarming fire broke out in the cotton manufactory, situate in Duke's-row, Commercial-road, the property of Mr. Oliver, grocer, Cricklewood-green. Great alarm was apprehended for the extensive premises and stabling of Mr. Chancellor, the Black Jok-master, which run at the back of the manufactory; the whole of the valuable stock of horses, carriages, coaches, and hearses were removed, the engines from the Royal Oak-yard, corner of Christopher-street, Hatton-garden, and the carriages, &c. from streets adjoining. There was a plentiful supply of water, and engines from all the stations were on the spot, and the fire was got under by four o'clock, being confined to the factory where it commenced.

Death by Drowning.—An inquest was held two inquests on the bodies of male persons found dead in the Regent's Canal, on Wednesday last. The first was held at the Duchess of York, Kingsland-road, and was on the body of John Smith, aged 35, a gardener, of Westland-street, Hackney-road, who was last seen alive on the night of the 12th ult., in Ballard-street, St. Luke's, and his body was found on Saturday last dead, and moving perpendicularly in the water at the above canal, near the Kingsland road. The second inquest was held at the George the Fourth, Bishop Bonner's-fields, Bethnal-green, on the body of a man, name unknown, aged about 40, and whose dress showed that he had been by trade a cooper. The body was found on Sunday morning last in the Regent's Canal, near Twig Folly. Verdicts in each case—"Found Dead."

Forged Bank-Notes.—On Friday last, an individual, who appeared to be a foreigner, entered the shop of M. Leyer, a money-changer, carrying on business at Panoramas, Paris, and asked him, in a very strong southern accent, to change a Bank of England £100 note. M. Leyer took it, and was preparing to count the amount in gold, when, having closely examined it, he perceived it to be forged. "Sir," exclaimed the changer, quitting his counter, "you shall only leave this on an order of the Commissary of Police." He then secured the person of the individual, and sent for the Commissary of the quarter, who acted on the basis. The prisoner gave in his name and address, and the commissary, having repaired to his domicile, found in it and seized all the materials necessary for the manufacture of forged bank-notes.

Dreadful Accident.—On Tuesday afternoon an accident occurred to a man, named George Taylor, in the employ of Messrs. Saunderson and Co., soapmanufacturers, Vauxhall-road. It appears that Taylor, whilst engaged in the process of soapmaking, had climbed over a large copper, which was filled with boiling liquor, to open a window for the purpose of letting out the steam, when he missed his footing, and his feet and legs became immersed in the liquid. The poor fellow was conveyed into the premises of his employer, and medical aid having been called in, his feet and legs to the knee-joint were found to be in a most dreadful state, the skin adhering to the stockings as they were being taken off. He is in a most deplorable state of suffering.

Accident on the Dover Railway.—On Wednesday morning a serious accident happened on the Dover Railway to one of the steam-ferry apparatus, named Stewart. He was proceeding, as usual, with the up-train from Dover, and, while passing under a station bridge near Maidstone, he rose, and his head came in contact with the top of the archway. The iron of the bridge was projected at the rate of above 20 miles an hour. His skull was fractured, and it is thought that it will not terminate fatally.

Dr. Wolff's Mission to Bokhara.—Captain Grover has received Dr. Wolff's journal up to the 19th of January, on which day he was to leave Tabriz for Teheran. He reached Tabriz on the 13th of January, without any accident, and in perfect health. The snow was frequently up to the horse's neck, and at night he was glad to find shelter in a stable. The Turkish consul-general, he was at Bokhara twelve months ago, and saw Samet Khan, in whose house Colonel Stoddart formerly lodged. Mr. Bonham and myself examined him, and at that time he knew him, though he was much changed. He was only Samet Khan, that when once a person is imprisoned in the Ark (Castle) one does not know whether they are dead or alive! All these reports are so far favourable, as they unanimously contradict the account of Saleh Mahomed, on which we have founded such great interest. Captain Grover has sent off the journal to Government at home.

The Albion, 90 guns, arrived at Lisbon from Cork on Monday, and will remain at this station. The steam-frigate Penelope sailed next day for the coast of Africa.

Death of a Gallant Sailor.—We have to record the death of another gallant officer of the Royal Navy, Captain Jeremiah Coghlan, C.B., which took place at Ryde, Isle of Wight, on the 4th inst., in the 67th year of his age. Capt. Coghlan was well known to the whole British Navy as one of its bravest members, whose gallant exploits will ever be held in remembrance with all brother officers.

Rescue.—March 9.—The Jenny, of Faversham, is supposed to have foundered on the 26th ult., off this port; crew supposed to be drowned. The Hopewell, from Sunderland to Dublin, was driven on the rocks near here this morning, and is now on the beach with loss of rudder; crew saved.

Gatehouse, March 9.—The Greyhound has foundered near the Isles of Fleet; crew saved. It is blowing a heavy gale at S. S. W.

Extensive Fire at Westminster.—On Thursday night, shortly before eleven o'clock, a fire broke out on the premises belonging to Mr. Hawkins, tradesman and grocer, situate No. 84, Stratton-ground, Westminster. The building was three stories high, and closely bounded on each side. Flames issuing through the sparture in the shop window caused the discovery to be made by some of the neighbours, who, after raising the necessary alarm, aroused the inmates of the contiguous premises. By the exertions of the engine-men the fire was confined to the house in which it commenced, but it was entirely consumed.

POSTSCRIPT.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Mr. George Edward Anson, and Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, presided on Thursday at a meeting of the Office of the Duchy of Cornwall, in Somerset House. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty in the afternoon at Buckingham Palace.

It has now been named as the ... on which his Royal Highness ... Albert will proceed to Portsmouth, and ... ark in the Black Eagle steam vessel, for the isle of ... as of the residence contemplated for her Majesty during the season for sea bathing.

The Duke of Wellington has issued cards for a grand dinner at Apsley House, on Wednesday, the 27th instant, to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the noble directors of the Ancient Concerts, his Grace being director for the evening. The noble and gallant Duke will entertain a select circle, as usual, at Strathfieldsaye, during the approaching Easter recess.

The Herald says "upon authority," that there is no foundation for the rumours that have been lately circulated of the intended retirement of the Lord Chancellor, and of the appointment of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland as his lordship's successor.

The late Duke of Sussex's Library.—By the will of the late Duke of Sussex it was directed that if the Government did not purchase his library within one year after his royal highness's decease, it was to be sold by public auction. The Duke of Buccleuch is now in treaty for the purchase of this rare collection of books, which consists of upwards of 45,000 volumes, the whole of which have been catalogued by Mr. Petigrew, the duke's librarian, and the list transmitted to his Majesty. We have not heard the value placed upon them by his royal highness's executor. Even at the low average of half a crown a volume they would realise a large sum.

The Earl of Devon departed on Thursday for Dublin, intending from thence to go to Dundalk, where the noble and learned earl, and the commissioners appointed to inquire into the tenure of land in that country, resume the active duties of the commission. From Dundalk they go to Newry, and subsequently to Armagh and Belfast, to prosecute their local investigations.

Oxford, March 14.—This day the following degrees were conferred:—Masters of Arts.—Rev. William Thomas, University; Rev. George Appleby Caxson, Magdalene Hall; Rev. Henry Wickers, Exeter; Rev. George Francis Turner, Trinity; Rev. Samuel Edward Maberley, Christ Church; Rev. John Griffiths, Christ Church; James Wickens, Christ Church. Bachelors of Arts.—Edward Stokes, Student of Christ Church; Edward William Newsome, Balliol. It has been determined to propose to Convocation that petitions be presented to both houses of Parliament, praying that the present sees of Bangor and St. Asaph may not be united, as provided for by the act of 6 and 7 William IV., chap. 77.

Mr. Murchison, as President of the Royal Geographical Society, gave his third soirée of the season, at his residence in Belgrave square, on Wednesday evening, which was attended by above 300 noblemen and gentlemen, besides a great many ladies of distinction. Among the interesting objects inviting attention was the prow of a Roman galley, the property of Sir Howard Douglas, fished up from the bottom of the sea near the promontory where the battle of Actium was fought.

Defeat of the Barnsley Junction Railway.—In the House of Commons committee on Thursday ... Barnsley Junction Railway Bill, was thrown out on the Standing Orders. This will be a severe blow to the Manchester and Sheffield Railway Company, the chairman of which had boasted that the Barnsley Junction would enable the Manchester and Sheffield Company to secure the traffic from the Manchester and Leeds Railway, and to make the Sheffield line the true Manchester and Leeds. Of course in proportion to the defeat on the part of the Manchester and Sheffield, is the triumph to the Manchester and Leeds. It is said that the Sheffield Company are not likely to be successful with their Chesterfield branch, in opposition to the North Midland.

On Thursday a deputation of watermen presented a petition to the Lord ..., praying his lordship to exercise his prerogative in securing to them the ... navigation of the arch on the north side of London-bridge, as well as free access to their landing-place at the foot of the flight of steps in front of Fishmonger's Hall. The Lord Mayor received the deputation with his usual courtesy, and kindly appointed Tuesday next to meet and view the premises complained of on their profession.

The Disputed Territory in America.—Fourteen non-commissioned officers of the R ... Sappers and Miners left Woolwich, on Thursday, for London, and proceeded by railway to Liverpool, where they are to embark on board the Resistance troop-ship, and sail immediately afterwards for Quebec. The object of sending this small party to America is for the purpose of assisting in the survey of the disputed territory in North America. The Government has provided them with plain clothing suitable to the climate and the labour upon which they will be employed. On their arrival the boundary surveying force will consist of several engineer officers, a Captain Sergeant, and twenty non-commissioned officers of the Royal Sappers and Miners, under the command of Lieut.-Col. Estcourt.

Visit of the Ojibeway Indians to the Thames Tunnel.—These interesting personages, yesterday, paid a visit to the Thames Tunnel, accompanied by Mr. Catlin, who acted as interpreter. On their first descent into the Tunnel no expression of surprise or admiration escaped them. On their ascending the Rotherhithe shaft, however, and looking upon the river, the nature and ... manifested their astonishment in strangely wild sounds ... The shield was then visited, but they appeared not to understand the purport of it. They returned through the Tunnel, at their own request, and were much more inquisitive about its construction than before. It was explained to them that, in 1814, a fair was held on the Thames ... On Monday, the 25th instant, the anniversary of the opening of the Tunnel, a grand Fancy Fair would be held under the river, when they signified their intention of being present. The arrangements have been directed by Mr. Gravatt.

Marlborough-street.—Yesterday Elizabeth Williams, a good-looking young woman, very respectably dressed, was charged with obtaining goods ... false pretences of various descriptions at the west-end of the town. It appeared that the prisoner, three years ago quitted the service of a lady of fortune, named Wombwell, residing at No. 17, George-street, Hanover-square, where she had lived for several months as upper housemaid. Nothing further was heard of her ... lately, when the discovery was made that for several months past she ... Wombell's name of different tradesmen in ... street, Bond-street, and the neighbourhood, to a very large amount. On Thursday evening she was accidentally met in the street by one of her victims, and given into custody. She was fully committed on two separate charges, viz., for obtaining an Mrs. Wombell's name, of Mr. Lancaster, of No. 179 Regent-street, hosier, three pair of stockings, of the value of 35s., and of Messrs. Lewin and Attenby, of Regent-street, silk-mercers, a quantity of velvet. She will be indicted on several other similar charges.

Melancholy and ... Information reached town this morning by a passenger on the Glen car of a ... anecholy and fatal accident having occurred on the river near Turbert yesterday, by which the captain of one of her Majesty's war steamers, and two of his men, met a watery grave. The report goes to say, that during the gale, which blew very hard, the pleasure-boat belonging to the Knight of Glin, with only one man on board, broke from its moorings; and, that the captain, seeing the man's life in danger, immediately put out a small boat with a heavy canvas to his rescue, accompanied by two of his men; that just as they neared the pleasure-boat in which the captain and his men were, when unhappily the three perished. Limerick Reporter of Tuesday.

Melancholy Loss of Life at the New Passage Ferry.—On Thursday night, between two and three o'clock, the New Passage ferry-boat left the Gloucestershire shore of the Severn, with one or more passengers, and a crew of four boatmen, named Whitchurch, master, Davis, Jones, and Watkins. When about half a mile across the boat was upset by a heavy squall from ... accompanied by a snow storm, and immediately foundered with all hands. The accident was observed by the custom-house officers on duty at the Old Passage Ferry, and a steam-boat was immediately despatched to the assistance of the crew and passengers; but on reaching the spot no trace of either crew or boat could be found. None of the bodies have yet been picked up, nor does it appear certain that the precise number of persons on board the boat at the time of the accident can be ascertained. The father of Whitchurch was lost at the Old Passage Ferry by a similar accident about five years ago, and it is greatly to be deplored that he now ... unprovided for. His perfect knowledge of this very ... him a most valuable public servant.

A Literary Servant.—George Maddox, who was convicted at York March Assizes, 1831, for the robbery of the Doncaster Betting-room, is living at a place called Austen's Ferry, eleven miles from Hobart-town, and is married to a native of that colony, worth £500 a year, having got it by marriage, when only two years in the country, for finding the mail bags. He runs his carriage and a pair of horses.

Marseilles, March 7.—The Gazette du Midi of this day has the following:—"We have received a consular report of Spain, by virtue of an order of the Emperor of Morocco, is but too true. This news, which we announced some days ago, upon the authority of a letter from Gibraltar, has been confirmed by the last journals received from Madrid. It is even asserted that a declaration of war will ensue, and that a division of 12,000 infantry and 2000 cavalry are to be sent to Africa, under the command of General Prim. Orders have been forwarded for the formation, at Valencia, of the Spanish brigades. FINE ARTS.—THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

A LADY IN WAITING, OF THE TIME OF LOUIS XV. PAINTED BY LANCE.

"A Lady in Waiting," time of Louis XV. G. Lance.—The design, drawing, and general finish of this picture are most admirable; but we could wish that the artist painted the cheek of his fair Hebe as well and as truly as he has

The rich rotundity of Bacchus' food.

His grapes, nevertheless, are sour grapes; for we cannot, with all our desire to eat them, be permitted to reach them; and it is but a sorry compliment to the principal object in the picture to say that, if we could, we would rather taste them than her "vermillion lips," although the motto which she seems to be exultingly exclaiming—

Auxerre est le boisson des Rois, might probably be sweeter from her lips than if uttered by anybody else. The face is too hardly, or flatly, coloured, but the outline and the expression are well drawn and portrayed; moreover, the costume is beautifully detailed. Altogether the connoisseur in modern art cannot fail to be pleased.

OSBORNE HOUSE, ISLE OF WIGHT.

In our paper of last week we announced that the above mansion, the seat of Lady Isabella Blachford, had been taken for her Majesty with an option to purchase the property if approved of. The Royal Household are expected to arrive at Osborne House in May; but considerable additions must be made to the building, to accommodate a very large establishment.

Osborne is beautifully situated in the neighbourhood of East Cowes, one of the best points in "the Island." The mansion is placed in a fine park, well stocked with noble timber, and adjoining eastward the grounds of Norris Castle, the residence of her present Majesty and the Duchess of Kent, in the summer of 1831. The views from Osborne are extensive, and of varied beauty, though certainly not equal to the prospect from Norris Castle, which latter commands the Southampton water, and the roadstead of Cowes; while Osborne takes a more easterly range, including Portsmouth, Spithead, &c., being shut out by the high grounds of Norris, from the views to the westward. Very little of the mansion is seen from the high road: but in sailing along the coast, the house appears to be a handsome square edifice, seated at the head of an ample lawn, which slopes gently to a valley open to the sea-beach. The whole park, strictly private, extends down to the sea, with good landing places. The mansion was in the occupation of Eustace Mann, Esq. during the civil wars between Charles I. and his Parliament. There is a copse adjoining called Money Copse, where the proprietor, it is said, during the wars, buried all his money, plate, &c., and upon searching for it again it could not be found; it is the general belief, from tradition, that the property still remains secreted. The mansion has on the ground floor a drawing-room, dining-room, and library, with two ante-rooms and halls. The first and second floors contain sixteen bed and dressing-rooms; very inadequate accommodation for a royal suite. When her Majesty, then Princess Victoria, and the Duchess of Kent occupied Norris Castle, Osborne and another house or two were taken for Sir John Conroy, and other branches of the establishment. Since that period the fields known as Snambles Farm, comprising about a hundred and sixty acres, now called East Cowes Park Estate, have been converted into beautiful rides, groves, &c., —and on the estate there are now ten new spacious villas nearly finished.

Osborne Park and wood, with gardens, &c., contain 346 acres, the whole of which is freehold. The farm adjoining is copyhold, and contains 424 acres.

OSBORNE, ISLE OF WIGHT, THE INTENDED RESIDENCE OF HER MAJESTY.

NEWSPAPER REPORTING.—Towards the conclusion of the O'Connell banquet a great number of copies of the Sun newspaper, containing nearly seven columns of the proceedings of the meeting, including the whole of the speech of Mr. O'Connell, which was reported and printed within twenty minutes of the close of its delivery, were distributed throughout the meeting gratuitously. The desire to obtain the papers was intense, and various sums of money were offered for them which were refused. In the course of his speech, on proposing the toast of "The Press," Mr. Hindley alluded to this unexampled instance of the rapidity of the press in conveying intelligence, and observed, that it might be taken as a specimen of what the press could accomplish when occasion called for unusual exertions.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH INDIA.—ADEN, February 4.—The Oriental Company's steamer Bentinck arrived here on the 29th ult., at midnight, having made the passage from Suez in only five days six and a half hours (1340 miles), the quickest ever yet done in the Red Sea. The East India Company's steamer Berenice (with the mails), which left Suez six hours before the Bentinck, did not arrive here until the 31st ult., at 10 P.M., having been seven days and eleven hours making the passage. The Victoria, East India Company's steamer, was in waiting to take on the mails to Bombay, and started with them and the passengers on the 1st inst., at 8 A.M. The Bentinck, however, although having to coal here, left this for Calcutta, &c., eight hours before the arrival of the Berenice, and eighteen hours before the mails per Victoria started.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.—At a meeting of the Corporation of London, for improving the approaches to London Bridge, held on Wednesday, the deputation appointed to confer with the Commissioners of Metropolitan Improvements, on the question of obtaining further space at the east end of the new Royal Exchange, made their report. The application was supported by a memorial from the merchants, bankers, brokers, and traders of the City. The memorial was signed by all the first names of the City. In opposition to further improvements in this quarter, Magdalen College appeared by their steward, Mr. Blagrove, and Mr. Sheriff Moon, their tenant. After having heard evidence from all these parties, the commissioner, it appeared, determined that a more extended space at the east end of the New Royal Exchange would greatly conduce to the effect of the building and the convenience of those who are to frequent it, but that, looking to the numerous and important claims upon any funds which might be provided by the Legislature for improvements in the metropolis, they could not feel justified in recommending to her Majesty or to Parliament that any advance of money from public sources or from local taxation should be made for this purpose. This determination appears to have produced but one feeling in the City, which is that of universal regret, that an opportunity has thus been lost which cannot occur again.

HEROIC CONDUCT OF LIEUTENANTS CATWELL AND VANSITTART, R.N.—On Wednesday, the 18th Dec. as the men of her Majesty's ship Agincourt were exercising aloft, one of them, unfortunately, lost his hold, and fell from the main-yard-arm, and striking against the rigging, bounded, with frightful force, from the spare-topsail-yard, and fell insensible into the sea. Lieutenant Catwell and Vansittart instantly dashed overboard after him; the former officer was, however, from his position, unable to make way against the tide and reach the sinking man; Mr. Vansittart was nearer to him, and with almost superhuman exertions (being burdened with the whole of his uniform), saved the poor fellow's life, supporting him a considerable time until a boat could be lowered.

THE PACKETS.—A statement has appeared in some West of England journals, that the packets are to be removed from Southampton to Plymouth. The place of rendezvous is named, and even the time of removal is stated to be in July next. We are enabled to say, in contradiction to the above, that, although the packets are not unalterably fixed at Southampton, they will not be removed to Plymouth this year, nor is it at all probable the question of their removal to Plymouth will be entertained until the railway from that place to Exeter is far advanced.

THE LATE SIR HENRY HALFORD, BART., M.D.

On Saturday last, this distinguished physician expired at his house in Curzon-street. The deceased baronet was the second son of Dr. James Vaughan, of Leicester, by Miss Smalley, second daughter of Alderman John Smalley, of that town, and maternal grand-daughter of Sir R. Halford, Bart., and cousin of the last baronet of that family. He was born on the 2d of October, 1766, and received his early education at Rugby School, and at Christchurch, Oxford. He afterwards studied medicine at Edinburgh, and commenced practice, in conjunction with his father, at Leicester. In 1792 or 1793, he settled in London, and rose with wonderfully rapid steps to the very first practice. After the death of Dr. Baillie, in 1823, he was left absolutely without a rival. In 1830 he was elected President of the College of Physicians, and remained in that office until his death, having been re-elected every year for nearly a quarter of a century.

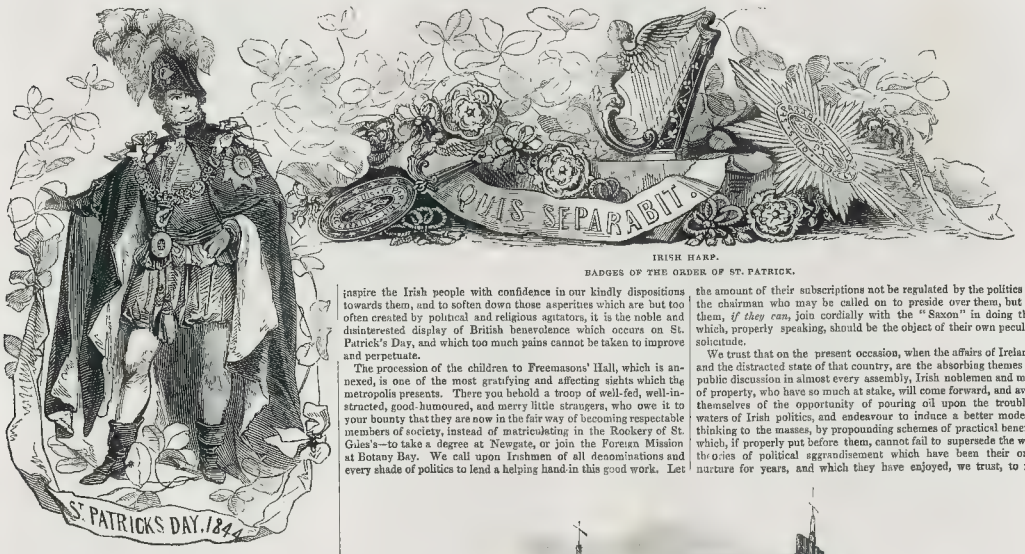
Sir Henry Halford was Physician to four successive Sovereigns, three of whom he attended in their last illnesses, as well as many other branches of the Royal Family, for he was held in the highest regard by every member of the family of George III. So great was his celebrity, that it occurred to him, in the course of his practice, to be consulted by several Sovereigns of other states, as well as by a great many foreigners of the very first distinction. At one period, he is said to have realised £30,000 per annum by his practice.

Sir Henry Halford married March 31, 1793, the Hon. Elizabeth Barbara St. John, second daughter of John, eleventh Lord St. John, who died June 17, 1823. On the death of Sir Charles Halford, Baronet, his cousin, he inherited the estates of that baronet, and assumed the name of Halford, in lieu of his patronymic Vaughan.

As a physician Sir Henry Halford was a favourite with all classes, and enjoyed in a remarkable degree the confidence of his patients. In consultation he was much regarded by his professional brethren on account of the quickness of his perception, the soundness of his judgement, and the readiness and abundance of his resources. In society he was prized, for to strong natural sagacity and good sense he added the charm of a highly classical taste, and considerable literary attainments. In temper and disposition he was remarkably sociable and kind-hearted.

Sir Henry Halford was the author of some literatures, or pamphlets, which display an intimate knowledge of the classics, and the learned spirit of research; such are Sir Henry's Harveian Oration; and papers on the Poisons of the Ancients, Deaths of Eminent Persons, &c. Several years since, too, Sir Henry published an account of the opening of the coffin of King Charles I., at Windsor, which excited considerable attention at the time.

ST. PATRICK'S DAY IN LONDON.



IRISH HARP.

BADGES OF THE ORDER OF ST. PATRICK.

KNIGHT OF ST. PATRICK.

We last year assisted in the celebration of St. Patrick's Day, by laying before our readers a full, true, and graphic account of the birth, parentage, and education of Ireland's illustrious saint, together with a series of engravings illustrative of the manner in which this rest occasion is observed at the Castle of Dublin on the morning of every 17th of March, as well as the more quiet and homely way in which it is taken into account, in the evening, by the sons of the shamrock resident in London, at the Freemasons' Tavern, in Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields. To-day we have prescribed for ourselves a similar duty, and here present a few sketches, which cannot fail to increase the interest which every honest Englishman takes in the welfare and prosperity of Ireland. Subjoined will be found a view of the Schools belonging to the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, in Stamford-street, in which upwards of 500 children, belonging to the poorer classes of Irish resident in the British metropolis, are clothed, educated, and maintained. This institution—which is certainly not the least important in its objects of the many temples of charity which do credit to London—is mainly indebted for its support to the appeal made on its behalf at the anniversary dinner of the Society, the sixty-first of which takes place this day, at Freemasons' Hall. The chair is taken, we observe, by that excellent and distinguished young nobleman, Lord Morpeth, who leaves the bed side of a sick father, now, happily, convalescent, to advocate the claims of a charity connected with a nation and a people whom he loves, and by whom in return he is almost idolized. Last year the office of chairman was filled by his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, being the first time he had ever appeared in public in that capacity, and his début was most successful. We observed, however, upon that occasion the list of those present did not contain the names of many persons connected by the strongest ties with the Sister Country—many who affect to take a deep interest in the welfare of Ireland—who are loud enough when occasion suits them on the subject of education—and whose example of liberality, if properly made, as on an occasion of this kind, could not possibly fail to have a beneficial effect on the funds of the institution. To our mind, if there be one thing better calculated than another to inspire the Irish people with confidence in our kindly dispositions towards them, and to soften down those asperities which are but too often created by political and religious agitators, it is the noble and disinterested display of British benevolence which occurs on St. Patrick's Day, and which too much pains cannot be taken to improve and perpetuate.

The procession of the children to Freemasons' Hall, which is annexed, is one of the most gratifying and affecting sights which the metropolis presents. There you behold a troop of well-fed, well-instructed, good-humoured, and merry little strangers, who owe it to your bounty that they are now in the fair way of becoming respectable members of society, instead of matriculating in the Rookery of St. Giles's—to take a degree at Newgate, or join the Foreign Mission at Botany Bay. We call upon Irishmen of all denominations and every shade of politics to lend a helping hand in this good work. Let the amount of their subscriptions not be regulated by the politics of the chairman who may be called on to preside over them, but let them, if they can, join cordially with the "Saxon" in doing that which, properly speaking, should be the object of their own peculiar solicitude.

We trust that on the present occasion, when the affairs of Ireland, and the distracted state of that country, are the absorbing themes of public discussion in almost every assembly, Irish noblemen and men of property, who have so much at stake, will come forward, and avail themselves of the opportunity of pouring oil upon the troubled waters of Irish politics, and endeavour to induce a better mode of thinking to the masses, by propounding schemes of practical benefit, which, if properly put before them, cannot fail to supersede the wild theories of political aggrandisement which have been their only nurture for years, and which they have enjoyed, we trust, to re-pletion. If Irish gentlemen in the upper walks of life would only consent to make a sacrifice of their political and party prejudices on the altar of their common country, we have that confidence in the people that if so encouraged and so countenanced they would begin to hesitate about the expediency of "Monster Meetings," of whatever kind, and seriously reflect on the value of the time which they had spent in political pursuits.

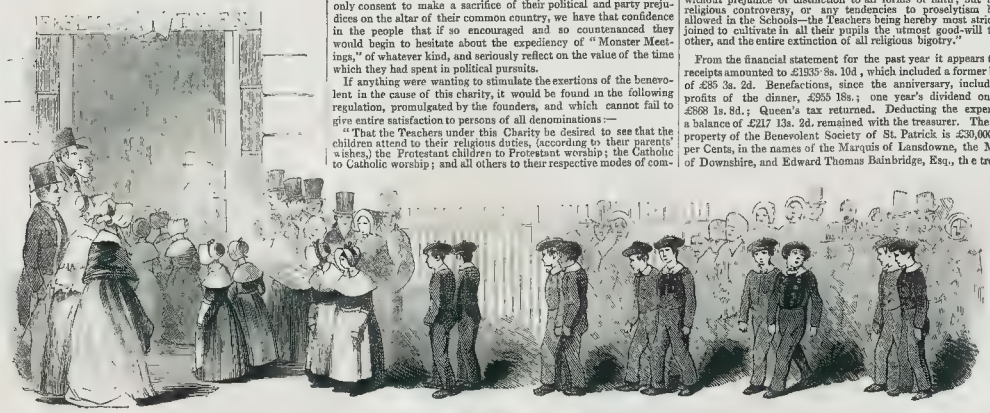
If anything were wanting to stimulate the exertions of the benevolent in the cause of this charity, it would be found in the following regulation, promulgated by the founders, and which cannot fail to give entire satisfaction to persons of all denominations:—

"That the Teachers under this Charity be desired to see that the children attend to their religious duties, (according to their parents' wishes,) the Protestant children to Protestant worship; the Catholic to Catholic worship; and all others to their respective modes of communion—the principles and protection of this Institution extending without prejudice or distinction to all forms of faith; but that no religious controversy, or any tendencies to proselytism be ever allowed in the Schools—the Teachers being hereby most strictly enjoined to cultivate in all their pupils the utmost good-will to each other, and the entire extinction of all religious bigotry."

From the financial statement for the past year it appears that the receipts amounted to £1935 8s. 10d, which included a former balance of £85 3s. 2d. Benefactions, since the anniversary, including the profits of the dinner, £955 18s.; one year's dividend on stock, £868 1s. 8d.; Queen's tax returned. Deducting the expenditure, a balance of £217 13s. 2d. remained with the treasurer. The funded property of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick is £30,000 Three per Cents, in the names of the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Downshire, and Edward Thomas Bainbridge, Esq., the treasurer.



PROCESSION OF THE ST PATRICK'S CHILDREN TO FREEMASONS' TAVERN.

NOVEL IMPOSITION.

The above cut-let is meant to represent a novel feast, not less ingenious than daring in its character, which was successfully played off at the residence of Mr James Whiskin, a county magistrate, No 10, Upper Bedford-place, Russell-square, on Wednesday last. A boy in the employ of Mr. Hewer, butcher, of Newgate-market, having in charge a prime haunch of forest venison for Mr. Whiskin's was followed by one of those numerous class of beings who "live by their wits," who witnessed the delivery of the tempting joint. The butcher's boy had scarcely turned upon his heel when the cook was again summoned to the door and the impostor, with breathless anxiety, declared he had been sent by Mr. Hewer to overtake the lad, as he had brought the wrong joint. The cook expressed her belief that it was very fine meat, upon which the man protested that Mr. Hewer would not offend Mr. Whiskin under any circumstances by supplying him with a joint of such second-rate quality. The cook then, unsuspectingly, inquired what the man had to take it back in, upon which the latter, with the most perfect nonchalance, replied, that in his haste to overtake the boy he had forgotten his tray, and that he would thank the cook to lend him a cloth which should be returned with the joint which had to follow. The cloth was supplied, and, it is needless to add, that neither man, cloth, nor mutton, has been heard of since.

LITERATURE.

THE PROHIBITED COMEDY.—RICHELIEU IN LOVE, OR THE YOUTH OF CHARLES I. An historical comedy, in five acts, as accepted at the Theatre Royal, Haymarket, and prohibited by authority of the Lord Chamberlain, with a Preface explanatory. Henry Colburn. Why this comedy was unlicensed by the Chamberlain will be pretty evident to any one who will dip into its pages,—passing, we may say, although it is not deficient in merit, but, on the contrary, abounds with passages of a quaint, idiomatic nature, which exhibit the writer to be an original and daring thinker. The besetting sin of it is, an indulgence in licentious freedom of language, and occasionally of situation too: they are wittily expressed and contrived; but the wit of this author, to use his own words, "is an unbroken colt, that runs away with his rider, and throws him off in a ditch or a quicksett hedge." There is great fidelity in the portraits of the reckless Buckingham and Prince Charles—indeed every one of the dramatis personæ is graphically drawn; and we have no hesitation in pronouncing the play to be a work of genius, although it is here and there disfigured by a tendency to coarseness. The explanatory preface is ably written —evincing consummate skill as a logician, a scholar, and one possessed of "mens conscia recti," at least, as poetically regards the creation of an original work. It is written in the same spirit of gall as that of Colman's to his "Iron Chest," but has a nobler object, and is withal more elegant, pointed, and classical. We hope this author, whose name at present stat in umbra, will not be disheartened by the Chamberlain's blight, but will speedily blossom forth again.

MUSIC.

CONCERTS OF ANCIENT MUSIC.

The first of the series of these concerts was given on Wednesday evening under the direction of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge. The following was the selection:—

PART I.

Dead March (Samson)	Handel.
Chorus, "Requiem Æternam" (Requiem)	Mozart.
Trio, "Benedictus" (from service in F)	Cherubini.
Motet and Chorus, "Ecce quemadmodo"	Hasbenli, 1570.
Recit., "My prayers are heard" (Deborah)	Handel.
Air, "Tears such as tender" (Deborah)	Handel.
Chorus, "Cum Sancto" (from service in E flat)	Graun.
Air, "Lord remember David" (Redemption)	Handel.
Recit., "Heed not these black illusions" (Jephthah)	Handel.
Air, "The smiling cave"	Handel.
Quartet, "Gaudent in cœlis"	Wallisser, 1610.
Recit., "Ma, che insolito" (La Resurrezione)	Handel.
Aria, "O voi dell' Erebo" (La Resurrezione)	Handel.
Air, "Let the bright Seraphim" (Samson)	Handel.
Chorus, "Hallelujah" (Messiah)	Handel.

PART II.

Overture (Occasional)	Handel
Recit., "Che Vedi" (Briseide)	Naumann.
Aria, "Ah! se perdo" (Briseide)	Naumann.
Chorus, "Be not afraid" (Die Kirn bei der Krippe)	Türck.
Terzetto, "Mi lasci, o madre"	Winter.
Selection from service in B flat, "Credo"	Hummel.
Quintetto, "Senso, o Dee"	Mozart.
Recit., "Divine Andate" (Bonduca)	Purcell.
Duet, "To arms" (Bonduca)	Purcell.
Glee, "When winds breathe soft"	Webb.
Chorus, "Worthy is the Lamb" (Messiah)	Handel.

There is still a lingering of affectation about this society which is anything but generally amiable. Not long ago they would have been horrified if by chance their printer used a C instead of a T in the middle of the word ancient, and now they would not use the word "mass" for the world, but, forsooth! it must be "service." Then, again, every work from which a selection was made was mentioned in the programme, with the exception of Winter's "Il Ratto di Proserpina" and Mozart's "Così fan tutte." This is being over nice. The performance was most admirable, but there was no great novelty raked up "from the dust of the schools." Handel was the prevailing dish of the treat; but as is a kind of perdrix that we will not object to have toujours. The compositions of Naumann, Hæhnell, and Türck possess no very startling beauties, and seemed weak efforts by the side of the Giant of Song. Of the singers we must speak with unqualified praise. Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, Messrs. Bennett, Phillipps, &c., sang most admirably. One of the sweetest morceaux of the evening was Winter's terzetto, "Mi lasci, o madre," which was charmingly sung by Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Hawes, and Mr Bennett.

His Grace the Duke of Wellington was present, and was saluted with "See the Conquering Hero comes."

NEW MUSIC.

SONGS OF THE VIRGINNY BANJOIST; a Collection of Celebrated Negro Melodies (?) Written and sung by D. D. Emmit. D'Almaine and Co., Soho-square.

There is considerable humour in the lithographed illustrations of this publication, particularly in the last one, which exhibits, what we suppose we must call "The Nigger's Study." The idea of placing busts of Shakspeare, Milton, Byron, &c., around the room, certainly not with "compressis labris," but in "ore rotundo" form, is rather amusing. Is the music of "The Old Spanish Gentleman" an original negro melody? Ah vrai, we have a sufficient number of bad English poets at home, without seeking succour from the far west to still more deteriorate our language. Mr. Rice and Mr. Emmit, and, in grease cause, may be very good sentidiseurs, but we cannot help deploring that such a work as the present, a collection of nonsensical, worthless rubbish, should have attracted the serious attention of one of our most respectable musical establishments. Our English slang songs, low as they are, often exhibit some flashes of wit; these things show "a plentiful lack of it." But—

"Indocta quid enim saperet, &c."

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

BRAHAM IN SCOTLAND. This first of all reading vocalists has just paid the Modern Athens a visit with his two sons, and has had a most enthusiastic reception from the Greeks, after an absence of fifteen years from their metropolis (we had nearly written Acropolis.)

MORE LECTURES AND ILLUSTRATIONS OF NATIONAL MUSIC.—Mr. Lover, the more than Da Vinci of his day, (for he is not only a good painter, but he writes the words of songs, composes or adapts music to them, or them to music, c'est egal, but moreover sings them with "due emphasis and discretion.") Mr. Lover, we repeat, lest our readers should forget our nominative, has announced a series of lectures on the Music, Poetry, and Traditions of his country, which cannot fail to be attractive in the highest degree. We need not say that Mr. L. is an Irishman, accomplished as a poet, painter, and musician, who can shun without sacrilege wear on every day as well as the 17th of March (St. Patrick's), a trefoil or shamrock in his hat with the motto "Tria juncta in uno." We wish him success in his undertaking.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

Keeley is now actively engaged in making preparations for the opening of the English Opera House. Applications have been made to many of the more successful dramatists, with a view to the production of original pieces, such as have not been exhibited at this theatre for some time past. Instead of the worn-out common places of the melo-dramatic school of writing, the new manager proposes to bring forward a succession of novelties, which will combine intellectual amusement and refined attractions. Mark Lemon, the successful author of the "Ladies' Club," and "Gwynneth Vaughan," is occupied in preparing a drama, which will be produced early in the season.

Mr. Hammond will take a benefit at the Strand Theatre on Monday next. On this occasion the performances will consist of the "Burlesque of Richard the Third" and other popular entertainments; in addition to which, the audience will have an opportunity of seeing the amusing follies of a "Night with Punch."

Madame Vestris and Charles Mathews are now performing at the Theatre Royal, Liverpool, in a selection of the more popular dramas produced during their engagement at the Haymarket. Mr. Webster, being the lessee of the two theatres, finds it convenient to dispose of his London company in such a manner as to admit of an occasional removal from the one house to the other; so that, after the audience have become almost tired of seeing the same performance for some two or three consecutive weeks, a change takes place which at once introduces new faces and new entertainments. Madame Vestris and Charles Mathews have been succeeded by Madame Celeste, Mrs Fitzwilliam, and Buckingham, who continue to play in a variety of pieces, which serve very well to make the theatre-going world forget that other "bright particular stars" have suddenly disappeared.

The new farce produced on Wednesday night, at the Princess's Theatre, is by Mr. Oxenford.

It appears that the engagement of Monsieur Duprez will extend to a very limited number of nights, but that the salary received by the singer is more than sufficient to remunerate him for the difficulty of qualifying he itself to perform before a London auditory. £100 per night is the sum awarded to Monsieur Duprez for his professional exertions! This is positively the last time they exhaust these things" so well, at a period when public excitement is kept alive by events which affect the condition of the nation, and not the interests of the stage! A French singer at one theatre, and a body of enthusiastic politicians at another! Scarcely, I can no longer be said, that the stage presents no variety or novelty in its allowed exhibitions.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Kean have been playing at Gloucester since the termination of their engagement at Drury-lane.

A new drama, by Mr. Bernard, author of "His Last Legs," &c., is in rehearsal at the Haymarket.

It is somewhat doubtful, we believe, whether Mr. Farren will be enabled to re-appear upon the stage during the present season. He is recovering rapidly, but his medical advisers seem to think that he will not, for some time to come, be in a condition to "study" the peculiarities of such characters as are usually assigned to him.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

A petition, presented by the Earl of RADNOR from the county of Somerset, praying for a more equable and equitable arrangement of the import duties, led to some discussion, in the course of which the noble earl maintained that the expenses of those parties who had gone from Taunton to the meeting at Bridgewater were paid.—Lord PEMBROKE denied that the opinions of that meeting could be considered as a fair criterion of the feelings of the people of Somerset respecting the corn laws.—The Duke of WELLINGTON was of opinion that it would be most injudicious to interfere with the present corn laws. The Duke of RICHMOND admitted that it was all fair to have petitions from any of the parties from Taunton to Bridgewater; but he thought it was not very liberal, after they had done their worst, not to pay some expenses back again. (A laugh.)

Lord BROUGHAM, in nominating the committee on Privy Council Bill, denied that he had any object in carving out a place for himself, and said that he had already given that offered an appointment of this nature. The report was slander, invented by malice, and her handmaid falsehood; both begotten by the father of lies upon the weakness of human nature.

In reply to a question from Lord Brougham, it was stated by Lord WHARNCLIFFE that the new Houses of Lords would be ready for the reception of their lordships at the commencement of the next session of Parliament, if the House of Commons would consent to go to the expense of temporary fittings. It would not be completed with permanent fittings for a period.

In reply to a question from Lord Lilford, the Bishop of PETERBOROUGH, in reference to the case of a clergyman in his diocese, whose conduct had occasioned great scandal, and who had been under the Church Discipline Act he was deprived of all power of interference, as the immorality of the party had taken place more than four years ago, and the act limited his jurisdiction to two years. He believed, however, that for a long time past the vicar, gentleman alluded to had not officiated, the duties being performed by a curate.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

In the House of Commons the report of the Committee on the Three per Cent Annuities Acts was brought up, and leave was given to bring in a bill founded on the resolutions.

On coming up the report of the Committee of Supply, Capt. BERNAL moved for a copy of any correspondence which might have taken place between the Secretary at War and the widow of the late Colonel Fawcett, relative to withholding her pension. The gallant officer appealed to the house that Mrs. Fawcett should not be made the first victim of the rigid application of a rule which had been very lately enforced against others.—Sir H. HARDINGE said that the near relationship of the parties left no alternative to the War Office, and in the whole of the circumstances there was nothing of a palliative character to justify the grant of a pension. He had, however, received the sanction of her Majesty to an amendment in the articles of War to the effect of subjecting all officers to the penalty of being cashiered who, being concerned with or privy to a duel, shall not take steps to stop the proceedings, or bring the parties to a dishonourable reconciliation. The amendment, however, was not to extend to officers on half-pay, for he could not consent to place a restraint on military men in private life to which other gentlemen were not subjected.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE contended that the rule should apply to officers on half-pay.—Sir C. NAPIER thought the law should extend to civilians as well as military men, and he would punish all alike for dueling. The best course would be to make a rule that all duellists in the articles of War to the effect of subjecting all officers to the penalty of being cashiered who, being concerned with or privy to a duel, shall not take steps to stop the proceedings, or bring the parties to a dishonourable reconciliation. priators, who would go on enclosing until they had taken every spot of green from the poor. (Hear, hear.) As it was there was already little enough ground left to the poor for the enjoyment of air and exercise. He thought that the bill should not be allowed to proceed until her Majesty's Ministers had ascertained how far enclosure acts, already passed, had tended to the popular benefit. He believed that the enclosures already made had not had the effect of providing increased labour for the poor, and he did not think that the bill before the house would prove more advantageous in this respect. (Hear, hear.)—Sir ROBERT PEEL: I agree with a great many of the observations of the hon. gentleman who spoke last, but, although I do so, I come to a very different conclusion from that to which he has come. I think that it is due to the gains which the noble lord, who introduced this bill, has taken upon the subject, that the details should be submitted to the consideration of a committee of the house, and I shall, therefore, vote for the second reading. (Cheers.) First let us consider that there may be certain descriptions of land, that it would be for the general benefit should be inclosed. There is a great deal of land where there is a common right of pasture, and much good may be, I think, effected by the inclosure of portions of such land when pasture and other means of cultivation are given by those for whom the inclosure is made. But as to commons in the immediate vicinity of towns, where alone the poor inhabitants have the means of enjoying open air and recreation, I for one shall always look with great jealousy at the provisions of any bill giving summary power to inclose such grounds. (Cheers.) I do not speak merely of very large towns, but towns supposing with a population of 3000 inhabitants. I say that upon spaces near such towns should be preserved for the free access of the poorer classes (Cheers.) I think it would be unwise, and too rigid an adherence to political economy, to enclose such grounds for the products of vegetable food, instead of leaving them open for the recreation and moral as well as physical improvement of the people. The gain would not counterbalance the disadvantage, and my opinion is that where those open spaces do not interfere with any plan of general improvement, they should be preserved for the free access of the poor, whose interests in the matter ought to be protected. Suppose a common near a town, on which all the inhabitants have a right of common, circumstances arise which induce the corporation of the town to think that it would be advantageous to inclose it, and thus deprive the inhabitants, generally, of the right [illegible] I say that a summary power should be given to the corporation to do so? The soil is in the corporation, but every inhabitant has the right of turning an animal in them for pasture, and is the corporation, by its power and influence, to deprive them of their right, and the poor of the benefit of free air? I do think that the house ought to be cautious not to deal lightly with this view of the case. We have our own feelings, and why should not the poor people have theirs? I think it is of some importance that the poor people should have the feeling that they are connected with the soil, if even only to the extent of turning a goose upon a common as a right. (Cheers.) It may be said that the poor can sell their right of commonage, and perhaps get a couple of pounds for it; but how can they sell the rights of their posterity? The house should recollect that any course they adopt now upon the subject must be irrevocable, and that towns will be increasing in population. I do not mean, at the same time, that no objection to those inclosures should have a universal application. There may, no doubt, be cases where it would be for the public benefit to inclose—for instance, where there may be a means then it would be an advantage to inclose it, and to open it for a full soil for the benefit of the neighbourhood. But every precaution should be taken to guard the rights of the poor inhabitants of towns to a free access to open air and recreation. (Hear, hear.) I think the powers of exchange given by this bill are too extensive. It is a wide power to give the right of exchanging 3000 acres for the same number in another county, and I hope the noble lord will devise some other means of attaining the object of his bill than by giving so large and summary a power.—Lord WORSLEY having shortly replied, the house divided, when the numbers were—

The bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed.

The Masters and Servants Bill went through committee, and the report ordered to be considered on Monday next.

The Teachers of Schools (Ireland) Bill went through committee, and the report ordered to be considered on Friday next.

The Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities Bill went through committee, and was ordered to be reported to-morrow.

Several motions for returns of printed papers were then made and discussed, although there were not more than eleven persons present. The principal speakers in these discussions were Lord Worsley, on the subject of Petty Sessions, and Mr. F. Scott, with regard to New South Wales. The former motion was withdrawn, and the latter acceded to. When the house shall adjourned, there were only four members present; and as the latter motion was not reported, it certainly appeared more like a farce than the proceedings of a real legislative assembly.

HOUSE OF LORDS. THURSDAY.

The House of Lords sat a few minutes for the presentation of petitions, but there being no business of importance before them, their lordships immediately adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Lord PALMERSTON deferred till that day fortnight his motion relative to the treaties between France and England on the subject of the right of search.

In answer to a question from Mr BAILEY COCHRANE, as to what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to Greece, Sir R. PEEL said the correspondence which he would lay before the house on the subject of Petty Sessions, and Mr. F. Scott, with regard to New South Wales. The former motion was withdrawn, and the latter acceded to. When the house shall adjourned, there were only four members present; and as the latter motion was not reported, it certainly appeared more like a farce than the proceedings of a real legislative assembly.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

Lord PALMERSTON deferred till that day fortnight his motion relative to the treaties between France and England on the subject of the right of search.

In answer to a question from MR BAILEY COCHRANE, as to what course the Government intended to pursue with regard to Greece, Sir R. PEEL said the correspondence which he would lay before the house on the subject of Petty Sessions principles which this country, acting in concert with the Government of France, had advised the National Assembly of Greece to pursue, in laying the foundation of the future constitution of Greece. Government and he thought the house and the honourable gentleman would admit that these instructions and that advice had been influenced by the purest motives, and the sincerest wish to establish in Greece a popular representative system. The two constitutional Governments combined, at the same time, with such institutions as should secure the existence of a limited monarchy. In about ten days he hoped to be able to lay the table of the house all those papers, and the correspondence which he should think it right to produce, and which he trusted would be found sufficient to satisfy the honourable member. (Cheers) -Lord PALMERSTON acquiesced in the discretion exercised by the right honourable baronet.

Mr. M. MILNES rose, according to notice, "to call the attention of the house to the present state of criminal jurisdiction over British subjects within the dominions of the Porte;" but, after some desultory discussion, during which Sir R. PEEL stated that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, the hon. gentleman withdrew his motion.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their lordships met at the usual hour.

The Earl of RIPON, in reply to Lord AUCKLAND, said he would be ready to lay upon their lordships' table all the necessary papers connected with the late operations in India.

Sir George Clerk and others from the Commons brought up the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities Bill, also the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. (1853) Bill, and the Consolidated Fund (£28,000,000. Bill, which were severally read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday next.

Their lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—FRIDAY.

The bills enumerated in our Lords' report were, on the motion of the CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, read a third time and passed.

A protracted conversation took place with regard to the exclusion of Roman Catholics from juries in Ireland, on a question put by MR. BELLEW, but the Government was not prepared with the particulars of the facts alluded to, and the matter stood over.

After some explanation from the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Gladstone) on the subject of railways, the house went into committee on the Factories Bill, and clause 1 was agreed to. On clause 2 being proposed, Lord ASHLEY brought forward an amendment, to limit the duration of labour to ten hours a day, and the discussion of this question occupied the remainder of the evening.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BRADFORD.—DREADFUL MILL ACCIDENT.—One of the most dreadful of the many accidents unfortunately occur in these districts happened on Saturday morning last. A few minutes past six o'clock the boiler of a steam-engine of 50 horse power was blown up or burst, and four human beings sent hence into eternity with but very little warning. The cry of "The boiler's burst," gave intelligence of the event, and numbers of woolcombers, whose habitations densely line the ground at the back of Mill-street, ran out to see. It was found that the boiler from which the power required for working a spinning mill, known as Mason's Mill, was derived, had burst; that one end of the building had been torn down by the violence of the explosion; and that several of the engine employed were either dead under the ruins, or lay dead outside. One of them—a boy, whose name is William, a piecer in the mill, twelve or fourteen years old was found dead about twenty yards from the furnace-landing, the force of the steam having carried him there. Another, named Wiman, younger brother of the first-named, was found some yards nearer the building, scalded, and with a leg broken. A third victim, a lad named Flanagan, was dreadfully scalded, and two others, both young lads, were also up similarly situated. The whole of one end of the mill is a complete ruin, from top to bottom, and a good deal of injury has been done to the machinery The boiler is completely torn from its bed, and one end forced out of the immander had flat open. The cause of the boiler bursting or blowing up is as yet a matter of speculation. Two rumours are current, each having something to justify it. The first is, that the boiler, or steam-pipes which connected the boiler with the reservoir, and supply the water, were out of order, or neglected by the engineer, and that the water had become exhausted, and the bottom of the boiler red hot, when a portion of the ground in adding it, and so generating a powerful gas known to scientific men, it overpowered the resistance of the plates, and blew up. In favour of this opinion is the fact that two service-pipes are much damaged, and the assertion is the case, and the other is not so apparently at present the most likely, is, that the power of the boiler was overtaxed. The number of hands employed in the mill was under a hundred, mostly boys and girls. There were only two in the place at the time; and the machinery had not been started.

BRIGHTON. THE PAVILION.—The following letter on Friday morning from Captain Pechell, one of the members of the borough:—"London, March 7, 1844. —Dear Sir,—My attention having been drawn to a paragraph in the Times newspaper, stating, 'that in consequence of a residence in the Isle of Wight having been engaged for her Majesty during her excursions in the royal yacht, a bill would be brought into Parliament to enable the Government to dispose of the Pavilion at Brighton,' I am happy to inform you that, having made the necessary inquiries, I am enabled to say there is no truth whatever in the statement as regards the royal residence in your town. I am, &c., S. R. PECHELL.—Mr. E. Bean, High Constable, &c."

MYSTERIOUS ASSAULT. On Wednesday night a man was apprehended, on suspicion of stealing a piece of carpet from Mr. Collins, St. James's street, and taken to the Chief Officer's room in the Town-hall. Mr. Solomon was conversing with two or three persons in the room when the prisoner, who did not understand to be Knight, stepped round to the fire place, took up the poker, and aimed a deadly blow at the Chief Officer, which alighted on his head, and felled him to the ground, inflicting a dreadful wound six inches in length. The wound bled profusely; medical aid was immediately called in; the wound was dressed, and the sufferer conveyed to his residence in a very precarious state. His murderous assailant was immediately secured and handcuffed. The fellow had just before asked for a knife, saying that he wanted to cut his own throat. The poker was bent by the force of the blow. We have since learned that Mr. Solomon, who has left a wife and seven children behind him, died at ten o'clock on Thursday morning. The prisoner has been fully committed to take his trial for the murder.

DERBYSHIRE.—MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE.—Ten days ago, a person of gentlemanly appearance and conversation stopped at a small public house at Calton, near Ashbourne, being unable to proceed further on his intended journey, from illness. He was without money in his pocket, unable or unwilling to give any satisfactory account of himself. He was visited by the clergyman of the parish, to whom he confessed that he had run away from home for a trivial offence, and he gave up the direction of his parents, in order that the clergyman might enquire after with his sorrow and desire to return home. His sickness increasing, of the fear of death prevailing, he declared, after a few days, to a lady who visited him, that his former story was false, and the application of a blister to the chest disclosed the fact that the pretended boy was a young woman. She positively refuses to give any account of the cause of her disguise, declaring that she will never disgrace her family by the discovery of their name. She is probably 19 years of age, hair rather inclined to auburn, complexion pale, teeth good, smiles till her short, lady-like in manners, and very familiar with the Scriptures. The above particulars were furnished by a clergyman resident in the neighbourhood; we have been supplied with some further particulars relative to the mysterious and melancholy occurrence. Though repeatedly urged to disclose her family, connections, or residence, she persisted in her refusal, several times declaring she would rather die than tell them. She, however, mentioned the names of Mrs. and Miss Fitzherbert, Lady Acland, and several others; and short y before her death, she said the mother was living, whom she would not have

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

On Tuesday evening, Lord Monteagle, in the House of Lords, moved for certain papers relating to the Roman Catholic College at Maynooth; which affords a fit opportunity for introducing to our readers the economy of this peculiar establishment.

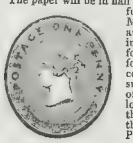
The Royal College of St. Patrick, Maynooth, in the county of Kildare, is one of the principal Roman Catholic educational establishments in Ireland, and was founded pursuant to an act of the Irish Parliament, in 1795. The object of the institution is to provide a home education for the Irish priesthood of the Roman Catholic Church, who were formerly compelled to resort to the Continental colleges. It was first opened for the reception of 50 students, in October, 1795. A lay college was shortly after attached, but this was discontinued in 1817. The building now accommodates about 500 students. Of this number 280 are free students, who are selected by the bishops of the several dioceses at yearly provincial examinations, and pay eight guineas at entrance, which is their only expense. The remainder are either pensioners, who pay twenty-one guineas per annum, and four guineas entrance; or half-pensioners, who pay only half the annual sum. The establishment is supported by these payments, by private bequests, and by a Parliamentary grant of £8928 per annum. The college is governed by a president, vice-president, dean, and procurator, or bursar. There are professors of the Sacred Scriptures, of Dogmatic Theology, of Moral Theology, of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, of Logic, of Belles Lettres, Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, English Elocution, and of the Irish and French languages. The students rise at half-past five o'clock, and retire to rest at half-past nine in the evening. The period of study is usually five years. The building consists of a plain centre, with extensive returning wings. There are fifty-four acres of land attached, which are laid out as a park for the recreation of the students

Lord Monteagle, on Tuesday evening, stated Mr. Pitt to have been the founder of Maynooth College, on the suggestion of Mr. Burke, and Lord Castlereagh one of its supporters. No public establishment has been more scrutinised in Parliament. The utmost sum voted is £23 per year, including commons, fuel, and candles. The building is incomplete, and the whole place is poverty-stricken. There are no apparatus nor philosophical instruments for scientific instruction; neither is there an adequate library, or a proper supply of books for the scholars; and last year, such was the distress of the institution, that the vacation was, of necessity, prolonged five continuous months, because it had not the means of supporting the students during that period. To these pressing circumstances Lord Monteagle having called the attention of Parliament, and the Duke of Wellington having acquiesced in their emergency, an entire reform will, doubtless, be effected in the institution.

AQUATICS.—The ensuing season promises to be one of the best, for some years, from the arrangements that are in progress, particularly as relate to the Thames Regatta. The particulars of the proceedings as to the amount of prizes have not been as yet made known. Lord Castlereagh has been appointed president of the Committee of Management. The first meeting for the year of the St. George's Boat Club was held at Messrs. Searle's Rooms, Lambeth, last week. Several boats are at present being prepared for the season by Messrs. Searle.

STAMPED POSTAGE PAPER.

Government having determined to issue writing paper stamped, for the purpose of passing free through the Post-office, we have been enabled, from our own peculiar resources, to obtain a proof stamp, a correct representation of which is annexed.



The paper will be in half sheets, each of which will bear a beautifully embossed medallion portrait of her Majesty Queen Victoria, under whose auspices the penny postage was originally introduced. If the half sheet be intended for a small note or letter, when the paper is folded the stamp will fall on the right hand corner of the space usually allotted for the superscription. The paper thus made free of postage, may also be used as an envelope; in which case the stamp will fold into the centre of the space so appropriated. To this arrangement the authorities of the Post-office have given their sanction.

To prevent forgery, two silken lines of different hues have been introduced. This is the invention of Mr. Dickenson.

A variety of opinions have been expressed with reference to the utility of the proposed postage paper. It will be enough for us to say that the plan has been announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer as merely experimental; and that it will, at least, add another facility for posting, which hitherto has not existed. So far, the proposition may be well received.

The half-sheets will be furnished to the public at the prices at which the envelopes are at present vended.

Some little additional delay will take place before the sheets can be generally sold. The causes of this are the following:—The necessity of increasing the present stock of envelopes at Somerset-house, so that the demand for them may not exceed the supply; the time which will necessarily be required to issue instructions to the several postmasters throughout the United Kingdom, for legalizing and regulating the sale; besides other minor matters of a character purely official. The issue of the paper, however, it is calculated, will take place in the course of the ensuing week.

MACHINE FOR THE REGISTRATION OF ARMS, IN IRELAND.

This machine for registering arms, according to the regulation of the "Arms Act," for Ireland, is now in active operation throughout the country. It is the invention of Mr. Grubb, an engraver to the Bank of Ireland, and is of simple principle; the operator has merely to pass a point over the number to be registered on the table, which is repeated on the barrel of the gun or pistol placed above by another point; a rotatory motion being obtained by means of a wheel and band beneath the table. When the arms to be registered are found to be too hard for this motion, acid is employed, and the object equally well effected. To mark or engrave each figure takes about 90 seconds, so that a large number of arms can be marked in an exceedingly short time. The sketch represents a policeman in the act of marking; and two gentlemen, who have just applied for a gun. The machines are kept in the police barracks, and are always worked by policemen.

NEW HOSPITAL FOR CONSUMPTION.

The intended new hospital, of which the engraving below represents the elevation, is about to be erected upon an eligible plot of ground, at Brompton, fronting the Fulham road. It will be a detached building, and, from its magnitude and architectural character, will add considerably to the embellishment of its locality. The style will be of the Tudor period. The exterior walls will be faced with red and blue bricks, in patterns, with Caen stone dressings. The plan of the building consists of a centre and two wings, in the form of the letter H. The wings extend equally before and behind the centre building, and will be appropriated exclusively to the in-patients' wards and offices; one wing being appropriated for the male, and the other for female patients. The centre of the building will be for the business and domestic branches of the establishment.

At the extremity of the right wing will be a chapel, built in the decorated style of English church architecture, calculated to accommodate about 400 persons. This part of the undertaking will commend itself to the sympathy and support of the Christian public: it will not only provide church accommodation for the immediate neighbourhood, but also produce a permanent increase to the funds of the charity, by annual collections and sacramental offerings. The architect is Mr. Frederick Francis, of Oxford-street, and who was selected out of above thirty competitors.

The following is a brief history of the institution of the present hospital, and the origin of the intended new building.

In September, 1842, the present hospital, which is situated at Chelsea, was opened for the reception of that numerous class of patients who are the victims of pulmonary consumption. It was the first of the kind ever established. There is scarcely a disease of any severity, which does not find ready admission into the wards of the numerous hospitals and other asylums of refuge with which the metropolis abounds; but consumption, the most frequent and destructive malady in existence, finds all those establishments closed against it. The plea on which this vast number of persons, so affected, are refused admission, is the lingering and almost certain fatality of the disease.

The following statement will show the magnitude of the evil which this institution is formed to remedy. Of the 60,000 deaths which occur every year in England and Wales from slow and lingering diseases, about 36,000 are traceable to pulmonary consumption. One-ninth, therefore, of the total mortality at all ages, and more than one-fifth of the mortality of adults is due to this cause; and as the duration of the disease, taking one case with another, is about two years, it follows that about 72,000 persons are constantly suffering from consumption, being at the rate of 4 persons in every 1000, of all ages; and 8 in every 1000 adults. Again, of the 45,000 deaths occurring every year in the metropolis, about 5,600, or one-eighth of the total mortality of the metropolis at all ages, and little less than one-fifth of the mortality of adults arises from this fatal disease, and upwards of 11,000 persons—being about 1 in 170 of the entire population of the metropolis, and more than 1 per cent. of the adults are constantly wasting away, under the attacks of this lingering malady.

Of these, about three-fourths occur in males, of whom a large proportion are working-men unable to provide for themselves and families—systematically excluded from our general hospitals, and uniting in their own persons every conceivable claim to sympathy and assistance. It may be well to add that many, very many, of these poor sufferers are the acknowledged victims of unventilated workshops—ill constructed dwellings—vitiated atmosphere—long hours of work, and the want of open places for exercise and recreation.

Since the opening of the existing hospital, up to the present month, 115 patients have been received within its wards, and relief and medicine afforded to near 1500 out-patients. But in consequence of the limited size of the building, it has been found totally inadequate to the reception of the many distressing and urgent applications for admission. The Committee have appealed to the public for assistance to enable them to build a new hospital, capable of receiving a much greater number of patients; and there can be no doubt when the claims of this important charity, and its appeal for assistance be more generally known, that it will meet with a ready response.

The new hospital when completed will present such a combination for the most esteemed methods of treating consumption, as no other institution possesses. The warming and ventilation will be on the most approved principles, with special reference to the application of temperature of various degrees, so as to approximate with that of different climates, and with means for the impregnation of the atmosphere of particular apartments with various gases, vapours, &c.

The first stone of the new building will be laid, by a distinguished personage, in the ensuing month of June.

The hospital is under the patronage of our benevolent Queen, who is an annual subscriber of £10.

It also ranks amongst its Vice-Presidents a long array of the nobility and eminent characters.

SCENE FROM THE NEW BALLET OF "LA ESMERALDA," AT HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

At length Mr. Lumley has commenced his campaign for the season of '44, with, as far as his liberality and zeal are concerned, the same spirit which characterised the opening of last season. The opera chosen for the occasion was the same that was presented on the first night of the opera, '43, Donizetti's "Adelia," of which production, and its present treatment, we can say little more than that a new singer (Corelli), sustained the part (Oliviero) performed by Conti last year. His voice is melodious and cultivated, and his style is chaste, and so far effective as to procure him an encore in the aria "Me Batti il Cor." Persiani, if possible, was more delightful than ever, and Lablache, jun., gave evidence of vast and rapid improvement in the part of Arnold. At the termination of the opera, the National Anthem was sung with more effect than generally characterises its performance at this house. The ballet which followed (founded on a subject dramatised from the Surrey to Sadler's Wells), namely, Victor Hugo's "Notre Dame de Paris," was excellently got up; Carlotta Grisi being the representative of La Esmeralda, the beautiful Bohemian. The monstrosities of this affair are, in a great measure, got rid of by the address of the ballet master, or composer of the ballet, M. Perrot. It is now the custom to call each scene at the opera a tableau, well, be it so; and there are five of them in this ballet, which are very beautiful. The first is a romantic view of old Paris, rendered still more picturesque by the occupants of the stage, a strange gipsy band, whilst

Junctaque Nymphis Gratiæ decentes
Alterno terram quatiunt pede,

at the head of whom

Cytherea choros ducit Venus, or, in other words, charming Carlotta Grisi.

The second tableau, "La Nuit des Noces," represents the retired chamber of Esmeralda. The third tableau consists of a splendid garden scene, decorated for the celebration of the nuptials of Phœbus with Fleur-de-lys—(by the way, what extraordinary nomenclature!) the fourth, the interior of an auberge, nothing particular; and the fifth a moonlight scene in the Greves' happiest style, a beautiful night piece on the banks of the much-neglected Seine, which can boast of as delicious scenery along its meandering course as the more illustrated and celebrated Rhine. In this scene poetical justice is rendered to all parties, and the ballet concludes with general festivity. Carlotta Grisi fully realised the prophecies we made about her last year, when she appeared at Drury-lane; and of the new debutante, Mademoiselle Frasi, we can only say that she is very beautiful, very graceful, possessing in a great degree Cerito's agility, and likely, or more than that, sure to be a great favourite with the opera goers. The music by Pugni, the composer of that of "Ondine," which was so successful last season, is throughout gracieuse et dansante. The ensemble was brilliant in the extreme, and was rewarded by universal approbation. The Italian Opera is a persevering root, "an obstinate root," as old Evelyn would say, and wherever it does strike, becomes, as it were, indigenous to the soil. It has never been more flourishing than of late under the culture of Mr. Lumley, and we trust that he will long continue in his management, to produce natives or exotics, we don't care which, who can

"So charm the senses of both eye and ear."

Our illustration represents the fifth tableau, or last scene, in which the Esmeralda is conducted to prison, followed by Gringoire, who attempts to excite the populace in her defence, when the procession of Le Roi des Fous appears, Quasimodo being borne upon the shoulders of the Truands. Esmeralda is led forth to execution, but the sentence is delayed by the timely interposition of Phœbus, who declares her innocence. The affectionate manner in which his declaration of love is received excites his jealous rival Frollo's passion, who, in a fit of frenzy, rushes on Esmeralda to stab her. Luckily for her Quasimodo arrests his arm, seizes the dagger, and plunges it in the heart of the would-be assassin. Thus concludes what we can say truly is a most effective ballet.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

We have already mentioned the general splendid effect produced by M. Duprez in Rossini's "Guillaume Tell;" let him not now be offended if we say that he must fairly divide applause with Miss Romer, who, in "all her born days" as the expectants of the 17th of this month would say, never sang so well. Her performance of the romance, "Wild, rocky desert," was most exquisite; but the duet which followed was a thing

Of which we oft may dream, but seldom find.

Duprez' singing in this duet is about the most perfect bit of cantabile that we ever heard, and Miss Romer acquitted herself with a praiseworthy and rivalling power of exertion, not only physical but mental, which, as an English soprano, stood its ground against "the most eminent tenor in Europe."

English Opera House.—This let-able house, we understand, has been taken by three parties, over whose interests the charming Mrs. Keeley is to preside as tutelary goddess or manageress. It has been an unlucky thing hitherto to have had anything to do with this establishment, but we hope matters will change and give prospect of a brighter future.

Mr. Beuler.—This gentleman's annual concert took place last Monday evening at the Crown and Anchor, when a most numerous and highly respectable audience were kept in constant good humour by the drolleries of the host, and the excellent fare he provided for their entertainment. There was some very excellent vocal music, and the imitations of popular actors by W. Leman Rede were applauded to the echo.

CHAPTER II.

OH, that man could catch a ray from heaven when the light of mercy is shed abroad upon the earth! That he could learn to be just in his dealings, as well as magnificent in his sentiments. That he would seek to do his private duty ere he enrols his name upon the printed and widely-diffused lists of published benevolence. Doubtless, it is glorious to be enabled to point out to the astonished foreigner the goodly palaces in which public beneficence houses itself in England; and God forbid that their number should be lessened by a single unit!—but, alas! it would be a far less pleasant task to point his attention to the damp and reeking cellars, and to the windowless and squalid garrets, in which proud and uncomplaining poverty sits apart, toiling from the break of day until its close—toiling until the eye grows dim, and the pulse fails, and the heart shudders when it should beat, to earn, after all those hours of labour, and fasting, and watchfulness, and fever—for nothing fevers the starving-like over-toil—a few poor copper coins, enough to secure grudgingly another day of existence; (we will not call it life!) another loaf of bread and draught of water; and another night of straw, and hideous dreams, and day-break re-awakening to misery and famine.

No, no; we lead the stranger from hospital to asylum, and from asylum to hospital, we show him the wondrous inventions by which we teach the dumb to speak, the blind to labour, and the vicious to repent; we throw open to him the doors of our prisons, and we greedily drink in his praises of our national philanthropy, as he traverses the well-ventilated passages, and looks into the well-aired cells, with their wholesome beds, and their hot-water pipes, securing at once health and cleanliness; we guide him through the vestibules and galleries of our lunatic establishments, thronged by the maniac and the idiot; and we point with unsullied exultation to their unshackled limbs, and innocent (and often even useful) avocations—and we have every right to do this; for each and all of these are the glorious and appropriate monuments of a purer faith and a great nation: we could not dispense with one of them, and still be just to ourselves; but who would volunteer to play the Cicerone to the same curious observer through the vice-haunted and famine-tainted lanes and alleys of our leviathan capital? Alas! there indeed would he find food for marvel—there indeed would he learn that even in civilised England, when the moral principle is once extinguished, the honest pauper who had turned from famine to crime, may laugh himself to scorn for his first dread of sin, amid the comparative luxuries with which sentiment has tempered justice! The overworked artisan and the heart-broken needlewoman die of starvation on their straw; and the hard mercy of the parish from which they had shrunk with honest pride even to their last breath, provides them with a contract-coffin at the outlay of a shilling; and they are flung, unpitied, into a pauper-grave. The felon is feasted and flattered into a mock repentance; the ladies of the land exhort and expostulate, and weep and pray about him; they administer alike to his palate and to his conscience; they are convulsed with grief when the law claims its victim; and their hair been cases where the flowers which had decked his cell, have adorned him for the gallows!

A strange perversion of human feeling this, and one at which we should be inclined to smile, did not the tears of honest shame rise to rebuke the untimely and indecent mirth!

But we have been asked to write a tale, not to compose a moral essay: return we then to our subject.

We resume it in a garret. There is but one window in the dreary den, for such it may in truth be called; two of the panes have been replaced by paper in the narrow casement, which is situated midway of the sloping roof, which forms one side of the wall; and even the very paper looks old and weather worn, as though it had served its purpose through many changes of weather. The furniture consists of a worm-eaten and crazy wooden bedstead, without hangings, but rendered somewhat more decent by a woman's faded shawl stretched across between the bolster and the light; a straw mattress, covered with a coarse but clean canvass; the aforementioned bolster, a scanty blanket, and a worsted rug, composing all its equipment; whilst at the opposite corner of the floor a second mattress, similar in fashion and material, but less inviting both in texture and in colour, and less conveniently arranged, shows that the room is appropriated to a second tenant. A small deal table, a rush-bottomed chair, a wooden stool, and an empty trunk supporting some mean appliances for cleanliness, are the other objects which divert the eye from the occupants of the squalid chamber; and should the fastidious owner of a comfortable home turn with a disgusted shudder from our description, and accuse us of exaggeration in the sketch which we have made, we will only bid him go forth into the haunts of struggling and silent poverty—raise the latch of toiling penury, too proud to extend the hand of pauper supplication, and then judge us on his return.

The dwellers in this miserable home—if we may so profane a holy term which finds an echo in every honest heart—had originally occupied the best floor of the house in which they were still located. Sooth to say they had been poorly lodged even then, but the place afforded no better accommodation; and so long as they remained in their first apartments they had commanded a certain semblance of respect from the hard-handed and heart-seared mistress of the tenement. A sore and bitter struggle, multiplied sacrifices, and a wild and half-maddened energy, which hoped even when hope was over, had, for a time at least, enabled them to retain their original lodging; but the day came when not only the few remaining objects of ornament, but even some of the necessary articles of apparel possessed by the wretched partners in misfortune, had been disposed of at one-half their value—for the needy have neither the time nor the authority to compel honest restitution—and they found themselves unable longer to indulge in the luxury of even a semblance of comfort.

To one of them this was a bitter and a killing truth; and when it glared out upon her in all its naked hideousness, she clasped her wasted hands over her sunken eyes, and in the first paroxysm of its torture, in which she prayed that she might [illegible] but the impious cry expired on her lips, for, as its utterance, [illegible] companion—upon him whose very existence depended upon her strength, and which old woman, even the most delicately nurtured and the most tenderly entreated, ever fail before so holy an incentive?

Enough. Their tale of desolation was told to the callous guardian of the house; and for a while she threatened to put them forth, lest she should be a loser through their misery—but, even hardened as she was to suffering, she could not finally withstand the agonised entreaties of the young and still beautiful creature, who reminded her that she could work; and who promised her that she would toil unremittingly, rather than t..t she should have reason to repent what—helpless worm as she was! she called her charity! The prayer prevailed at length, as we have said, and Alme Freeling and her fa.. of father took possession of the squalid garret, in which we s..ll spend one more to present them to our readers.

In the centre of the floor was placed the wooden table, and beside it the ordinary chair sat the broken and mindless merchant, turning over with strange and consequential gravity some fragments of a tattered newspaper; occasionally he would burst into a peal of unmeaning laugh.., and then glancing towards the gloomy window, close beside which his pale and wasted daughter sat rapidly plying her needle upon some coarse garments, would suddenly and abruptly check his ceaseless mirth, as though he cared not that she should hear its outbreak. Then, as a new fancy rose before him, he would spostrophise the shreds of paper and criticise them, as though they were works of art brought for his inspection; but this partial exercise of reason was ever transient; and although Alme never for a moment discontinued her employment when she heard him so engaged, still she listened eagerly, for a wild vague hope would grow up within her, which, while as she at other times felt it to be, she cared not to discourage, for it helped her to live and to struggle on. It was only when the unhappy man rejected all his usual amusements, and sat with his head buried on his hands, wailing and weeping like a child, that she abandoned her labour, and hung over him in tender and filial solitude, whispering comfort and consolation, and encouragement; and although he could not either understand or appreciate her devotion, still he was soothed and calmed by her caresses, and the soft accents of her familiar voice; and she dared not deem the time wasted which had been so employed; all she could do when, as was his custom after these paroxysms of mindless anguish, he had sobbed himself to sleep, was hurriedly to wipe away her own tears, and to redouble her efforts to expedite the work upon which she was engaged.

And what was that work?

Listen, ye daughters of luxury, and weep in your turn. She was making shirts of coarse hard texture for a third-rate clothing warehouse; and for..ls rude and exhausting labour she was paid three halfpence each; and even that grudgingly and reluctantly, with hints on the quality, and the tardiness with which her services might not long be needed.

"But why did she not," carps, perhaps, some stony-hearted cavilier, "turn to account the brilliant accomplishments which were b.azoned forth when she was introduced to the admiration of the reader?" Aye, truly, why did she not? Simply because she was proud and virtuous, and that when she would have made them subservient to her own and her father's necessities, her app..nsions were met by cool refusals, or, worse still, by insulting propositions. The world is a selfish and a narrow-hearted world. It can..ot, or will not, see deeply, mercifully, but it fails not to exact its quid pro quo, and that too an ample one. Alme could have been pillowed on down, and lapped in luxury, but she was mute to understand the price of these concessions. She could not for a moment entertain a base comfort for her father, and this was her only struggle; but here his very affliction proved her happiness, for she instantly reflected that he would be unconscious of the change; and that to him the charm of all life's enjoyments was lost for ever. Thus she did not hesitate for a moment as to her onward path, but boldly faced the misery and the toil, when alone could pilot her upon her upright way.

Four Alms! Here was indeed a bitter destiny. Her memories were all of tenderness and luxury; of a costly home, and gentle ten..ency, and all the graceful courtesies of elegant existence. She looked around her now; and no marvel that her eye shrank, and her heart sickened at the contrast. But worse than all, other privati..ns was that of sympathy, and compassionate p. and encouragement. Her father was beside her sti.l, it is true; that father whose words had once been words of wisdom; whose firm will had been a stalwart support to the needy, and whose love had made an atmosphere of joy about her. And what was he now? Alas, weak and soulless as a pulling child; without one thought, one feeling, or one sentiment in common with herself, save that once more he looked for bread for food, and then wept, half in pettishness and half in suffering, when she had none to give him.

What avails it to record that Alme was still beautiful, even in the midst of these exciting trials? Her slight form had indeed become still slighter, and its graceulness was somewhat marred by her stoop, which she had acquired from the bending position to which she was compelled for so many hours; but then her cheek, but the beautiful character of her haughty and noble features could not be defaced even by the grinding pangs of starvation; and although the perfect outline of her nose, and the fine contour of her cheek, had become sharp and pinched, and her large, dark eyes, more deeply sunk into her head, nothing could destroy their original and classic loveliness; while the bosom that flushed and faded in opulence and upon that wasted cheek, as the pulses of her heart beat quickly or occasionally, flushed from those dark and sunken eyes, gave a grandeur to the beauty that was so soon to disappear for ever as the stately ruin derives a new and wild ray majesty from the vivid splendour of the lightning flash that precedes the peal by which it is to be prostrated on the Just.

Calm, and pale and motionless—save that the regular and monotonous movement of the hand that plied the needle never ceased for a second—did Alme Freeling up on her low stool be eath the wretched window which admitted the light scantily and grudgingly, as though this free gift of Heaven to rich and poor, had learnt from the haughty to withhold it from the needy. Poor Alme! that even in its enjoyment was too much to be extended freely to poverty and harship. Her failing eyelids had disappeared for the impaired her vision, and it..fered with her occupation; and the long dark lash that shaded them from her pale forehead, upon which the clammy drops wrung out by over toil and pain, had almost ceased at intervals—so heavy the weight—to be raised.

And thus she laboured on; her long bony fingers trembling from the eagerness with which she wrought—her large eyes glaring on the scrid Linen—her bread, coming thick and fast, as it exhausted the nerves, shedding over the work drops, her whole energies, centred for the time on the vile garment upon which she worked. Sometimes she tried to pray as she toiled—how often had she exhorted the poor and the oppressed to pray for support and consolation in her days of happiness and prosperity; and now, she strove to put into action the lessons that she had taught; but her thoughts wandered away from the objects of hope, and the pr..ses of faith, to the present and pressing cares by which she was and when she would have flung her whole spirit into the high and holy aspirations through which she held communion with her Creator, she found herself involuntarily calculating the remnant of time which remained for the completion of the allotted service.

It was only in the brief intervals of her repose—so nicely calculated as to convince her, after repeated and accurate computation, that the amount of work which she might be able to complete would not afford an equivalent for the candle which she must consume to produce it—that she ventured to pray for her father. His restora..n to reason she dared not ask, for she re..arded the fate by which it must awaken, as a sale flung from her the selfishness that would have induced the prayer. Her petitions were less tinged with egotism; she forgot herself when she prayed for him her affliction, her..ation from whom the power had been received of supplication for himself—and she beseeched only that strength she said be continued to her to preserve him from utter starvation; and that he might pass away from earth unconscious how he now was, and how miserable how low he had been reduced. Not even did she venture to ask that he might be spared to her, with ugh she felt that when he was gone she should no longer care to pay so high a price for the wretched privilege of existence. Such a prayer would be impious to stay his hunger, and to still his cries; and she lested they been this in the hands of Heaven!

And thus she toiled on, while week succeeded week, and month passed after month; and she had m..e than once to supplicate, even with tears, for a continued supply of the dreary labour that was, slowly, but surely, sapping her heart's blood; not an hour, not a moment was there left to afford herself. The very necessity of seeking and taking home her work, although it afforded her only opportunity of breathing the air of Heaven, ever grateful to her bluntid sensations—even shifted as it was by the dreary companions of the dreary prospect and mean quarter of the city through which she hurried, was a perpetual subject of regret for it encroached upon her time, and involved the necessity of yet closer and more unsparing application; and, oh! how often, even the total loathiness from the meal of bread with which she quieted her father for the night.

And the sordid wretch for whom she toiled, and who was growing fat and sleek upon the honest profits of her labour, he had ceased, rendered by the slave-owner of civilised England, who saw her tottering steps become more feeble day by day, and her struggling breath escape in gasps from between her parched and fa..ed lips, and who beat down to catch her trembling, rendered pitiful by the inhumanities by the jarring sounds of a discordant instrument, tortured into dissonance by the coarse hands of one of his over-dressed daughters—naked no questions as to her malady or its cause. He was accustomed to the symptoms; and she was the nearest workwoman in his employ, if a feeling of regret at her rapidly increasing decay ever entered his mind, it was that he should lose' his best hand when she was compelled to "give in" altogether; and so time after time he stamped down to her the peace that she had earned with ostentatious noise and parsimonious measure; and the dying girl gathered up from the counter thankfully and greedily, and flew rather than walked back to her miserable garret, and her still more miserable companion, with a fresh supply of work, and the poor meal which her past toil had purchased.

Her last decent dress began to fail; she had snatched a moment occasionally to repair it, but she saw that it could not much longer be made available, even for many like hers; and it was a grievous addition to the convulsion came upon her, she smiled—smiled for the first time for months; for she had long ceased to struggle at cheerfulness in her nearly intercourse with her father. She was unequal to the effort when she found that her only garment was in a state of perfect. Yet now she smiled as she murmured to herself, "It were vain to waste more time upon it; nothing can be done to preserve it longer; but it matters not. it will last out the week!"

As she soon escaped. Let she was ere she left him this sad but welcome exclamation of Let own fate, by a mod..eal of slaughter, and as she looked up she encountered the fixed gaze of her father, who amid his vacant mirth had nevertheless his eyes from her countenance, and were was ratio..g together two pieces of slate which he had gathered up from the drain, through the open window. Alme did not remark his occupation; she had become custom-stunned, and her long ceased to shrink from the wide derelict..straints of his hopeless imbecility; but she was in stantly recalled to a sense of her own responsibility; and burning he flushed face in her spread hands, and cowering down upon her low stool, she murmured out, "God forgive me for my selfish..joy!" and burst into a violent passion of tears.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

RACING PROSPECTS FOR 1844.

Longos quæ prospicit agros.
Fair Hope, the season, to the turtle yields—
Large stakes, rich handicaps, and sporting fields.

With Warwick Spring Meeting, which occurs on Wednesday next, the racing year may be said to commence. This affair only occupies one day, and, according to the calendar, will give us two races—a handicap, and the Trial Stakes. It won't bring out another Coronation, to all seeming; therefore we'll say no more than good luck to it. At the established days of sport the preparations are more liberal, generally, than they ever were before, while the amount of horse flesh in training affords assurance that the cavalry will keep place with the commissariat. The demonstrations consequent upon this promise show themselves in the way in which the events for early decision have been introduced into the market. These number four—namely, the Two Thousand Guinea Stakes, the Chester Cup, the Derby, and the Oaks. If our thesis did not confine this notice strictly to issues on the turf, what a goodly picture we might show of the prospects of all our national sports for the ensuing season—when the poor man's winter of discontent shall no longer chain him to the treadmill of his daily toil! Then, when the genial spring—the glad and glowing summer—shall call him forth to take his equal share with the sons and daughters of wealth of the boon banquet of nature, we would lead his steps towards the silver Thames' verdant sides, will be holden for his recreation; or to many a rural rendezvous, where the manly games of his country will be exhibited for his enjoyment. Haply he has never heard of Cleopatra—yet he would fain know how Queens take their pleasure on the waters. In a few brief months, one of those pleasure excursions, got up by the directors of the South Western Railway, would enable him to reach a scene a thousand times more gorgeous and befitting than ever wasted on her whose beauty turned the tide of battle at Actium. Then might he see Victoria, "the fair-haired daughter of the isles," surrounded by her chivalry, skim over the bright waves of the Solent as never sea was navigated since Cytherea yachted in her galley of pearl. Sons of Old England! envy thou not those whom fortune has set apart, and descend the safe-mines of Poland for a sensation. Pass a summer day where the daughter of Britannia holds revel on her native element—and be content. How thou must long for this—and many another pleasant fancy—thou shalt learn by reading, each returning Saturday, our prospects of its successors, National Sports and Pastimes. Now, to our present matter in hand.

The assumption of a race won't go to Warwick—he'll stay at home till the First Spring at Newmarket; there is nothing of account in the Craven Meeting. There is nothing talked about, save the Column. Well, the Two Thousand they only lay 7 to 4 that "Buck" will lose. The Ugly Buck is more fancied than many a well-favoured sample of his species; and if he don't make some of the sweet pay for their whistle there's never a blackguard in broad cloth! The Chester Cup, however, is sure to attract the patrons of the turf. Horse coursing is not confined to circles whose members are "all honourable men." But the really curious in rascality should see in apropos of the Chester Cup. On that event, not only are people "thrown over," as the polite term is, in the ring, but they're kicked into the mire, trampled under foot, and laughed to scorn on the race-ground. Who will ever forget its exhibition of last year—none but those from whose memory it shall be driven by its catastrophe in 1844. Let tue reader note the betting of the past week and the present. In the former, the Prior was eagerly backed as the leading favourite; in the latter he is no longer favoured in the odds; and anxious men ask where is he?—and echo answers, "in Bob Bresslime's stable." The Duke is dragging the Slave along with little is done upon it in the market—but there are lotteries and sweeps, and the Derby current—but it is every club in Great Britain, from the Carlton to the Cock and Hen in Vinegar-yard. The two favourites will still be seen by our quotations to hold their own; many are expected to "swim" during the month. Orl..ndo will improve, or go to the right-about in the Craven. When Scott's real horse will come into the odds, no one, not his owner, knows yet. We are of opinion that, with the racing season, sixpenny will be the Derby—and the Oaks will be "no go" for. The Oaks being always in the shade till the day before it comes off, is no matter for speculation, here or there. No doubt the great northern stable, with the Princess and the Bee, is in great force for it, but Lever probably knows the secret of the Ugly Buck. It is an event for which the field ought always to be backed so long as this, in anticipation: on the present occasion the rule holds quite as well as ever.

BETTING AT TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The business transacted this afternoon showed a slight improvement, but was still far from brisk; the termination of the qui tam proceedings, if followed up in the right spirit by the Select Committee now sitting in the House of Commons, will, no doubt, give an impetus to speculation that "the Corner," and give a healthful tone to their proceedings. Of the "doings" the..o, little need be said; the Chester Cup was almost a dead letter; Pagan, it is true, was quoted at an improved figure, and Appendage, under the active opposition of "Bill Scott" and a couple of Liverpoolians, fell into the back ground, but in all other respects the betting was languid and uninteresting. Not so the Derby, for which "Honest John" was backed from 10 to 9, receded a point, and appeared to be going "slick to the rear," but rallied, and finished at (taken of..) 7 to 1. Bastian, in the meantime, giving way he..a point. Several inquiries after Leander, Tramp, Grand Square, Ramsden, and Appendage, but no scoring was anything done; Orlando in statu quo, and sans backers. The King of the Gipsies, Sir Isaac, and Boots were the only outsiders in force. The Oaks was slightly touched on, but to no other result than to leave The Bee rather a worse favourite than Barricade.

THURSDAY.— Nine times out of ten the Thursday at Tattersall's, as compared with Monday, is tame and unproductive; much, however, was not the case on the day of which we have now to "report progress." An average share of business was transacted on the Chester Cup, but in no respect did the odds shew any material change. Pagan's improvement was effected on the strength of the Manchester advices; he was not backed. A great number of horses were in at force for the Derby; but in most cases at the averages reported on Monday. As most in demand we may select Rattan, Orlando, (with a very small party), King of the Gipsies, Sister to Grey Momus colt, and Akbar; Campanero and Ap..rentice were at a discount, and Sir Isaac, a regular "pot" a week ago, was sent in five minutes from 1000 to 1 (Op., is there such a horse in training.) The only Oaks bet we heard was 500 to 30 against Fanny Eden.

EVERY BODY'S COLUMN.

THE WEAVER.

Little they think, the giddy and the vain
Wandering at pleasure 'neath the shady trees,
While the light, glossy silk, or rustling grain,
Shines in the sun, or flutters in the breeze,
How the sick weaver plies the incessant loom,
Crossing in silence the reluctant thread,
Pent in the confines of one narrow room,
Where droops complainingly his cheerless head.
Ll..tle they think with what dull, sickless eye,
Nor by what nerveless, thin, and trembling hands
The devious mingling of those various dyes
Were wrought to answer Luxury's commands.
But the day cometh when the tired shall rest,—
Where weary Lazarus leans on Abraham's breast.

HON. MRS. NORTON.

THE MARE'S NEST DISCOVERED.

The Journal des Débats publishes a letter containing some interesting particulars relative to the island of Madagascar, from which it would appear that the reported occupation of Diego Saurez by the British must be false. "From this letter it is evident," adds the Débats, "that an establishment on the coast of Madagascar would be an act of madness—first, because no European can escape the fever of the country, and after a r..sidence of some months half the French troops in the island perish, and the remainder are unfit for service; second, because the native troops remain amongst the fortifications of the mountain, whence they can descend at their leisure with an army of from 20,000 to 30,000 men to attack the European troops debilitated with fever."

AMERICAN CANDOUR.

I was amused by an idea given me by an American in office. I asked how much his situation was worth; it was nominally four hundred dollars, besides stealings. This was frank and honest; in England the word would have softened down into perquisites. I afterwards found that it was a common expression in the States to say a place was worth so much besides cheatage.—MARRIAT.

A GOOD CUSTOM.

It is the custom in Turkey to blacken over the front of the house of a well-known liar.

TRUE RELIGION.

A pure and true religion has nothing to fear from the greatest expansion which the understanding can receive by the exercise of the faculties of mind. The more widely science is diffused, the better will the author of all things be known, and the less will the people be "tossed to and fro by the sleight of men and the cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive."—LORD BROUGHAM.

THE CLAIMS OF THE POOR.

"The poor have a claim founded on the law of nature, which may be thus explained:—All things were originally common; no one being able to produce a charter from Heaven, had any better title to a particular possession than his neighbour. There are reasons for mankind agreeing upon a separation of the common fund; God, for these reasons, is presumed to have ratified it. But this separation was made and consented to, upon the explanation and condition that every one should have left a sufficiency for his subsistence, or the means of procuring it." Therefore, when the partition of property is rigidly maintained against the claims of indigence and distress, it is maintained in opposition to the intention of those who made it, and of His who at the supreme proprietor of everything.—DR. PALEY.

WOMAN'S PRAYER.

She bowed her head before the throne	And priest and peer their vows preferr'd,
Of Heav'n's eternal King,	With quick and courtly care;
The sun upon her forehead shone,	But where on High was woman heard?
Like some communing thing	Lone woman's trembling prayer.
In newly-wed and in love she stood,
Pale, lonely in her care;	Wild war was raging madly rose
But gone and among a world estranged,	The din-cries of the realm,
In faithfulness and prayer.	And thousands met their country's foes,
	With spear and crested helm.
The p..r of her father's hand	And thousands fell, and wrathful scars
Had left their father's path,	Rag'd in their mad despair.
And sad had one of his threat'ning hand	What heard the God of Battles then?
Against them in his wrath.	Meek woman's sacred prayer.
He who sees with their new-fire few
Who sh.. were for his there;	Oh, strong is woman in the power
Who sh.. were for his there.	Of love, pure and unwith,
And woman's voice was low, and bowing dow,	And rich in her heart's sacred dower
To woman's voice of prayer.	Of strong confiding truth.
	But who may tell her spirit's might,
The king sat in his purple state,	Above what strength may dare.
Apart, dominion rod;	When in life's wrestling, and its might,
And there was darkness in his fate,	Her voice is bowed in prayer?
His dark ning heart was prob'd,

MRS. HEMANS.

THE KING OF SWEDEN.

A-propos de tatouage, it is affirmed that the King of Sweden's physicians were greatly astonished the other day, on bleeding his Majesty, to find the words "Liberté et Egalité" on the "bras de Mort" (the fleshy part below the elbow). They could not recover from their amazement. Charles John has been so long a king, that it is forgotten that he began by being a mere hero, and he is so good a king that one cannot possibly suppose that he was ever disposed to be a republican. But how strange—a king tattooed with liberty! Our whole age is exhibited in that rapprochement: liberty, equality, or death! Yet it is with such mottos that one reaches a throne in our days.—Monsieur de Girardin.

CHARADE.

To find a well-known city on the continent:—The four first letters make a habitation; the four last make a vessel: the five first make a bird; and the five last a beast.

AN IMMENSE OFFER.

One of those destructive animals, weighing upwards of 20lbs., was captured a few days since at Berch-hill, near Reading, the residence of Mr. G. C. Beauchamp. The animal, which consists of a large and fine young hen found near a ditch communicating with the river, led to the supposition that otter was located not far off, and a trap was consequently set to catch the "varmint." The next morning the otter was found drowned in the river, secured by the trap, which at had drag'ed some distance into the water.

DANGERS OF A GAMING TABLE.

Perhaps the most unhappy event that can befal a person who visits a gaming-table for the first time is, that he should retire a winner. Two gentlemen strolled one night into a Paris gaming-house; they were not gamblers, therefore were only amiuse upon gratifying an idle curiosity. One of them, after looking on some time, threw down three or four napoleons; and in less than half an hour his pockets were filled with gold. He wisely resolved to march off with his spoil, and with that intention added the number to the gold for notes. After receiving the notes there still remained three unlucky napoleons. "Let's see what can be done with these," cried their possessor. He tried and lost them. "How provoking!" exclaimed he; and he changed one of his notes—then another; and in less than ten minutes he left the room without a franc in his purse. Reflecting on the difficulty of leaving the gaming-table a winner, he never played again.

Among the decorations at the dinner given to Mr. O'Connell, were the words "Ireland and Justice," in variegated lamps, with the name of O'Connell immediately under them.!!

O'Connell had indeed been blind,
If such a emblem, placed before him,
Brought not the fact into his mind
That justice is suspended o'er him.
Amid the pleasures of the feast
Applauded and observed by all,
He must have heard one truth at least
Told by the writing on the wall.

EAST INDIA COMPANY'S MUSEUM.

In pursuance of an order of the House of Commons for an annual return of the number of persons who have visited the above institution for the last twelve months past, ending the 31st December, 1843, it would appear that the number of names entered in the visiting books of the above establishment amounts to 14,161. This entry includes such visitors only who have resorted to the Museum on public days, viz., each Saturday in every week, when it is open to the public, exclusive of private visitors, who, having provided with tickets of admission from the directors, can view the above exhibition any day throughout the week, Sunday excepted.

REMARKABLE TROUT.

The largest fish of the above description taken from the Thames for some years past, was captured by a gentleman on the Surrey side, on Friday last, whilst casting his line upon the waters at Hampton. This prodigious fish measured 2 feet 6 inches in length, and weighed 15lb. 2oz. The successful party submitted his prize to Mr. Grover, fishmonger at Charing-cross, for preservation, with the artificial fly with which it was hooked inlined in the creature's mouth, cut off the line for that purpose. The class of fly it was captured with was that denominated by anglers the "red palmer." Had the above fish been in full season, it is considered by piscatorial judges that it would have reached the enormous weight of 15lb.

CULINARY WONDER.

In a recherché dinner given last Saturday by some friends of Mr. O'Connell, at the Reform Club, there was a remarkable dish, prepared by M. Soyer, entitled, "Le Soufflé Monstre à la Clontarf." The height of it was 29 inches, and the width 17; it took four hours and a quarter to bake, and contained 36 eggs, with other ingredients in proportion. Fifty very small soufflés were seen clinging round that colossal mountain, and an extraordinary good likeness of the great agitator drawn on rice paper, and surrounded by wreaths of shamrock) appeared, as it were, rising from the centre. It created much humour amongst the assembled guests, and we are happy to state that the monstrous "sweet meeting" was dispersed with the most perfect order.—Sun.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

WOOLWICH ROYAL MARINES.—A detachment of the Woolwich division, consisting of 1 serjeant, 1 corporal, and 20 privates, marched at the Woolwich Dockyard on Saturday, in the hired ship London at present tak ng on board convicts for Van Diemen's Land. The Marines are al artificers or mechanics and have volunteered for service at Port Essington. A detachment of the 58th regiment will take charge of the convicts on board the London during her voyage to the penal settlements.

SENTENCES ON MILITARY CONVICTS.—7th Hussars: Private George Butterworth, of this corps, was tried by a general court-martial, on the 4th January last, at Chatham, for deserting off his post when on sentry at the troop stables, at Lagnicar, Canada, on the 24th June, 1841, and for stealing two [illegible] horses of the 7th Hussars, the property of her Majesty. The Court found the prisoner guilty, and sentenced him to be transported for the term of 14 years. 58th Regiment: Private John Quigley, of this regiment, was tried by a general court-martial on the 5th November, 1841, for desertion, making away with necessaries, and insubordination. The Court sentenced him to be transported as a felon for the term of seven years, which her Majesty was pleased to remit in favour of the above sentence of the removed to the Penitentiary, at Millbank, previous to embarkation for New South Wales.

DEATH OF LIEUT.-GEN. O'REILLY, C. B.—The Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe has received intelligence of the demise of Lieut.-Col. O'Reilly, her husband. We understand the gallant colonel expired on Monday, the 4th inst. at Louth, while on a visit to his brother. The late colonel entered the army in Oct. 1811, and retired upon half-pay in Jan. 1839. On the promotion which took place in Nov. 1841, on the birth of the Prince of Wales, he was raised to the brevet rank of colonel. In 1837 the deceased married the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, who survives him.

The Black Eagle, Aden ratty steam-yacht, Master-Commander S. B. Cook, acting, has leave of the Admiralty to embark his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and convey him to the Isle of Wight.

The Dover, mail steam-packet, Second Master-Commander Lyne, arrived at Woolwich, from the Downs, on Saturday, and sailed on Tuesday morning was hauled into the basin, to refit and to have new boilers. The Ariel, mail steam-packet, at Woolwich, is to proceed to Dover to supply her place.

The Lucifer steam vessel, Commander Hewlett, arrived at Devonport on Friday, from Woolwich. She has some trifling defects to be made good, when she will be paid advance wages, and sail for Ireland.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—A very limited supply of English wheat has been received here during the present week, and the show of samples to-day was consequently very small, although the attendance of millers and dealers was nearly the same as that for the above article was steady at fully Monday's quotations. For foreign wheat, free of duty, the demand was to a very full extent. Bonded grain was in much request. The barley trade was in a very dull state, the mailers being sparingly. Malt had a droopingly appearance, with an average quantity offering. Oats, beans, peas, and flour were unaltered in value. Arrivals—English: Wheat, 1,010; barley, 2,180 qrs. malt, 840 quarters. Foreign: [illegible]

Seeds.—Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 55s to 60s; [illegible] Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 54s to 56s; ditto white, 45s to 48s; rye, 28s to 30s; grinding to distilling, 26s to 28s; malting ditto, 32s to 34s; Lincoln and Derby, 32s to 34s; brown ditto, 30s to 32s; Kingston and Ware, 62s to 65s; Chevalier, 62s; [illegible] colnshire fine oats, 2s to 22s; potatoe ditto, 22s to 23s; Youghal and Cork, 19s to 20s; Scotch ditto, 20s; Irish potatoe, 18s; beans, new, 34s to 36s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, [illegible] white, 32s to 36s; boilers, 34s to 38s; per quarter. Town-made [illegible] Suffolk, Norfolk, Lincoln and Yorkshire, [illegible] to 62s; white, 60s to 65s. Barley.—Wheat, 58s barley, 34s; oats, 21s; rye, 36s 6d, beans, 39s; peas, 35s 6d.

Sugar.—There is a most inactive falling off in the demand for most kinds of sugar, yet no variation can [illegible] At auction, on Tuesday, 10,200 packages were offered out of [illegible] of which [illegible] were bought in. [illegible] cargoes, are now at hand, upwards of 10,000 tons being now on the way.

Coffee.—The imports of foreign and colonial goods in a week have amounted to about 1500 packages. The demand may be considered steady at full quotations.

Tea.—The imports of tea are moderate, and in consequence, the demand for them is firm at prices varying from 4½ to 5½ d per lb.

Rice.—Middling to fine barley, 31s 6d, West Indian, 31s 6d, West Indian, 31s 6d, Yerr, 19s, Lamblion 18s 9d. Stewart's, 19s per ton.

Saltpetre.—Market steady for refined, but inquiring, was but scantily supplied with yesterday, a large portion of which was of middling and inferior quality, the best trade was in every 6-pressed assts. However, the primes Scots sold at prices about equal to those obtained on Monday; but for value of the inferior sorts a reduction was necessary. The fresh arrivals from Se Stait, consisted of 83 Scots. The numbers of sheep were on y moderate, and the trade valuable at the following prices:—Downs, 2s 2d to 2s 4d; long coarse wools very little was doing, at 2s to 2s 2d. Prime small calves commanded a steady, other kinds of veal a dull sale, at 3s 4d to 4s per 8lbs. Lambs, 4s 2d to 4s 8d per quarter of 8lbs. Which cows were selling heavily, at from 2l 15 to 2l 19s 0d each. Per 8lbs, to sink the offal Coarse and inferior beasts, 2s 6d to 2s 8d, second quality ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d, prime ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, prime Scots, 3s 6d to 3s 8d, coarse and inferior sheep, 2s 8d to 3s 0d, second quality ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d, prime coarse woolled sheep 3s 6d to 4s 0d, prime Southdown ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; large coarse calves 3s 8d to 4s 8d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 4s 10d, large hogs 2s 10d to 3s 10d, small porkers, 3s 4d to 4s 0d, lambs, 4s to 4s 8d per quarter of 8lbs, coarse old sows 2s 8d,

ROYAL PATENT CARPETING, manufactured without the spinning or weaving.—This CARPETING having now obtained the universal approval of Royalty, the Nobility, and the Public, for its elegance, durability, and economy, the PATENT WOOLLEN CLOTH COMPANY, who are the sole manufacturers, appear the trade that their factories for the spring, in the most novel and elegant designs, are now open for their inspection, at the Company's Warehouses, No. 8, Love-lane, Wood-street, Cheapside. In consequence of the increasing demand for this article, several parties have attempted to introduce to the public goods of a very spurious manufacture in imitate the Patent Carpetting, but which, on inspection, will be found to have all the disadvantages of a common drugget. The Royal Carpetting possesses the quality of being impervious to dust, therefore is far superior to any article hitherto produced for the same purposes. The Company have a large assortment of Window Curtains and Table Covers, embossed and printed, in new and elegant patterns, and in all sizes; Tablings, Waistcoatings, and numerous other goods of their manufacture. Agents have been appointed for the sale of Patent Woollen Cloth Carpetting in all the principal Kingdom.

JUST RECEIVED FROM AMERICA.—The number of testimonials of cures by PARR'S LIFE PILLS are crowding upon the Proprietors daily, and their unsolicited testimony witnessed by assurances of high reputation.
The following Testimonial is from one of the most talented and respectable members of the Theatrical Profess on, Mr. T. D. RICE (the Original Jim Crow), a gentleman whose high character for worth and truth as a Comedian has his unsolicited and voluntary attestation of the excellence of the medicine beyond the shadow of suspicion. This, (with thousands of similar grateful acknowledgements), can be seen at the Principal Depôt.
FROM MR. T. D. RICE, (THE ORIGINAL JIM CROW.)
Gentlemen—Having for the space of a long and arduous practice of my profession contracted a tightness across the chest, with pains in my left side of strength, and suffering much from the effects of the labour attached to my peculiar pursuits while in England, I had recourse to your PARR'S LIFE PILLS, from which I received great benefit. Finding a branch of your house in this city, I procured a few boxes of the medicine, and can now sincerely testify to their value and speedy efficacy, and also to the great character they bear in the old country. Your obedient servant,
T. D. RICE, 20, Vesey-street.

ASTHMA.
MESSRS. T. ROBERTS and Co. Portsmouth, N.H., Nov. 27, 1844.
Gentlemen,—It gives me much pleasure to inform you that in this town and neighbourhood your invaluable medicine, PARR'S LIFE PILLS are much prized for their rare virtues and great efficacy in the cure of Asthma, and consequently their sale is considerable. Mr. James Ladd, a gentleman well known here, told me of a friend of his, an elderly lady, who has been troubled with Asthma for the last six years, so much so that she was unable to walk out, or use any exercise. Being advised to use PARR'S LIFE PILLS, she has found herself considerably relieved by them, and persevering in their use she was enabled, a few weeks since, not only to go about, but to walk to church, a distance of a quarter of a mile from her residence, a thing she had not accomplished for the last six years.
Another case is that of an Engineer on one of the Eastern Railroads, who, after having tried numerous other medicines and found no relief, took a short time since to your PARR'S LIFE PILLS for the above distressing complaint, and I am happy to say, at the present writing, he is fast recovering.
I am, Gentlemen, yours, respectfully, JOHN JOHNSONS.

☞ The words PARR'S LIFE PILLS are engraved on the Government Stamp in WHITE letters on a RED Ground, and attached to every box of the Genuine Medicine. The signature of the Proprietors, "T. ROBERTS Co." is also printed on the label, as the direction wrapped round each box. Without this mark of authenticity, they are spurious.
Sold Wholesale, by E. Edwards, 67, St. Paul's; Barclay and Sons, Farringdon-street; Sutton and Co., Bow Church-yard, London; Mottershead and Co., Manchester, and J. and R. Raimes and Co., Edinburgh; and Retailed by at least one agent in every town in the United Kingdom. Price 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., and family packets 11s., 22s., and 33s. each. Full directions are given with each box.

GOGAND MAGOG.

Round these huge giants (both with old and young),
Much mystery hangs, and many tales are told.
Those who have read, and studiously reflected,
Can't rightly tell us why they were erected.
Some say it was for this, and some for that,
And no one reason can we thus come at.
But let the wore be what it may, we no longer
Our ratiocinations can't be stronger.
We've read them over, we've said to ourselves,
As no hog but prophetic types of "Us"
And all who mark his way we must be thus
With see the force of our hypothesis.
Like "Gog and Magog," MOSES and his SON,
Appear to "run in their ruts" at "Old Nick."
And then amid the City we're display'd
As guests on an occasion of a feast,
While all who view us on our lofty height,
Behold us with astonishment delight.
Like these huge figures we have risen and sat
To "Son o' the Squat" of improving trade.
Which may, in fact, be scarcely long,
Unqualified in our "strength" and "magnitude."
We've served many, and we shall be found,
Unmov'd amid the changeful scenes around
To shield our nest till we have shown you thus
That Gog and Magog are but marks to "Us."

TO the BENEVOLENT.—A late MEMBER of the DAILY PRESS, who has for many years contributed to amuse and inform the PUBLIC, is now compelled to SOLICIT THEIR ASSISTANCE. In the summer of 1841, whilst in the country, reporting the Elections for the present Parliament, he was attacked by repeated colds, the weather being unprecedentedly severe and changeable. The result was the setting in of consumption, which gradually extend on him until it became so aggravated by the very harassing labours attendant on the session of 1842, that, after a long but vain struggle, he was obliged to resign the chief means of support in the summer of that year. In 1843 he was obliged to throw up his minor engagements, not being able to obtain payment for his labour. Since his retirement he has gradually become more feeble. He is now barely able to walk; his savings, always kept down by his duty as the eldest son of a poor family, are nearly exhausted; he can no longer earn money; he has no wealthy friends. Perhaps, a few generous strangers will come forward and help him His great desire is to raise as much as would enable him to settle in a milder climate; or failing that, to secure the means of procuring those comforts and medical aid which he may require during the short remainder of his days in this country. Reference may be made by letter to the Editor of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, 198, Strand, by whom any donation will be thankfully acknowledged.

The Scottish Union Insurance Company may be most favourably contrasted with any mutual institution. Unquestionable Security is guaranteed by its subscribed Capital of Five Millions sterling—divided, at its origin in 1824, amongst Five Thousand Proprietors At the First Division of Profits, which took place at the 31st August, 1841, a bonus, averaging Fourteen per Cent., or Two per Cent. per Annum on the Sum Assured, was added to the Policies. A few extracts from the Company's Books at once prove the practical effects resulting from the plan peculiar to this Company.

No. 99, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1844. [Sixpence.

LIMITATION OF LABOUR.

THE past week has been the most remarkable of the session; the party that is known to possess a majority of ninety-one, has been surprised at finding itself in a minority of nine; the event was unexpected; it has been the practice to reject the motion almost annually made by Lord Ashley, but on this occasion his proposal has been affirmed, and the Legislature has decided that ten hours labour is "sufficient unto the day," as the amount of labour to be performed in it. Considering the vast field over which this principle extends, the numbers it will affect, and the consequences to which, if followed out, that principle must inevitably lead, so important a vote has not passed the house for years.

The importance of the vote arises not only from the question itself, but from the decided manner in which the Government declared itself opposed to legislation on the subject, beyond the point to which legislation has already gone, and which we presume the Executive feel bound to maintain. Sir James Graham's speech was an appeal to the house and every party, or section of party in it, on every possible ground on which they could be appealed to; to the manufacturers he repeated some of the arguments of the Free Traders, and urged the impossibility of restricting labour. To the agriculturists, he held out the necessity of supporting the commercial greatness of the empire, as intimately connected with their own prosperity. The opposition, that towards the end of the debate he saw rising in the ranks of the Whig Opposition—ominous of a dangerous conjunction—he endeavoured to repress by quotations from Hansard, which showed plainly enough that the leaders of the Whig Government were as strongly pledged to oppose the motion as men possibly can be, if men are bound to act in the future as they have done in the past. The eagerness with which he fastened on and availed himself of this point amounted almost to a taunt, and it was met by Lord J Russell, as all such arguments are, by the assertion that altered circumstances require altered policy, and that a statesman ought not to be deterred from taking that different line of conduct, even though it may involve some degree of self-contradiction and expose him to the charge of inconsistency. All was in vain: it is a social, and not a party question; humanity and independent feeling had more influence than usual; the statements of Lord Ashley had revealed a mass of moral and physical evil absolutely frightful; the pithy assertion of Lord John Russell that the people had "too little food and too much toil," was mournfully true and the ordinary bond of party was broken; sections united tha on other occasions stand aloof; men joined in a work of mercy, whose principles on other subjects are the very opposites of each other, and the list of the division is a curious study, though for different reasons both to the philanthropist and the politician.

The speech of the Premier treated the question more as a whole; was founded on principle, rather than supported by details; and, for a clear perception of the "difficulties" this kind of legislation will create for present and future Governments, if it is attempted to carry it out to its full extent, is an able statement of the case in most of its bearings. But the question seems to be whether it will be necessary to carry it out to this extent whether it is possible to do it. If not, neither legislatures nor individuals are bound to impossibilities.

When an enormous evil is stated and proved, the simple question for a Government should be—Have we done all in our power to lessen or remove it? If not, go on—do more—rest not till the utmost is accomplished. The perpetual anticipation of difficulties that may arise; this constant seeing a "lion in the path," when that path leads to improvement, is not the conduct that should be expected from a wise and strong Government. Difficulties are to be met and conquered, not evaded: in the victory over them consists the triumph of statesmanship. We may observe, this is not the only question in which Sir R. Peel betrays a—not over-strained, perhaps—but an undue anxiety about the future difficulties that a certain course of legislation may create. He is in the habit of putting his objections in the interrogative form to his opponents: If you affirm this proposal, are you prepared to do this, or are you ready to carry out your principle still further, and apply it to other circumstances? This was the course he took in the discussion of the question of the limitation of labour. He did not deny that if universally applied, it might be just, but he alleged the total impossibility of carrying it out through all the branches of the immense trade of an immense empire. He declares he will not take on himself the responsibility of sending the law into every workshop and establishment where human labour is employed, in all its varieties, for the purpose of dictating for what lengths of time masters shall purchase and workmen shall sell the great source of wealth—labour. Clearly, to this extent, the task would be impossible. But the proposition applies only to factory labour, which is carried on in great populous centres, in establishments already under the control and limitations of the law; for visiting and checking any abuses of that law there is a complete legal machinery already established, so that there is no need of new instruments for carrying out any further extension of the law that may seem advisable. As far as the abstract principle goes, the law has already as much and as decidedly affirmed it, by limiting the hours of labour to twelve, as by now limiting them to ten; we are prepared to deny altogether the argument, that by extending the provisions of a law already enacted, the Legislature is pledged to apply it to all existing kinds of labour, whether in mine, mill, factory, warehouse, counting-house, or shop. Despair of being able to effect all things should not be suffered to deter us from attempting to effect any. It may be impossible to do all, and yet perfectly practicable to do something. The Premier alleges that the case of the dressmakers and milliners of London is just as bad as that of the factory women; in some respects it may even be worse. He asks also if the supporters of a ten hour bill are prepared to apply their principle to the agricultural labourers; and the question elicited a cheer from "the Opposition." We doubt greatly if the farm labourer wants any such measure: the sufferings of that class of men rather proceed from their having too little labour than too much. Their difficulty consists in not having so much work as they can do, not having more than they can perform, which is the alleged grievance of the manufacturing operatives.

They may be put out of the question as far as the difficulty of working such an act is concerned; it is meant for overtasked energies, not for the enforced and unwelcome leisure that "standeth all day in the market-place idle because no man hath hired them." We contend then, first, that there are circumstances in the nature of manufacturing labour that make it more amenable to the law than most other descriptions of toil. The Psalmist tells us, when we see the "oppressions that are done under the sun, to wonder not, nor marvel at the matter;" but there is something so hideous in the demoralisation disclosed by the details of Lord Ashley, that humanity cannot pass it by without a shudder, and though Mercy is free to drop a tear over it, Justice forbids that she should also cover it from the sight of mankind with her concealing veil. It must be probed, it must be searched to the depths, and a remedy, or an attempt at a remedy, must be applied.

It is right that all should know—that all should be made, if possible, to feel—there are masses of population growing up in the midst of us, in their physical condition almost as bad, in their mental state almost worse than the savage. They are even more to be pitied than the roamer of the desert or the woods, who has space of ground, activity of limb, sufficiency of food, and intervals of relaxation after his periods of toil. They have the knowledge of civilization without the ability to enjoy its blessings; producers of national wealth, they are ever poor; toiling always, they are often destitute, seldom comfortable, and never rich—dwellers in a christian land, they have grown up with but scant acquaintance with Christian Truth—citizens of a free community, they find that the state has taken their sweat but given them only neglect in return. They are a hapless race; on them the "eldest, primal curse," seems to have descended in all its certainty and twice its original bitterness. Let us be deaf and blind for but a space longer, let us be a little longer guilty of the crime of neglect, and the evils will have got beyond the reach of the worldly wisdom—not always exercised—that Heaven sometimes vouchsafes to human legislatures. In conclusion, then, we are disposed to think well of this attempt to place a limit to the labour that is producing its millions of yards of cotton, at the expense of the deterioration of thousands of souls. The greatness of the returns on the tables of our national statistics may be a subject of gain to many—or, it may be, of pride to more; but the expense of human worth, of human suffering, by which it is purchased, should be a cause of humiliation and sorrow to all. A remedy is proposed; it may, perchance, prove only a palliative, not a specific. Still, let it be tried; let it not be rejected, as the Government would reject it, because it cannot, from the nature of things, be universal.

THE LATE KING O SWEDEN.—See next page.

BERNADOTTE, THE LATE KING OF SWEDEN.

Another of the royalties of Europe has yielded up the sceptre and the crown, and left a throne to a successor. Bernadotte, King of Sweden, is no more. His country is not a very influential one among the Powers of Europe, but the character and career of its late Monarch are invested with more than ordinary interest. He is the last, and was long the only living survivor of the monarchs that were created out of the companions of the early campaigns of Napoleon; most of these kings and kingdoms perished before the fall of their founder; Spain, Naples, Rome, all disappeared like the forms of a dream. But Bernadotte, who placed himself on the throne of Sweden, not only without Napoleon's assistance, but against his will, and in opposition, maintained himself on it for a long series of years, and has died peaceably at a good old age, respected by his adopted people, and leaving an apparently quiet succession to his son. Bernadotte was a true soldier of the French Republic, and retained his Republican principles long after many others thought it prudent to drop theirs as they followed their leader on his path to the attainment of imperial power. But placed on a throne, it cannot be said that Bernadotte did not modify those principles very considerably. He is the last of a race whose history, when read by future ages, will be deemed as startling and fabulous as that of the Peers of Charlemagne; beginning life under the burden of the knapsack, they finished it wearing the sparkling crown, the "round and top of sovereignty." Ages may pass before such an uprooting of the social fabric of Europe again occurs, as gave their opportunities to men like Bernadotte, of Sweden.

John Baptiste Julius Bernadotte, destined to be one of the greatest, and by far the most fortunate of Napoleon's lieutenants, was born at Pau, the capital of Bearne, January 26, 1764. His parents were humble, but not of the very humblest condition, as appears from the superior education they were enabled to give him. Some accounts say that he was designed for the bar; but, in his sixteenth year, he suddenly relinquished his studies, and enlisted as a private soldier into the royal marines. At the commencement of the French Revolution he had risen to the rank of sergeant, and in the years that followed, his advancement was very rapid. At Fleurus he commanded a division of the Republican army; and his services on the Rhine with Jourdan, in 1796, established his military reputation. Thence he was sent, with reinforcements from the army of the Sambre and Meuse, to join Bonaparte in Italy. He bore a part in the most brilliant actions of that campaign; and was chosen by Bonaparte to convey to Paris the standards captured at Rivoli. After the peace of Campo Formio, he went to Vienna for a short time as Minister of the French Republic; and he afterwards attempted, though in vain, to retrieve the mal-administration of the military department under the Directory. The 18th Brumaire and the decisive ascendancy of Bonaparte over the destinies of France, gave a fresh impulse to his career. He contributed to the capture of Ulm, and he earned his share of the laurels of Austerlitz. In the preceding year he had received the staff of a Marshal of France, and in 1806 the title of Prince of Ponte Corvo was added to his other honours. In the German campaigns, as well as in the command which he held for a short time against the Chouans in the west of France, he was distinguished from all his military comrades by his considerate generosity towards the conquered enemy. From 1806 to 1809 he commanded the first corps d'armée in the north of Germany, and it is recorded that his personal kindness to a body of 1,500 Swedes, who had fallen as prisoners into his hands, first awakened amongst the younger officers of that nation those feelings of gratitude which led to his nomination as a candidate for the reversion of the crown of Sweden.

Of all the Imperial Generals (for the sterner Republican spirits of the army had long been removed from the scene) Bernadotte was the least inclined to yield to Napoleon that servile deference which he so strictly exacted. The blemishes of the Imperial regime, the abuse of military power, and the jealousies which had sprung up between the grandees of that transitory court, had alarmed his caution, and, perhaps, offended his sense of jusaice. Suddenly, and by a personal impulse rather than by any subtle combination of policy or intrigue, his name was mentioned at the Diet of Orebro, where the deputies of Sweden were assembled to choose a successor to Charles XIII. The consent of the Prince de Ponte Corvo had already been privately implied; that of the Emperor Napoleon was, not without misgivings, extorted from him. Bernadotte, said, with characteristic energy, "Will your Majesty make me greater than yourself, by compelling me to have refused a crown?" Napoleon replied, "You may go: our destinies must be accomplished."

From that hour Bernadotte, or, as he was thenceforward styled, Charles John, Crown Prince of Sweden, turned with no divided affection to his adopted country. The first acts of his government were to refuse to recruit the French fleet at Brest Swedish sailors, and to struggle against the oppressive exigencies of the Continental system. He liberated Sweden from that subserviency to the political interests of France which had proved so fatal to her own greatness and to the welfare of her sovereigns. In Russia and Prussia, once was formed between Sweden and Russia; and in the following year the Crown Prince assumed the command of the combined forces of Northern Germany against the French empire. The reward of the services which he had rendered in the cause of freedom, humanity, and to the armies of Sweden, was his undisputed succession to that crown, which he owed neither to the sword nor to the arbitrary policy of his former master, but to the deliberate choice of the Swedish people.

It was on his birthday in the year 1840, after a reign of nearly thirty years, that Charles John XIV. took occasion, in a speech from the throne, to survey with parental satisfaction the condition of his dominions. The population of the kingdom was so much increased, that the inhabitants of Sweden alone are now equal in number to those of Sweden and Finland before the latter province was torn from the former. The commerce and the manufactures of the country have been doubled—agriculture improved—instruction diffused—the finances raised from a state of great embarrassment to complete prosperity the national debt almost paid off—a civil and a penal code proposed for promulgation—the great canal which unites the ocean with the Baltic have been completed—and lastly, the secular hostility of the Swedish and Norwegian nations has given way to mutual confidence, cemented by kindred institutions, and the enlightened government of the same sceptre.

Such are the claims of the late Sovereign to the respectful and grateful recollections of his people.

He died on the 16th of March, at 4 o'clock in the morning. His son and heir succeeds him under the title of Oscar the Second.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, March 19.

SPAIN.

In my last I noticed that Alcant had surrendered, and that the Queen's troops had possession of the fortress. I have now to record a most disloyal and treacherous proceeding—committed by General Roncali on twenty-four insurgents, who without a trial, merely on being identified, were barbarously shot. Far be it from my intention to deny the culpability of the unfortunate insurgents—many of them merited their fate—but, in the worst days of the French Revolution, the form of a trial was gone through and evidence heard. In Spain—they shoot first, and then make enquiries. And who are the persons who commanded, and who executed the sanguinary decree? Take first Narvaez. Did not this officer, although an exile in France, enter Spain and raise an insurrection against Espartero! He succeeded—and is a patriot; Bonet failed—and is a traitor! Next, Bravo. This man, the infamous murderer of Queen Christina—now Ler obedient servant—frequently denounced Narvaez as a traitor, and openly supported the insurrection of Bonet. And who is General Manzredo, the Minister of War, who, in a cool, business-like manner, approves of the murder of Bonet and his twenty-three companions? It would be difficult in searching the annals of Spanish military warfare, to find a single engagement in which he was present. No! Manzredo's sword is as pure of blood as his heart is sanguinary—in one word, he is the servile creature of Narvaez. And now for Roncali, whom I believe to be a brave man, but whose conscience is very elastic—the same officer who defended General Diego Leon, and for four days fatigued the Court with elaborate arguments against capital condemnations for political offences! Diego Leon raised an insurrection in Madrid against the Government, he was finally seized, Roncali was his advocate; this same Roncali, without form of trial, puts Bonet to death for raising an insurrection in Alicant! Not content with the act of vengeance, he issues a proclamation in which he says that, as soon, on pain of death, to afford a refuge to the members of the late Junta. The Heraldo, a paper belonging to Narvaez and Bravo, in an editorial article praises Roncali for what it calls his prudence and energy at Alicant, and justifying the wholesale massacre of the insurgents who fell into his power, as a severe and necessary act, which has saved the country. The same language was used by Valdes, Rodil, Nuna, and others, when they shot the Carlist officer in Biscay. The same argument was used when the military prisoners were shot at Barcelona; and yet Spain is not saved! No, conspirators are daily shot, and fresh conspiracies daily discovered. Thus we are told that the same day Bonet and his accomplices were shot at Alicant, an insurgent chief, named Zurbano, and three of his followers, were shot at Lugo; and further, two days after the death of Bonet, an extensive conspiracy was discovered at Valencia, in which the officers and sergeants of the garrison were concerned; the chiefs were to have declared against the Queen's marriage with the Count de Montemolin. At first it was decided that they should be sent to Valencia, tried by a court martial, and shot; this having been disapproved by many of the firmest partizans of the Government, it is now arranged that they shall be kept in prison until after the next sessions of the Cortès, and then discharged!

Carthagena still holds out; on the 5th the garrison made a sortie, and was repulsed with considerable loss—in all probability this fortress will soon capitulate.

Christina continues her triumphal march through the country; on the 12th she arrived at Gerona. At four o'clock in the afternoon "800,000 persons," including Carlists, greeted the Princess with the usual road to Valencia, so that her Majesty could not arrive there until seven in the evening." Her reception was admirable. Her Majesty was to leave Valencia on the 18th. It is worthy of remark that at a dinner given to Christina, at Barcelona, the first toast given was "To Louis Philippe, King of the French, and the union of France and Spain"!! Christina has shown much bravery in entering Spain—but she is no gratuitous she is courageous. She still maintains her establishment at the Hotel des Courcelles in Paris and Malmaison, and Munoz has not quitted the French capital.

The Carlists along the French frontier and in the Basque provinces are actively occupied in getting up a general rising North of the Ebro. I doubt much of their success—certain it is that great discontent is manifested, particularly in Bazay and Guipuscoa, and that several persons have been arrested; amongst others a priest at Bilboa, named Bilbao, has been condemned to ten years hard labour.

The too celebrated Zurbano and his son, having made their peace with Narvaez, have quitted France for Spain.

ITALY

Serious complaints have been made to the Governments of Modena and Naples, that the roads are infested with robbers. Several detachments have been sent against the banditti, but as yet they have escaped.

The following curious account is extracted from a letter dated Palermo, the 25th ult.: "In one of the sulphure mines of the Prince di Trebbio, during the recent earthquake at Calatapadia, in Sicily, four men were buried, by its falling on them. The Prince immediately employed men to release them; but their labour was continued for eighteen days before the sufferers could be reached. Three of them were found dead; but the fourth, named Giacomo Arena, was still alive. He related—that he escaped the wounds and bruises which his companions received, and supported life by licking the moisture from the sides of the galleries, as he roamed about, hoping to find some aperture by which he might escape. The Prince has granted him a pension sufficient to maintain him without labour."

The Duchess of Savoy has been safely delivered of a son.

Three Sardinian men-of-war have appeared off the coast of Tunis, near to Goulette: they were taking soundings.

GERMANY.

It was reported, and generally credited at Vienna, that there would be a congress of crowned heads at Toeplitz early this summer.

The projected marriage between a Russian Princess and an Austrian Archduke has been broken off, the Emperor of Russia declaring that the children should be taught the creed of the Greek Church, to which the Emperor of Austria would not consent.

The first prize of 170,000 of the Vienna States Lottery for 1839, drawn on the 1st inst., was gained by the house of Messrs. Rothschild.

An important measure has been recently adopted by the Hungarian Diet. Hitherto the nobles of Hungary, who are very numerous (many of even the smallest farmers being nobles), have been exempted from the payment of taxes. The Diet has resolved that this shall no longer be the case: but the amount and mode of taxation remains to be decided.

Count Munch Bellinghausen, President of the German Diet, has been charged to arrange the dispute which has arisen between the German Customs' Union and the Government of Hanover. The King of Hanover leaves for London the beginning of June.

Accounts received from Gorits to the 9th, state that the health of the Duke d'Angoulême had rather improved. The fever remained, but in a subdued form.

FRANCE.

The Chamber of Deputies commenced yesterday the discussion on the secret service money—or rather vote of confidence. The discussion was adjourned. There is no doubt that the ministers will have a large majority. M. de Lamartine has brought a bill for lowering the postage on letters. It enacts that every letter carried to a distance of more than ten leagues (about twenty-five miles) shall be charged 2*d.* sous; but when the distance is less, it is to be only 1*d.* sous. The ministerialists are said, with characteristic generosity, to intend to make a measure for paying off the 5 per cents.

There will be two camps formed during the approaching summer, one near Metz, the other near Bordeaux. The Duke of Nemours is to be commander-in-chief.

The Duke de Montpensier, now in Algeria, lately paid a visit to the ruins of Lambaiza. The modern name is Texaoulets, and the place is situated about half a league from where the third Legion of Augustus was formerly established. There are a number of remarkable monuments still remaining there. A temple dedicated to Victory, and a bridge of Trajan's Arch have been used for lodging elephants —another temple to Esculapius, with the inscription entire, just as it was described by Peyssonnil—a theatre—an amphitheatre—remains of aqueducts, triumphal gates, and a great number of tombs. These ruins are spread over a considerable space of ground.

The effective army of France is 344,600 men, including officers, and 83,416 horses. Of the total 60,000 men and 69,520 horses form the division in France, 60,000 men and 13,416 horses those of Algeria.

Lord Cowley gave a magnificent soirée on Friday to the élite of the fashionable world. The musicals were admirably arranged. All the Italian artists were in good voice, but decidedly the palm of the evening was gained by Mademoiselle Brambilla. The septuor of "Lucrezia Borgia," and the duo of "Semiramide," were encored. After the duo of "Maria de Rohan," M. Guizot personally complimented Brambilla. You will have learnt from the bill of the London Italian Opera that Brambilla is not engaged, and that you will be deprived of her most eminent services. From enquiries I myself have made, I have learnt that she is to be replaced by a Miss Favanti, an English lady with an Italian finale.

Tamburini is expected in Paris the latter end of the month; he returns immediately to St. Petersburg with the whole of his family. Fornasari, for whom Tamburini was sacrificed in London, has a serious complaint in the throat, which, I am afraid, will not be easily cured.

Halévy's new opera buffa, in two acts, will be brought out on the 5th of April.

This is our grand season for concerts, and this year they have been better attended than I ever remember them. The great favourite of the day is decidedly Jacques Offenbach, the violoncellista. His appearance before the audience is a signal for a triple salvo of applause. I understand that M. Offenbach intends visiting England this season. I hope that the least doubt he will create a great sensation in London.

Thalberg was at Naples on the 5th. The same evening he gave a concert for the benefit of the poor of Real Albergo.

"Margherita d'Arragon," by Vincenzo Battiste, has met with great success at San Carlos. The principal parts were confided to Coletti, Fraschini, Gruitz, and Goldberg.

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Lady Mary Wood, Captain [illegible], arrived at Southampton on Tuesday morning at half-past nine o'clock, bringing the following mails.—Gibraltar, Cadiz, Lisbon, Oporto, and Vigo.

Her dates of departure are as follow:—From Gibraltar, March 9th; Cadiz, 10th; Lisbon, 13th; Oporto, 14th; Vigo, 16th.

Ships of War lying at Gibraltar—The Locust, steamer. At Cadiz—the Cigne (French) and Volage brigs. At Lisbon—Her Majesty's ship Albion, French 3-gun-brigs Gomard, and one brig.

Passed the Lord of the Isles schooner, of Scilly, steering for Lisbon, 13th inst., six miles south of the Rock of Lisbon; and the brig Beeswing, near Oporto, 14th inst.

Specie on board, twelve packages.

The Lady Mary Wood narrowly escaped destruction on Monday night; a large vessel, supposed to be an East Indiaman under full sail, without lights, bearing down upon her. Captain Cooper, who happened to be on the paddle-box, immediately gave orders to turn the ship astern, and the helm was instantly obeyed. The vessel was not discovered in time to prevent the vessel and every soul on board would have perished, as it was blowing a gale at the time. It appears that no look out whatever was kept on board the vessel, while the Lady Mary was steaming easy, and had her proper look out.

TURKEY.

The Levant Mail brings news from Greece. After a two days' debate, the nomination of senators for life was carried by a majority of 113 to 92, the numbers only being 205 with the nomination. This discussion appears to have been highly unpalatable to the Russian party, whose representative, Metaxas, resigned, in consequence. Nauvrocordato has succeeded in forming the new Ministry of the Duke de Canaris—Glenis has become Minister of Religion, and Drosos Menelas Minister of Finance. The grand annual fête on the first day of Lent, given by the military governor, Kallergi, and the officers of the garrison of Athens, was attended by the King and Queen. Upwards of 20,000 persons were present. A gold cup was presented to his Majesty by a deputation from the garrison with the inscription, "The Guard of the National Assembly to the constitutional King of Greece."

BUENOS AYRES AND MONTE VIDEO.

A feeling of great dissatisfaction prevails among the merchants connected with Buenos Ayres and Monte Video, in consequence of the conduct pursued by Mr. Mandeville, the British Minister at Buenos Ayres, in calling upon both belligerents, in the name of his Government, to put an immediate stop to hostilities, which demand it was thought fit to enforce in the instance of Monte Video only, thus preparing the way for its ruin.

AUSTRALIA.

Hobart-town papers to the 4th of November have been received, which state that advices had arrived there from Port Phillip, alluding to the distress prevailing among the agriculturists, arising from the excessive imports of grain from the southern ports of the Pacific. A petition was to be forwarded to the Legislative Council at Sydney, calling upon the members to grant protection in the shape of a duty, or else it is said the interests of emigrants who are following the pursuits of the field will be irretrievably ruined. At Hobart-town business does not appear to be very active. Wheat was 6*s.* to 10*s.* per bushel; and flour 2*l.* 6*s.* per ton. The measures of Government, proposed by Sir Wilmot Eardley, met with much approbation.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

Their lordships met at five o'clock

Lord DENMAN alluded to the case of the man who stands condemned to death in Louisana for having aided the escape of a slave, expressing a hope that the knowledge of the feeling which prevailed in Europe upon the subject might tend to prevent the infliction of a punishment so entirely disproportioned to the nature of the offence.

The bill for the reduction of the interest on the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. was, on the motion of the Earl of RIPON, read a second time.

A discussion arose, on the presentation of a petition from Glasgow by Earl FITZWILLIAM, respecting the state of Ireland, the noble earl having recommended, that the property of the Church, in tithes, &c., should be appropriated to the uses of the parishes where they accrued, and so divided between the Protestant and Catholic clergymen as to place them upon a footing of equality.

The Duke of WELLINGTON energetically warned the house against listening to any such doctrines, which would be not only a violation of the compact entered into with the Irish Parliament, but would be the destruction of the very principles of the Reformation itself.—The Bishop of EXETER thanked the noble earl for having drawn forth an explanation from the noble and learned duke, which must give assurance to all the friends of the Established Church that it would be maintained in its fullest integrity. The right rev. prelate observed, that the many great actions of the noble Duke had raised the glory and greatness of the empire, and the further statement made by the right hon. baronet, a declaration made by him to a deputation of his constituents to adhere firmly to the main provisions contained in the printed bill which had been circulated for a length of time through the manufacturing districts. The right hon. baronet declared his determination to resist firmly the proposition of a ten hours' bill; and he trusted, therefore, that the Government would make this a government measure, and not suffer it to be regarded as an open question by their adherents. He had to regarded it as an unfavourable measure, for, to a certain extent, it was a violation of those principles of free competition of which (Mr. Warburton) was the advocate; still he was opposed, on the whole, to accepting as a merit of less magnitude than a ten hours' bill.—Mr. BECKETT supported the principle of limitation. The impracticability of applying legislative interference to the case of the agricultural labourers was no reason for not applying it to the labourers in factories. He appealed to the opinions of the millowners themselves, who were now becoming very generally favourable to limitation. But he was not disposed to go at once from 12 hours to 10; he wished that the measure should first be that of a limitation to 11 hours.—Sir GEORGE GREY declared himself in favour of Lord Ashley's proposal. The admissibility of legislative interference had long since been settled affirmatively by the decision of Parliament; it was too late to question it now, and the matter to be decided in this committee was only whether the term of labour for women and young persons should be twelve hours or ten. He (the speaker) opposed factory inspection; twelve hours' work was quite much for any such labourer. He had heard nothing to show that twelve hours was a point to which we might safely reduce the day's work, but that below that point we could not safely descend. It must be that the millowners, if the hours were reduced, would reduce the wages also; but, from those whom he regarded as intelligent and competent representatives of the operatives, he found it was the opinion of the operatives themselves that they had rather have the ten hours' bill, and give the present length of time. Twelve hours was an arbitrary period, but ten appeared to be a natural one, inasmuch as it was that which in other occupations had been very generally adopted. The unanimous concurrence between the masters and operatives, in his judgment, preponderated greatly in favour of Lord Ashley's period, and for this period he should vote.—Sir J. GRAHAM reminded the committee that the period of twelve hours was not a new limitation. The first introduction of that term by the Legislature had been in 1802, in favour of parish apprentices. In 1819, it was applied in favour of all children under nine years of age. Subsequently to twelve hours was added that limitation in favour of those who had so resisted it, and with whom he himself had then voted, were Sir G. Grey, Lord Howick, Mr. Labouchere, and others, who now seemed zealous in the very opposite direction. Among the reasons he had for opposing the less costly manufactures there might be a disposition to the shorter term; but he believed there was no such disposition among the manufacturers in cotton and worsted, whose experience therefore was entitled to weight in every twelve or thirteen years; and he felt assured that in these employments a ten-hours' enactment would reduce wages by twenty-five per cent., which he entered into calculations to prove. This was a responsibility which he could not consent to take upon himself, and which nothing should induce him to share. It was urged that this proposal would equalize the distribution of labour; but experience showed that labour had left those employments wherein the legislature had interfered, and crowded into those which had been left free; so that, instead of an equalisation, there was a depletion in the regulated, and a congestion in the unregulated, employments.—Mr. M'CULLAGH Murray said that he had been told a heartbreaking claim upon Sir R. Peel, whose father had introduced a ten-hours' bill. He censured the Government as not sufficiently identifying itself with the wants of the people that one of those wants was a ten hours' bill, and which the people were taught that agitation was a necessary preliminary to the redress of any grievance. Matters could not go on long, if one class confined itself to improving the breed of cattle, and the other to improvements in machinery, both neglecting the benefit of the people.—Mr. LABOUCHERE amented to see the powerful opposition which the Government had to encounter, and would give them what assistance he could by his vote. He was for a ten hours' bill, but one from which, under every successive Government, the Legislature had always recoiled. He believed that twelve hours of works were more than could be good for the individual, but that under the existing good and evil were mingled so that evil must be taken upon the balance. The manufactures of England were closely pressed by foreign competition, and he believed there was no foreign country in which the hours of labour were not at least twelve per day—none in which the State had imposed any limitation. It would be a fearful thing to put a stop to our trade by cutting down our means of competition with foreigners. We maintained in this country a variety of unwieldy, cumbrous, and costly machinery, which we had no means of protecting our manufacturers, and we ought to be cautious how we endangered their industry.—Sir. COLQUHOUN insisted that the 300 manufacturers who were in communication in favour of the ten hours' bill had a beneficial claim upon Sir R. Peel, whose father had introduced a ten-hours' bill. He censured the Government as not sufficiently identifying itself with the wants of the people that one of those wants was a ten hours' bill, and which the people were taught that agitation was a necessary preliminary to the redress of any grievance. Matters could not go on long, if one class confined itself to improving the breed of cattle, and the other to improvements in machinery, both neglecting the benefit of the people.—Mr. LABOUCHERE amented to see the powerful opposition which the Government had to encounter, and would give them what assistance he could by his vote. He was for a ten hours' bill, but one from which, under every successive Government, the Legislature had always recoiled. He believed that twelve hours of works were more than could be good for the individual, but that under the existing good and evil were mingled so that evil must be taken upon the balance. The manufactures of England were closely pressed by foreign competition, and he believed there was no foreign country in which the hours of labour were not at least twelve per day—none in which the State had imposed any limitation. It would be a fearful thing to put a stop to our trade by cutting down our means of competition with foreigners. We maintained in this country a variety of unwieldy, cumbrous, and costly machinery, which we had no means of protecting our manufacturers, and we ought to be cautious how we endangered their industry.—Sir. COLQUHOUN insisted that the 300 manufacturers who were in communication in favour of the ten hours' bill had a beneficial claim upon their own interests, and that at least one-third of these were engaged in the finer and more expensive kinds of manufacture. In the Frome district the ten hours' plan had been adopted, and had been in actual operation. The calculation given by Sir J. Graham to prove that wages would be reduced to the extent of 25 per cent., had been furnished by a very able factory inspector; but another inspector, as able, denied its principle, and contended that the reduction would not be more than about 2 per cent.—Mr. FIELDEN advocated the same cause. The opposition to it, he said, was Mammon against mercy. You were destroying the race of your people, and bringing up a class of beings whom, by and by, you would not be able to govern; for the old English habits, the domestic feelings, the relations of parents and children, were being destroyed. Even ten hours was too long a time; he was for still fewer. Things went on as they now were, machinery, instead of a blessing, would be a curse.—Sir R. PEEL claimed credit to the Government for disinterestedness in the course now taken by them. They had proposed the existing term of labour, excluding protection to females and young persons; while the opposite suggestion was for ten hours to females and young persons, which, it was admitted, would produce a limitation of ten hours to adult males also. The general value of last year's exports in our principal manufactures was £44,000,000, and £35,000,000 of these were of the classes which the proposed reduction would go to affect. It had been said that the reduction of time was for still fewer hours than were now worked, but that rise of prices on your produce would be just so much advantage to the foreign competitor, his competition would bring your prices down again, and with them your wages would come down. If he thought that the effect of the proposal would be to increase the comforts of the working people, he should be favourable to it; but he could not anticipate such a result. He was told to disregard consumers in a question of humanity, but he felt himself bound to regard consumers by reason of the way in which humanity was affected by it. He could not forget the sufferings of 15,000 people at Paisley in 1842, from the depression of commerce. When times were bad, the manufacturer was expected to keep his people at work, though at low wages to them, and perhaps at a loss to him; when a demand revived, and there was a chance, both for master and labourer to fetch up the loss which they had incurred, your law would interpose and forbid them from redeeming themselves. It was a mistake to suppose that a day's labour lasted longer in factory employment than in employments of other kinds. But the evils affecting labour elsewhere were said to form no reason against relieving labour in factories. Yes; because if the Legislature interfered as to one employment and left another free, a premium, an unequal advantage, was given upon the latter. He then enumerated several kinds of labour performed elsewhere than in factories, and described some appalling hardships in each. If, indeed, this proposal were intended but as the commencement of legislation against all hardships and for all labour, he could understand it; but it was not just to interfere with labour of one kind unless you could regulate labour of all kinds, especially sanitary and domestic labour included, which was beyond the reach of any human legislation. And believing that the measure of the Government —the limitation to 12 hours—was all that could be safely effected, he could not, and he would not, however his feelings might tempt him, consent to the proposition of the noble lord.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL said, that on a subject involving the interests of myriads of the people, he should be ashamed to be influenced by any fear of being charged with inconsistency. Lord Ashley's speech had convinced him; but those of other gentlemen, practically acquainted with the subject, had done much to clear the way. Sir Robert Peel's argument went too far: it went to show the unfitness of any legislation. If a restriction were necessary for the physical and moral health of women and young persons, it was no sufficient objection to that restrict n that its effect would be to restrict also the labour of adult males; the principle of restriction, if once adopted, ought to be followed out in a manner effectual for the health of its objects. He had been much struck with the fact that masters, practical men, were petitioning for a ten hours' bill. After all, however, the best mode of referring the matter to people would be to remove the laws which excluded their food. He would vote for the motion of Lord Ashley.—Mr. HINDLEY followed in favour of Lord Ashley's motion. He spoke as a practical man, not afraid of the consequences of the proposed limitation. The hon. member spoke at some length, but his voice was drowned by the impatience of the house, who always resent, as intrusive and misplaced, an attempt to force on unnecessary speech upon them after the leaders have wound up the debate.—Mr. COLLETT disapproved all legislation between employers and their workpeople.—Mr. HARDY supported the ten-hour principle, amid a storm of impatient displeasure. Mr. MUNTZ spoke to the same effect; objecting, however, to the whole bill. Lord ASHLEY said a few words; and the house divided—

For the amendment (10 hours)	179
For the original clause (10 hours)	170
Majority against Government	9

On our return to the gallery we found the committee again dividing on an amendment moved by Mr. Collett during the exclusion of strangers, for the substitution of the words "six o'clock" for "eight o'clock," which would have the effect of reversing the decision just made by the Committee. The numbers were—

For Mr. Collett's amendment	183
For Lord Ashley's amendment	191
Majority	8

Sir JAMES GRAHAM said, notwithstanding his respect for the decision of the Committee, he had a perfect objection to a ten-hours' bill. He therefore thought it right to state that it was not the intention of the Government to abandon the bill at its present stage. He also gave his noble friend (Lord Ashley) notice that it was the intention of Government, on the 8th clause, to move the substitution of the words "twelve hours" for "ten hours," when he would again take the sense of the Committee on that point; and would now state that the Chairman's report progress, and ask leave to sit again on Friday.—Lord JOHN RUSSELL expressed a hope that the noble lord opposite would take an opportunity of stating the manner in which he intended to introduce a ten-hours bill.

The House then resumed.

The committee on the POOR LAW AMENDMENT BILL was postponed.

The Sunday Trading Bill was read a third time and passed.

The remaining orders and some routine business were disposed of.

Lord ELIOT gave notice that, on Thursday the 28th inst., he should move for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the laws regulating the qualifications of county electors in Ireland; also to amend that part of the 3d and 4th Victoria (the Irish Municipal Reform Bill) relating to the elective qualifications of burgesses in towns and cities.

The House adjourned at a quarter before two,

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The house met at the usual hour.

The Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities Bills were read a third time and passed, and after sitting a few minutes their lordships adjourned to Thursday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

Mr. GILL gave notice that, on Friday, he would call the attention of the house to the circumstances of the arrest of Capt. Brewster, of the 76th Regiment, in July last.

Mr. HUME gave notice, for an early day after Easter, to move an address to her Majesty, to abolish the Lord Lieutenancy of Ireland.

Mr. BOSTHWICK gave notice, for the 2nd of April, to move an address to the Queen, praying that her Majesty might be graciously pleased to grant to Parliament the aid and advice in ecclesiastical matters of the bishops and clergy of the Church in convocation assembled, according to the ancient constitutional practice of the realm.

Sir R. PEEL gave notice that, on Thursday, he would move the appointment of a select committee to inquire and report whether it would be desirable to make any alteration in the law for the trial of election petitions.

Lord ASHLEY stated the course he intended to pursue consequent upon the late majority in favour of his ten hours' restriction on factory labour, viz.:—On Friday he should take the liberty of entreating the house to affirm the proposition of ten hours' labour, by the substitution of the word "ten" for "twelve" in clause 8 of the bill. Should the house affirm that proposition, he would prepare a clause which should enact that the present duration of labour, 12 hours, should continue from the time at which they might pass the clause for six months, till the 1st of October in this year. This would give six months' notice to any change took place. From the 1st of October, this year, the period of labour he proposed would fall down to eleven hours, and continue at that rate for two years, or till the 12th of October, 1846, when the period of ten hours' labour would commence.—Sir JAMES GRAHAM immediately rose and said, that it was most desirable that the house and the country should understand that he and her Majesty's ministers had now heard, for the first time, the precise nature of the propositions which the noble lord had expressed his intention of submitting to the committee, but he (Sir James Graham) required no time for deliberation in coming to the conclusion that it would be his duty to resist the motion of the noble lord, and take the sense of the house upon the proposition of substituting "ten" hours for "twelve." He might be permitted to add, with respect to the scope of the further propositions which the noble lord contemplated making, that should the noble lord succeed in carrying them, as he had his other proposal the preceding night, the scope of those propositions could not remove the objection which he (Sir James Graham) had urged against their predecessor, and it would be his duty to resist to the utmost the noble lord's motion.

In reply to Captain ROSS, Sir R. PEEL stated that the report which had obtained circulation, that her Majesty intended to go to Berlin this autumn, on a visit to the King of Prussia, was entirely without foundation.

In reply to Mr. O'Ferrall, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that a bill on the subject of the Common Law Courts in Ireland would be introduced shortly after Easter.

Mr. RICARDO moved an address to the Crown, praying that the principle of reciprocity might not be enacted on in our commercial negotiations, nor in the regulation of our customs' duties. He dwelt on the inutility of all our recent commercial diplomacy, and contended that our objects might be attained as effectually by judicious legislation, with respect to our imports, as by clamorous negotiations, with respect to our exports. He hoped that Sir R. Peel would not force the people to continue a sacrifice injurious to themselves, in the expectation that other states might give them for nothing upon the EWART seconded the motion. He apprehended that nothing was to be expected from foreign Powers; but believed that the English mind was made up on the subject, and that the time was come when Government must adopt the principle now recommended.—Mr. GLADSTONE treated the principle as far too broad and sweeping. He relied on the disunet on, now don ed by his opponents, between duties for revenue, and duties for protection. Unless it were wholly impossible that there should ever be an advantageous commercial treaty, it was unwise to fetter the Government by an abstract unbending declaration. He suggested instances in which the proposition now before the house would be inconvenient and injurious. Lord HOWICK regretted it as a practical and not an abstract proposition. But the word "abstract," in the Government sense of it, seemed to mean what was right in itself, but inconvenient in regard to some local interests too strong to be contravened by Ministers. They appeared not to have quite shaken off the old mercantile theory, that the only valuable trade of a country consisted in her exports, whereas, in truth, her imports, the articles consumed by her people, formed the most advantageous part of her commerce. If you had wholly rejected the system for negotiating for reciprocity, from 1815, when peace was established, you would not now have had such tariffs to hamper you. You ought now to consider at once, and without reference to foreign countries, the means of reducing your import duties; and if foreign countries should neglect to follow your example, their own commercial loss would be their punishment. Sir J. HANMER was sensible of the necessity for increasing the commerce of the country and the employment of the people; but he did not consider this proposa. as likely to effect those objects, nor was the constituency he represented at all favourable to the principle of it.—Mr. HUME supprested the advantage which would be derived to us from a reduction by foreign states of their duties upon our commodities; but he contended that whether or not they adm.tted our goods at a cheap rate, it was our interest to get their goods at the lowest price. Otherwise, in the intercourse between England, and any the most unimportant states upon the continent, for instance, Portugal, the continental Government, instead of the British, became the controller of the trade.]

At this point of the debate, there not being forty members present, the house was counted out

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The house did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

The railway business was forwarde..

On the motion of Sir T. FERNANDES, a new writ for the borough of Hastings, in the room of the Right Hon. Joseph Planta, who has accepted the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, was ordered to be issued.

In answer to a question from Mr. Turner, Mr. J. GRAHAM said that it was not the intention of Government to introduce any enactment which should prohibit interment in ancient churchyards, where, from generation to generation, families had fixed their burial places.

The County Coroners Bill was re-committed, and the fifth clause amended, after a division.

The Masters and Servants Bill was re-committed, and the three first clauses, with amendments, agreed to. On the fourth clause, upon the motion of Sir J. Graham, progress was reported.

The Night Poaching Bill was read a second time.

Adjourned at half-past seven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack at five o'clock.

The Lord CHANCELLOR rose to call the attention of the house to the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill, the second reading of which was fixed for that evening. He said the great object of the bill was to consolidate the Arches and the Prerogative Courts. Those courts were presided over by the same judge, they were attended by the same bar, they were held in the same hall, and they were, for all practical purposes, one and the same court. Could it, therefore, be doubted that the consolidation of those two courts would be beneficial to the public? He proposed to do the same thing with regard to the courts of the Archdeacon of York. With regard to Diocesan courts, although their extinction had been recommended by the Commissioners, he proposed to continue them, as their abuses might be otherwise remedied. He proposed to abolish altogether the Courts of Peculiars, of which there were 300 or 400 scattered over the country, and the system would then present this appearance. In every diocese there would be a tribunal for the granting of probates, and possessing contentious jurisdiction, and in York and in Canterbury there would be appellate tribunals; and if these courts were presided over by able judges, he could not see how any superior system could be established.—Lord COTTENHAM, who contended for the abolition of the Diocesan Courts, moved an amendment that the bill be read that day six months.—A long discussion ensued, which ended in the amendment being negatived without a division, and the bal was read a second time.

Their lordships then adjourned at nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—THURSDAY.

On the motion of Sir Thomas Fremantle, a new writ was ordered to issue for theborough of Christchurch, in the room of Sir George Rose.

Mr. WYSE presented a petition from the members of the Repeal Association of Ireland, praying for inquiry into the late State prosecutions in that country. The petition had received a larger number of signatures than any petition that had ever been presented to that house from Ireland. The petition was signed by 821,384 persons, and had been got up in the short space of three weeks. It alleged that means of every description were resorted to, during the prosecutions by the Attorney-General, to insure a conviction of the traversers. The charge of the judge was such as to impress upon the minds of the people of Ireland, and also of the world generally, that there had not been a fair trial in the case.—The petition was then borne up to the table by Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Wyse, Sir H. W. Barron, Mr. Blake, Colonel Rawdon, and Mr. Hodges. When the Speaker putting the motion that it be laid on the table, there was much laughter, for it seemed to require the united strength of all those hon. gentlemen to raise the ponderous mass of paper from the ground. On its way it had got double, it completely covered it, books, ink, and papers.—The petition was then read at length by the clerk at the table, and Mr. WYSE begged to move that the petition be printed as it was. (Cries of "Order," "Chair.")—The SPEAKER said the hon. member must sive notice of any motion on the subject. Mr. Wyse then gave notice that he would call the attention of the house to the subject of the petition on Monday next.

Mr. EWART then rose to move a resolution, of which he had given notice, respecting Import Duties, and was proceeding to address the house, when an hon. member moved that the house be counted, and there being only 38 members present, the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

The royal assent was given to-day at a quarter before five o'clock, to the Three-and-a-Half per Cents Annuity Reduction Bill; the Three-and-a-Half per Cent. (1818) Annuity Reduction Bill; the Consolidated Fund (£3,000,000) Bill; the Gaming Transactions Witness's Indemnity Bill, and the Teachers of Schools (Ireland) Bill. The Lords Commissioners were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, and the Duke of Buccleuch.

A conversation took place between the Earl of RADNOR and the Duke of BUCCLEUCH with regard to a speech made by Earl Fitzwilliam, in Yorkshire, on the subject of the Corn-laws, in which the noble Duke denied that the noble Earl had ever imputed to the Anti-Corn Law League any attempt to excite incendiarism

Their lordships shortly afterwards adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the Chair at the usual hour.

The following bills had a second time, namely, the Eastern Counties' Union Railway, the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway and Tyne Bridge Bill, the Pontop and South Shields Railway Bill and the Edinburgh, Leith, and Granton Railway Bill.

The Birmingham Canal Navigation Bill was read a third time and passed.

After a number of notices of motion, and several ministerial explanations with regard to various unimportant points of public interest, the house passed to the order of the day, when Lord ASHLEY proposed to bring the question at issue between him and the Government to a decision on the 8th clause, by proposing to substitute the words ten hours for twelve. The bill was addressed to the house at considerable length, but his arguments were merely a reiteration of those used in the former discussion. Mr. CLAY opposed the noble lord's amendment.

The principal speakers in favour of Lord Ashley's amendment were Mr. Milnes, Lord John Manners, Mr. Vernon Smith, Mr. Duncombe, Sir Robert Inglis, and Mr. Ward; while Sir Robert Peel and Sir James Graham supported Mr. Ward, and Sir James Graham. The Committee then divided, and two successive divisions took place before the gallery was opened. The most intelligible way of putting those divisions before our readers will be as follows :—

For Sir James Graham's Bill (the 12 hours)
Against it	183
For Lord Ashley's amendment (the 10 hours)	181
Against it	188
Majority	7

The house was then understood to defer the further consideration of the measure until Monday.—Lord ASHLEY expressed his determination to persist in his motions, and said, with God's blessing, he had no doubt he would prevail.

The other orders of the day having been disposed of, the house adjourned.

The general impression is that the proposition for an 11 hours bill will be carried.

IRELAND.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual weekly meeting of the Association was held on Monday at the Conciliation-hall; J. E. Dunne, Esq., in the chair. The Secretary, after reading the minutes of last day's proceedings, read the following letters from Mr. O'Connell:—"London, March 13, 1844. My dear Ray, I enclose you a communication from our patriotic friends in Newfoundland, covering their liberal remmittance in a bill for £50. Take care that due honour is paid to the subscribers, and especially to the office-bearers of the Repealers in that island. Newfoundland has behaved nobly. You cannot form the least idea of the transcendant scene at Covent-garden last night. There never was any thing so splendid. I never was so greeted, even in Ireland. This is indeed cheering, and shews that there is in England more of kind and generous feeling towards Ireland and the Irish, than has hitherto had an opportunity to display itself. Nothing can, or ought, to have a greater tendency to generate cordiality between the people of both countries than the occurrence in this country respecting the recent trial. This is a sentiment which we are bound to cultivate and encourage by all means in our power. I am glad to find the uninterrupted tranquility which pervades Ireland. It is delightful to perceive that the Irish people understand so well the doctrine of peace which I have so often and so long preached to them. All we want in addition is, perseverance. 'Peace and Perseverance,' and, depend upon it, we shall succeed more speedily than most people imagine. Yours, most sincerely, DANIEL O'CONNELL. To M. Ray, Esq."

The rent for the week, including £9341 from America, amounted to upwards of £600.

DINNER TO MR. O'CONNELL IN CORK.—Mr. O'Connell has been invited, and accepted an invitation to a great provincial dinner in Cork. The hon. gentleman has named Monday, the 8th of April, Easter Monday, for the banquet, and, according to the Southern Reporter, the necessary steps have been taken to render the demonstration as imposing and magnificent as possible

OPENING OF THE DUBLIN AND DROGHEDA RAILROAD.—An experimental trip was on Monday made to Drogheda by the directors of the railroad, accompanied by a select number of friends. The train started at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, from the bridge erected over the canal, and was expected to reach Drogheda (24 miles) in about an hour. On the return of the train, the directors were to partake of an elegant entertainment, at the residence of Mr. M'Neal, the engineer of the line.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.—QUALIFICATION OF IRISH GENTLEMEN.—This was an action which arose out of the Athlone races, in which Michael Kelly, Esq., of Myrehill, was plaintiff, and William James Young, Esq., Lieutenant of the 20th Regiment, was defendant. The action was brought for the recovery of a plate, value £65, won by plaintiff's horse Bacchus, at the races in that town, in September last, but which the defendant refused to pay plaintiff, in consequence of an objection made by one of the riders. Mr. Fitzgibbon, for plaintiff against Mr. Kelly, the rider of Bacchus, alleging his want of qualification, as a gentleman, to ride the race. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, for the amount of the plate, and 6l. costs. The Galway Vindicator says:—"It was proved by several gentlemen of the highest rank in the county, that they were always happy to meet Mr. Kelly in their society, as a man of the purest integrity; and yet, because Lady Clanricarde, Mrs. Laurence, Mrs. Blake, of Castlegrove, or Mrs. Lynch, of Moyneluil, do not come in their carriages, and leave their waiting cards for Mrs. Kelly, of Myrehill, Mr. Kelly is not qualified as a gentleman, nor ought he to look for his just debts. So argues Mr. Fitzgibbon, because he is descended from Con of the 100 Battles; but the idea was scouted in the nineteenth century. On the trial, one witness swore the present Lord Chancellor was no gentleman."

COACH ROBBERY OF ONE THOUSAND FIVE HUNDRED SOVEREIGNS.—On Monday evening intelligence was received in London of the above robbery. It had been sent from one of the banking-houses in the City to Messrs. Robinson, Thomson, and Co., of the Old Bank, Oxford. The coachman, Mr. Hobson, who is a highly respectable person, had placed at the Old Bank, Oxford, a wet sheet containing bankers' parcels to Oxford, which no doubt some of the swell mob were aware of. The box containing the gold was put in its accustomed place of safety in the coach, and the coach left London at the Old Bank, Oxford, at six, and was not to be found. It is supposed that the robbery was committed by a person who occupied the box seat, as, on arriving at Benson, he was seen to open the boot. During the delay of changing horses, and take something on. One of the passengers, who is also supposed to be a confederate, stopped at Benson, where he was taken into custody the same night by Lucas, the Oxford City Marshal. He has undergone a private examination before the magistrates, and is remanded. The box passenger kept his place to Oxford, and at that time, not being suspected any more than any of the other nine passengers, got off the coach, and has not since been heard of.

ALARMING FIRE AT HOXTON.—On Tuesday evening, shortly before six o'clock, an alarming fire broke out on the premises known as the Cooper's Arms, public-house, situate in Huntingstreet, Hoxton, and occupied by Mr. Peter Benton. A strong smell of fire in the upper part of the building caused some of the inmates to make the discovery. With all expedition an alarm was spread, which brought other assistance to the spot. The inmates and neighbours endeavoured, but in vain, to extinguish the flames, for, owing to the strong hold they had obtained, they spread with surprising rapidity. The parish engine was soon on the spot, followed by another belonging to the neighbourhood. An immediate supply of water being obtained, the engines were set to work, and they poured a great torrent of water upon the flames, but some time elapsed before their fury was abated. At length, owing to the most unabated exertions of the firemen, they succeeded in getting the fire completely out, not however before the two upper floors were burnt out, the roof partly off, and the premises in a most extensive state of damage by water and removal. The fire originated from a jet of gas flying out of the fire amongst the furniture in the room. Mr. Benton was insured in the ALBION FIRE office

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—An awful instance of the uncertainty of human life occurred on Tuesday morning to Mr. H. Page, of No. 35, Clerkenwell-close. It appears that the deceased, who was a highly respectable inhabitant of Clerkenwell, was carrying on business in the city, left home in good health on Monday, with the intention of spending the evening with a few convivial friends, and his wife having set up in expectation of his return till a late hour of the morning, went to rest, and on coming down stairs in the morning was thunderstruck at finding her husband in the parlour a corpse! Medical aid was immediately called in, but all efforts to restore animation proved unavailing.

STOCKHOLM.

The annexed view of the capital of Sweden, is an appropriate accompaniment to the portrait of the deceased monarch in our first page. The city lies, in a straight line, at about twenty-four miles from the sea, on the channel by which the Lake Malaren discharges its waters into the Baltic. It is built partly on the continent and partly on nine islands formed by the above channel.

The Staden, or Stockholm, occupies the centre of the town, and contains several fine public and private buildings; of which the Royal Palace has great architectural merit; before the court-yard, near the banks of the channel, is the colossal bronze statue of Gustavus III.; and, in its vicinity, along the eastern shore, is the proper harbour of the city, in which the largest vessels find excellent anchorage. This portion is shown in our view, the building to the left being the Admiralty. Further to the west is the cathedral, or St. Nicolai Church, in which the Kings of Sweden are crowned.

In the northern division, built upon an island, and joined to the Staden by a long bridge of boats, is the great depôt of iron, whence it is shipped to all quarters of the globe. The northern division is, however, much greater than the southern; and has several fine streets and squares, and is connected by a well-built bridge with the Staden. Here, too, are a fine bronze statue of Gustavus Adolphus, the spacious Opera-house, and several fine churches, &c. Probably the capital in Europe, except Constantinople, can be compared to Stockholm as to the beauty of its environs, where are several country seats and a Zoological Garden of great extent. Stockholm is the seat of government, and generally, also, the place where the legislative bodies meet. It has its academies and other public societies; and it has a greater number of charitable institutions than any other city in Europe of equal size. The population in 1839 was 83,885 persons. Stockholm is the most industrious and commercial town in Sweden. The manufactures, however, are not considerable; and large quantities of foreign manufactures, especially English, are annually imported.

This winter the cold at Stockholm has been intense. Thus, within the present month, the thermometer (Reaumur) marked 20 degrees (45 of Fahrenheit) below the freezing point.

EXPEDITION AGAINST TUNIS BY THE KING OF SARDINIA.

The Bey of Tunis having violated his treaties with the King of Sardinia, and refused due reparation, the latter monarch is preparing an expedition against the Tunisian territory. The French Ministry, it is said, has offered its mediation, which the cabinet of Turin has refused; the King, Charles Albert, preferring to bring the affair to a satisfactory conclusion, without the interference of any one. The Porte, on its side, is inclined to oppose the reprisals which the King is justly entitled to take. It remembers the expedition against Algiers, and is afraid that another power may in its turn act a leading in the States of Barbary. To the protest of the Porte, Charles Albert reasonably replies—"If you are the sovereign lords of Tunis, compel the Bey to grant me ample satisfaction; but if you have no real power over him—if your sovereignty is only nominal, let me settle my accounts with the sole and true government of the country." The probable issue of this quarrel is, that Sardinia will gain the satisfaction that it demands—that if justice is not done voluntarily, it will be obtained by force; and we can very well believe that the King will willingly seize the opportunity for displaying the goodness of his army. He has a peace establishment of 40,000 soldiers, with a reserve of 60,000 trained men, in case of war. His army is perfectly well organised, the King personally superintending its instruction. In case of need, 10,000 good troops, with excellent artillery, may be landed on the coast of Carthage, the only easily accessible point; and, truly, it would suffice to make a descent there to bring at once the Bey and his army to reason. This army amounts to about 15,000 men; but, with the exception of the guard, the infantry is detestable; the cavalry is tolerably good, and there is a regiment of artillery, formed upon the European system, but far from possessing the skill and science of our troops. The goletta is sufficiently fortified to defend Tunis on that side; but the city itself has only a double circle of weak walls, supported by a few old fortifications, inadequate to resist a serious attack from a European army.

Tunis lies in the centre of the northern coast of Africa: it is bounded on the north and east by the Mediterranean Sea, on the west by the territory of Constantina, and on the south by the Beleleb-Jerid, or "the country of palm-trees." Its greatest extent from north to south is about 300 miles, while its breadth from east to west varies from 65 to 140 miles. The average width may be about 1000 miles, so that the area of Tunis will be 30,000 square miles, or about 3000 square miles more than that of Ireland.

Our engraving shows the capital, a large city and port, situated in a beautful plain, bounded, at thirty miles distance, by an amphitheatre of high mountains. It stands on the western side of an oval lagoon, which by the goletta (or little throat), defended by a castle, opens into the extensive Bay and Gulf of Tunis.

CITY OF TUNIS.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XI.

LORD CAMPBELL.

The individual whose portrait accompanies this article is one of the most remarkable instances of the triumph of industry and perseverance. The son of a respectable Scotch parson, at a very early period he determined to try his fortunes in England. Recommended to the patronage of the late Mr. Perry, of the Morning Chronicle, he was employed in industrious to eke out by his laborious pursuits of Parliamentary reporting the stipend he derived from his family. While his evenings were devoted to the labours of the press, his morning empowers but was absorbed in the steady pursuit of his profession as a barrister, under the tuition of the celebrated Mr Tidd, the author of "Tidd's Practice." When called to the bar he immediately devoted himself to the reporting of the legal judgments of Lord Ellenborough, in the Times. It was the peculiarity of that eminent judge that his legal decisions were upheld by his brethren in Bank, and at the present day these judgments, illustrated by the notes of his reporter, hold their position as legal authorities equivalent to the judicial decisions of the Bench itself.

Mr. Campbell having passed through the probation of early drudgery as a chamber lawyer, at length arrived at the distinguished position of leading junior on the Oxford Circuit and also at Nisi Prius, in London. By an easy transfer he advanced to the leadership of both departments. About the year 1821, he married the daughter of Lord Abinger, a lady of singular accomplishments and elegance. On the retirement of Sir William Horne from the Attorney-Generalship, he became Solicitor-General. During seven years he was leader of the Queen's Bench as well as Attorney-General, in the receipt of an enormous professional income. His defence of Lord Melbourne raised him as an advocate to the highest position, while his masterly argument in the case of "Stockdale and Hansard" confirmed the opinion of all professional men as to his eminent superiority in forensic argumentation. On the retirement of Lord Plunket from the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland, he was appointed his successor. The early dissolution of the Whig Ministry did not allow the development of his powers in this new department to which he had been elevated. But, although now dissassociated from professional life, he still devotes his energies most efficiently as a judge in the House of Lords, and also in the Committee of the Privy Council; and Westminster Hall awards to him the praise of an eminent lawyer and most distinguished judge.

His lordship's position in the House of Lords is a perfect type of the industry and perseverance which distinguished him at the bar. His strong good sense, identified with the advocacy of liberal principles, has ever given a tone to his mind as a legal reformer. It is true, that in the finesse of oratorical display he does not pretend to compete with the eminence of Lord Brougham, but those who have observed his gladiatorial displays against his learned brother, while they concede to the latter the praise of practised dexterity, must accord to the more modern "newfangled" peer, the distinction of sound judgment, which defeats sophistry and brings eloquence and inflation to the searching task of plain good sense. We need only allude to a recent rencontre between their lordships, to arrive at an accurate conclusion as to their different faculties. While the ex-lord Chancellor of England deals in parenthetic self laudation, it is plain he winces under the home thrusts of his less eloquent antagonist; and the very composure which he has evinced, while it displays his own sensitiveness, developes more fully the condensed severity of the subject of our memoir. In a word, the middle classes of society in this country may derive from the example of the noble lord another incentive to honourable industry; and another proof that independence of mind and steadiness of purpose open a path to the highest honours of the State.

NOOKS AND CORNERS OF OLD ENGLAND.

SUDELEY CASTLE.

This interesting specimen of middle-age art was built in a style of uncommon magnificence by Ralph, Lord Boteler, in the time of Henry VI. It was garrisoned for Charles I. during the great civil war, and is now a picturesque ruin. Sudeley Castle lies about a quarter of a mile from Winchcomb, and seven miles from Cheltenham. It is now in possession of John and William Dent, Esquires, of Worcester, who purchased it of the Duke of Buckingham. To the lovers of antiquity, it will be gratifying to hear that the castle, so fine a relic of the olden time, is now receiving the proprietors' proper attention. Such judicious reparations are in progress as are calculated to check further decay, and to give the best effect to the remains. The interior of the castle will once more assume its wonted grandeur; the walls will shortly be lined with a collection of ancient tapestries and pictures, valuable as works of art, but still more as memorials of some of the most distinguished historical personages connected with the castle. The dismantled chapel, which is deservedly admired for the harmony of its proportions, is a splendid specimen of later style of English architecture. The graceful exterior of the chapel combines lightness and elegance, not common in structures of the same extent. In this chapel formerly reposed the remains of Queen Katherine Parr, the wife of Henry VIII. At the commencement of the seventeenth century, the royal remains were exhumed by a body of lawless beings who lived in part of the castle; they were, however, collected on the same spot; and in the year 1820, another examination took place, when nothing then remained in the coffin but a confused heap of bones, and a small portion of the hair adhering to fragments of the cere-cloth, under the skull; some of the leading gentlemen of Winchcomb afterwards caused the remains to be removed to an excellent stone vault, in which are deposited some of the Chandos family.

The folowing stanzas, relative to this castle, feelingly and faithfully describe the beauties that linger round this decayed pile:—

I gaze where Sudeley's venerable pile,
Majestic in its ruins, o'er me lowers;
The worm now crawls through each untrodden aisle,
And the bat hides within its time-worn towers.
It was not thus, when in the olden time,
The lowly inmates of yon broken wall,
Lived free from woes that spring from care or crime,
Those shackles which the grosser world enthrall.
Then, while the setting sunbeams glistened o'er
The earth, arose to Heaven the vesper song;
But now the sacred song is heard no more—
No music floats the dreary aisles along;
Ne'er from its chancel soars the midnight prayer;
The stillness broken by no earthly thing,
Save when the night-bird wakes the echoes there,
Or the bat flutters its unfeather'd wing.

SUDELEY CASTLE.

MR. O'CONNELL AT COVENTRY.

On Monday a meeting was held in St. Mary's Hall, Coventry, "to consider the grievances of Ireland." Mr. O'Connell was present, having been invited to take part in the proceedings. Mr. Whittem, the Mayor, was in the chair. The novelty of the occasion caused a great number of people to assemble; the consequence was, that some of the barriers were broken down from the pressure made against them, and several individuals were more or less injured. A cry was raised to adjourn the meeting to the open air, but the Mayor refused to comply. Uproar of a most furious kind succeeded, and not a word could be heard. At length the Mayor stood up, and in angry tones exclaimed, "I shall not adjourn this meeting. I know the authors of this disturbance individually, and I will not submit to be bullied by such beastly and unmanly interruption." The uproar was renewed, which, after some time, gradually subsided, and the speechification commenced. A Unitarian preacher moved the first resolution, and a Trinitarian preacher moved the second resolution. Mr. O'Connell was, of course, the lion of the evening, and spoke at great length, upon the "grievances" under which Ireland has so long suffered. The resolutions were carried, and the meeting broke up.

The engraving, from a sketch by a correspondent, shows Mr. O'Connell's entry into St. Mary's Hall, with a glimpse of the architectural antiquity of the city. St. Mary's Hall, erected in the reign of Henry VI., is one of the richest and most interesting vestiges of the architecture of the 15th century in Coventry, and perhaps in England. In the sketch is seen the great painted window facing the street; and, seen from the interior of the hall, this grand feature, with the grotesquely carved oaken roof, the minstrels' gallery, &c., furnish a vivid idea of the manners of the age in which Coventry was the favourite resort of princes.

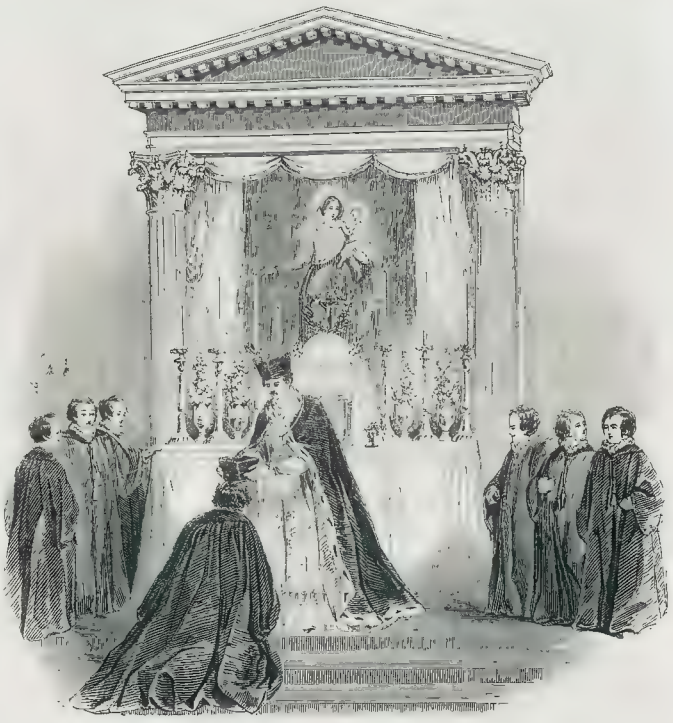
Our correspondent states that several hundreds of persons obtained but a glance of Mr. O'Connell on his way from the railway station to the Hall. A few minutes after this vast apartment was opened, the gallery was filled by ladies, to whom it was appropriated, and who manifested great interest in the day's proceedings.

THE ORDER OF ST. JOSEPH AND MARY—INVESTITURE OF MR. O'CONNELL, M.P.

The above engraving represents the interior of the Roman Catholic Chapel, in Ratcliffe Highway, on the occasion of the investiture of Mr. O'Connell, on Sunday last, into one of the many religious orders belonging to, and sanctioned by, the Roman Catholic Church, which the laity are permitted to embrace.

CARD OF THE BROTHERHOOD.

There were present about [illegible] members of the Order, the women being habited in green dresses, with sashes and white Legiorn bonnets; the men in green cloaks, trimmed with fur, white collars, and caps, similar to those worn at the Universities. The chapel was decorated with artificial flowers, and on the altar were wreaths of shamrock. On the altar was also placed a card of membership (subsequently presented to Mr O'Connell), on which was a representation of the Holy Family. The card was elegantly framed, and was mounted with gold. The officiating priests, Messrs. Moore and Foley, entered the chapel, accompanied by Mr. O'Connell. Vespers having been said, Mr. Moore explained at some length the origin of the "orders," or "guilds," after which Mr. O'Connell proceeded to the altar, on the steps of which he knelt, when the investiture commenced. Mr. Moore placed across his shoulders a magnificent green silk cloak, lined with white silk, and trimmed with rich ermine. He also presented him with a solid gold cross, and placed on his head a Genoa velvet cap. Some devotional exercises having been performed, the congregation dispersed. Mr. O'Connell, on taking his departure, was again loudly cheered.



INVESTITURE OF MR. O'CONNELL WITH THE HOLY ORDER OF THE GUILD OF ST. JOSEPH AND MARY, VIRGINIA-STREET CHAPEL, RATCLIFFE HIGHWAY.

Immediately after Mr. O'Connell's inauguration, the congregation repaired to the Roman Catholic school-rooms, in Love-lane, Shadwell, for the purpose of presenting a memorial to the honourable member on becoming one of the brotherhood. The male and female members of the society still retained the habiliments they wore during the ceremony in the chapel, and walked in procession to the place of meeting. The assemblage was immense, and it was considered that not less than 5000 or 6000 persons were congregated. Mr. O'Connell arrived shortly after nine o'clock in a coach and four, and on his presenting himself on the platform, he was met by the most enthusiastic cheering. He was attired in the uniform of the Holy Guild, as also was Father Moore, the chaplain, and other officials. On silence being somewhat obtained, the latter, who officiated as chairman, addressed the meeting, and observed that he had the pleasing duty of reading an address to the illustrious personage who had that day become one of the members of the Holy Guild, agreed to by the brethren and sisterhood of that Society, congratulating him on becoming one amongst them. (Cheers.) The reverend gentleman then read it, and at its conclusion the most enthusiastic cheering took place.

Mr. O'Connell, M.P., then presented himself, and for several minutes was unable to proceed, in consequence of the applause. He then addressed the meeting with great fervency and at considerable length on the events with which his name has lately been so much connected, and concluded by an expression of his thanks for the kindness shown him that day.

A procession then formed, and the honourable member having divested himself of his robes, was ushered to his carriage, and drove off. Thousands of persons lined the road of Shadwell and Ratcliffe-highway, who cheered him most vociferously as he passed along.

The meeting afterwards quietly dispersed, after giving three cheers for Repeal.

THE ACHILL COLONY.

The small island of Achill has of late been a spot of more than usual interest in consequence of a reported attempt made to burn the Protestant missionary settlement there, under the superintendence of the Rev. Edward Nangle. The accused parties were indicted at the Mayo assizes, on the 12th instant, for "a conspiracy" to burn the Achill colony, and the house of Mr. Nangle. The jury ignored the bills, but, somewhat strangely, upon the evidence of the same party whom they disbelieved in that case, found true bills against the traversers for administering an unlawful oath. The only witness examined, deposed that on the night of December 1, a number of persons came to his father's house, in Downikelly, in Achill, and pushed in the door, which was neither bolted nor barred. All the family were in bed. The traversers came to his bedside, and asked him to get up and go with them to exercise and march among the neighbours. He refused to go, and told them to go away, which they did. On the 6th of December he met the traversers, when one presented a book to him, and asked him to swear to be his friend. He said the other persons present had been previously all sworn. Witness asked were they sworn. They said they were, and that they intended to march to the Achill colony and burn it, and the house of the Rev.

VIEW IN ACHILL.

Edward Nangle and his property. They said they would get ladders, and get in at the top rooms of the houses. Witness said he would not go, and desired them not to go, as they would be killed. The applicant then said to witness, "Take your oath never to say a word of what has occurred." Witness took the oath upon a book. The other traversers were present. We have not room for the entire report of the trial, which terminated in eleven jurors being for an acquittal, and one for a contrary verdict. They were ordered back to the jury-room, and not having agreed at the rising of the court, they were discharged by consent. The traversers were then liberated on bail, not to appear again unless on ten days' notice from the crown.

The island of Achill is washed by the Atlantic Ocean, and situated in the County Mayo. It is a wild and primitive district, and its inhabitants are as rude as its rocky shore. Druidic antiquities exist within its verge; and rude villages that, from an absence of anything like modern comfort or even knowledge of construction, might not disgrace Druidic times. Travellers who write of Indian villages or Hottentot kraals, and picture them as far removed from our own refinements, would scarcely imagine that in the kingdom of Great Britain, within two days' journey of Dublin, one of its capital cities, villages exist as rude in every particular and as wretchedly provided with necessaries. Keem and Doosgh (the latter picture in our view) are composed of groups of huts that do not seem at all to belong to a civilized land. Strewn about the rocks, which are here and there barren, not a tree being seen on the island, or placed on the flat sands or arid plain in close clusters, they give a precise idea of an African village. In construction they are rude, indeed, many without window or chimney, the walls built up with large stones rounded at the angles by the tide, and merely laid upon each other, without any other cement than the seasand that is wedged between the two layers of stones forming the inner and the outer walls, which are about six feet in height. A few sticks placed across, or rushes in like fashion, support the thatch of the roof, which is held on in these bleak and exposed situations by bay-bands, which lace over each other, and have hanging to them weighty stones, as a necessary hold against wind. The chimnies, where they exist, are mere holes in the roof, with a square frame of basket-work thrust in as a funnel for the smoke; and in these wretched dwellings the poor inhabitants live and sleep with pigs, poultry, or cattle, and glad to be admitted to enjoy such fellow-lodgers. A little dried turf forms the bed, and should a chair or table be wanted they are rudely fashioned out of any timber at command by the cottager. Some few hovels worse than these even may be found in the island. The writer of this paper saw one, the three sides of which were formed by digging into a bank, and the fourth by heaps of sod; the roof, not three feet high and level with the field, was covered with dry grass, supported on poles laid across the hole which formed "the house;" a bar of turf was formed close to the door, the smoke from which rolled forth in volumes. A bed of turf, with a single ragged blanket, a "kish," or basket, with a few potatoes, and a wooden vessel with milk furnished the interior; and never will the writer forget the eager hospitality of the squalid mother, who with her three half-naked children inhabited this place, as she placed this milk before him as the only return for the sympathy shown her in her power to offer.

The manners of the people here are very primitive. Their fishing-boats, or corachs, are made by themselves; a framework of timber lightly framed, over which skins are tightly stretched, complete the bark in which they fearlessly put to sea to fish. It is exceedingly light and buoyant, and is more difficult to endamage than many a boat of better fashion and finish.

Living as these poor people do far away from towns of importance, in a wild district, with no direct market and no dependence except on a little garden of potatoes, they are always but one degree above starvation. A failure in their crops at once produces this, and famine overtakes them. Brought up from childhood amid such misery, their eyes seem shut and senses callous to it; and the extraordinary apathy and want of energy of the people themselves, which to a stranger is perfectly unaccountable, explains much of this misery. In the Protestant colony, superintended by the Reverend Edward Nangle, reigns a comfort unknown to the other inhabitants, and which it is to be hoped will some day extend over the whole district; for the existence of such wretchedness, in a kingdom whose exertions are so constantly directed to the checks and wants of all classes of foreigners, however remote, is a national contradiction and disgrace.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1844.

THE remand of the political events of the week need be but a brief one. The leading event has of course been the majority obtained—somewhat unexpectedly, we believe—by Lord Ashley, in opposition to the Government, on an amendment to the second clause of the Factory Bill, which now enacts that the hours of labour in factories shall be ten hours a day instead of twelve. The question has been for some years in agitation, but hitherto without success; whether the present victory of the humane over the expedient and the practical, will be anything more than a temporary one, requires more time to prove.

The division list certainly exhibits some strange conjunctions; names are coupled in it whose owners must be somewhat surprised at finding themselves in such company. There seems, for the time, to have been a partial break up of the two great sections of political party; some of the oldest supporters of the Premier abandoned him, while, on the other hand, he gained allies he could have little expected. We confess we do not dislike a little "smash" of this kind now and then; it teaches Governments that there are other considerations abroad than those of cold expediency, and awakens them to an appreciation of the one note so rarely heard through the discords of politics, "the still, sad music of humanity."

We do not anticipate anything from the vote of Monday night that will much affect the stability of the Government; it may, as yet, "laugh a siege to scorn;" but still it had better, as a matter of prudence, avoid such divisions if it can. It was beginning to be remarked that the majority had lately pulled better together than during the last session; and now comes this break up of old bonds and partialities, as if in rebuke of the pride of political observation. We have offered some remarks on the general question in another place; here we treat it but as one of the Parliamentary events of the week, and, consequently, do not enter into the graver considerations involved. It will not break up the Government; that may be looked on as certain; the mixture of parties upon it is a proof that it is not a purely party question, on which alone majorities triumph, and ministers retire. The moment the decision was declared, the Government announced its intention of opposing the proposition by every possible means; since then Lord Ashley, who we are not quite certain was not something puzzled, at first, what to do with his victory, has proposed that the reduction from the twelve hours to ten shall be gradual, extending over two years, the full benefit of the ten hours' clause not accruing to the poor operative till the 12th of October, 1846. This is in the nature of a compromise with practicability. But it has not lessened the dislike of the Government to the success of a proposal that is not their own. The eighth clause is now the battle ground, and as there will be a diligent application of the "whip" on the Ministerial side, it is not at all improbable that the small majority of nine on Monday night may be converted into a positive minority. But should the Government succeed in rescinding the vote of the committee, one thing is certain, that the brief glimpse of legislative favour, so unexpectedly given, and so suddenly withdrawn, will have a bad effect on the manufacturing population.

THE struggle in Spain does not improve in its character; inhumanity and vindictiveness are more rife than ever; the rulers of the day seem less to study political security than personal revenge; the sword of the soldier is dimmed by domestic massacre, and the robe of the statesman is stained with blood. Each succeeding piece of intelligence from that country is more repulsive and disgraceful than the other. The latest atrocity is the execution of Bonet and twenty-three other officers by Roncali, who happened to be the ruler of the hour at Alicant, the garrison of which place held out against him. He succeeded in getting the commander and his companions into his power, and they were mercilessly butchered, for to call the proceeding a legal one would be a mere abuse of terms. Who can say that in the present condition of Spain any man can be guilty of treason by holding out or yielding up a place that may be intrusted to him? By remaining faithful to the rulers de jure, he may offend the rulers de facto, so that loyalty, or what is thought to be such, may there bring a man to a bloody grave, as well as treason. It is strange that Spain, "romantic Spain," as the novelists call her, should in all her struggles for the last twenty years have produced not one man whose mind or heart were above those of the common herd—no name that stands out from the mass of men-slayers, the mere swordsmen who show their existence by some deed of detestable atrocity, and then sink again into the obscurity from which they had better not have emerged. We may endeavour to negotiate and interfere to procure Spain what is called a Free Constitution, but every attempt will fail, for the people are incapable of understanding such a thing, at which we may feel regret, but scarcely surprise. The curse of the despotism of the old Bourbon race is still upon them. Their Constitution, as it stands on paper, is as free, or more so, than that of any country in Europe; but the ruling power is the sword, and that power, bad as it is, is wielded with a want of talent and vigour that makes it ineffective, except for occasional butchery. With all his crimes and oppressions, Spain may almost pray for the advent of another Napoleon; it seems to have arrived at that crisis of its history that admits of no other hope for peace. Too truly does the question of the poet apply to Spain:—

> Can tyrants but by tyrants conquered be,
> And Freedom find no champion and no child
> Such as Columbia saw arise, when she > Sprang forth a Pallas, arm'd and undefiled?
> Or must such minds be nourished in the wild
> Deep in the unpeopled forest, 'midst the roar
> Of cataracts, where nursing Nature smiled
> On infant Washington? Has Earth no more
> Such seeds within her breast, or Europe no such shore?

We are sorry to perceive that the accounts from New South Wales, and from New Zealand, continue to be discouraging. In the former commercial embarrassment may be said to be at its height—or, rather, depth; there is nothing but failures and bankruptcies; the effect of this, of course extends to all classes. The difficulties of New Zealand are aggravated by its infant state, which makes it less able to resist a shock, and by the unhappy differences that seem to have arisen with the natives as to the occupation of the lands. We should like to see the experiment of colonization succeed in those islands; it was almost the only plan by which it was attempted to proportion the supply of labour to the amount of capital; it was a plan which, when broached, was received with general favour, as it seemed founded on intelligible principles. The failure of such a scheme breaks the faith of men in all plans, however elaborate, and there is a disposition to return to the old system of chance and luck, by which the old settlements of America—now an independent state—were founded. But the early difficulties were fearful, as the history of colonization would show. We do not like to despair of seeing a system of colonization formed by which the difficulties that are unavoidable at the outset of all such undertakings may be obviated, and for that reason should wish the next accounts from New Zealand to be of a more cheering description than the last.

THE despotisms that are undisturbed by petitions or agitations, by reason of their having the power to nip agitators in the bud by consigning them to a dark cell in a fortress prison, finds time to turn its attention to many matters that a Prime Minister of England never dreams of interfering with. The Minister of the Interior of the Emperor of Austria, is at present interesting himself about the "insufficient remuneration" of "authors of successful dramatic pieces." As original dramatic writing is nearly extinct in England, our highest flight at present being the translation of French farces—stealing, in fact, and often so clumsily that we spoil what we steal—the following paragraph has not so much interest as it would were original talent flourishing: still it is worth noticing, were it only for the ingenious application of the principle of the sliding scale:—

> The Emperor of Austria, upon the recommendation of Count Kolowrath, his Minister of the Interior, representing that the authors of successful dramatic pieces were not sufficiently remunerated, has issued an ordinance, whereby he commands the director of the theatre of the palace, the only one that is equalised by the government, to allow to all authors of original national pieces 10 per cent. upon such as fill up the whole evening, and 6 per cent. upon such as last two-thirds of the evening, and 2 per cent upon those of shorter duration. That this measure may not be considered too absolute, it is not directly imposed upon the other theatres of the empire, but the minister has sent a circular letter to them all, recommending its adoption.

There is something like a premium here on mere length, rather than an encouragement to originality. That a piece shall "occupy the whole evening," as a condition of the highest rate of payment, seems likely to produce something that would be rather trying to English patience. We know what orators are when they "occupy the floor" for a whole night; we should do anything sooner than hold out an inducement to them to be lengthy. The Tariff wants amending in this respect; mere length is so negative a recommendation of a drama, that we do not wish to see it adopted. But the interest taken by a Minister of State in the remuneration of poor authors, is so rare an occurrence that we could not let the instance pass without notice. We recommend the "Dramatic Authors Society" to forward the above paragraph to the Premier, embodied in a memorial representing the total decay that has fallen on the "English" stage.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

By the Returns relating to Newspaper Stamps, just published by authority of Parliament, our readers will perceive that the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS not only maintains its proud position at the head of the hebdomadal press of London, but continues steadily to increase its already enormous circulation. With one or two exceptions, more stamps are used for this paper than for all the other London papers, daily and weekly, put together.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the members of the royal suite, and the Household, attended divine service on Sunday at Claremont. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated.

The Queen and Prince Albert walked in Claremont Park on Saturday forenoon. In the afternoon her Majesty and his Royal Highness took an airing in the vicinity of Claremont, in a pony phaeton. The Hon. Colonel Grey, Equerry in Waiting on her Majesty, attended on horseback. The royal family, accompanied by the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, were taken an airing in Claremont Park on Saturday.

On Monday his Royal Highness Prince Albert left Claremont at half-past six o'clock in the morning, and proceeded to Gosport, to embark for the Isle of Wight, for the purpose of his Royal Highness inspecting Osborne House, near Cowes. Major-General Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, dined with her Majesty and Prince Albert, at Claremont in the evening.

The Queen and Prince Albert walked on Tuesday morning in Claremont Park. His Royal Highness Prince Albert afterwards rode out on horseback, attended by Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting. The Prince returned to Clare-ment to lunch. At ten minutes past three o'clock in the afternoon her Majesty and [illegible] Royal Highness the Princess Royal left Cumberland in a carriage and four for Ascot. The Royal party arrived at Buckingham Palace, escorted by a party of Light Dragoons, at twenty minutes before five o'clock. The Queen and Prince Albert were received at Buckingham Palace by the Lord Chamberlain, the Master of the Horse, the Vice-Chamberlain, the Viscountess Jocelyn, Lady in Waiting; the Hon. Misses Murray and Seymour, Maids of Honour; the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting; and Sir Frederick Stovin, Groom in Waiting. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and Lady Fanny Howard, Lady in Waiting, joined with her Majesty and Prince Albert in the evening, at Buckingham Palace.

On Wednesday afternoon the Queen held a levee at St. James's Palace, which was numerously attended. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, and the royal suite, arrived from Buckingham Palace at two o'clock, in four of the royal carriages, escorted by a party of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards. The Great Officers of State, viz., the Lord Steward, the Lord Chamberlain, and the Master of the Horse, received her Majesty and his Royal Highness at St. James's Palace, and conducted them to the Royal Closet. The presentations were very numerous. After the levee, her Majesty gave audience to the Lord Chamberlain, and attended by the royal suite, returned to Buckingham Palace.

HER MAJESTY'S DRAWING ROOM. We have authority to state that the Court, being out of mourning, no ladies, except those of her Majesty's household, are expected to appear in mourning at the ensuing Drawing Room. This does not apply to cases of private mourning.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent dined with her Majesty and Prince Albert in the evening, at Buckingham Palace.

The Countess of Haddington has issued invitations for a grand assembly at the Admiralty on Monday next, in honour of the Russian Grand Duchesses.

ALMACK'S.—The opening ball, on Monday next, the day of her Majesty's drawing-room, is expected to be a very brilliant assembly. The Countess of Jersey and Princess Esterhazy propose being in attendance, and the applications to those ladies patronesses for vouchers, considering it is the commencing ball of the season, have been exceedingly numerous. The Marchioness of Londonderry, Countess of Kinnoull, Countess of Lichfield, and Lady Willoughby d'Eresby, and others ladies' patronesses of the réunions being still on the continent, it alone rests with the Countess of Jersey and Viscountess Palmerston to give the entrée.

Tuesday next is the birthday of his Royal Highness Prince George of Cambridge, who will complete his 25th year.

APPROACHING MARRIAGE.—An alliance, announced between Mr. Henry Hoare and Miss Clayton East, daughter of Sir East Clayton East, Bart., is not expected to be solemnized until the close of the season. Count de Raynaval will be shortly united, at Paris, to Mdlle. Berlin de Vesin, the accomplished daughter of one of the proprietors of the Journal des Débats. A marriage is on the tapis between Horsley Palmer, Esq., and one of the Misses Greville.

PRINCESS NICHOLAS ESTERHAZY.—The Earl and Countess of Jersey received the gratifying news of the safe accouchement of the Princess Nicholas Esterhazy of a son on Monday morning, and when the courier left the Austrian capital the Princess and infant were doing most propitiously favourable.

FATAL ACCIDENT AND DEATH OF LORD WILLIAM HILL.—About one o'clock on Monday, while following the staghounds in the neighbourhood of Whitton, near Ipswich, a fatal accident occurred to Lord William Hill. The horse which the unfortunate nobleman was riding fell and rolled over him, and before he could be removed to the barracks, he was dead. The accident threw a deep gloom over Ipswich, and the regiment to which the deceased nobleman belonged. Lord William Hill was the third son of the present Marquis of Downshire, and was only in his 28th year. He had entered the Scotch Greys in 18 , and his commission as Lieutenant is dated October 31, 1838.

A Cabinet Council was held at two o'clock on Tuesday afternoon at the Foreign Office. It was attended by Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir James Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, Sir Henry Hardinge, and Sir Edward Knatchbull. The Lord Chancellor arrived at the Foreign Office soon after three o'clock, and joined his colleagues. The council sat two hours.

DECEASE OF THE EARL OF LONSDALE, K.G., &c. &c.—It has seldom been our lot to announce the death of a nobleman more truly estimable in every point of view than the lamented subject of our present notice. The earliest friend of Mr. Pitt, his long public life has not been less marked by unimpeachable integrity, than the most unswerving devotion to the principles of that great statesman of that eminent man. In his private capacity, whether we view him as a munificent landlord, or in his domestic sphere at the head of a numerous family, we may state in full with just pride, as the model of a perfect nobleman. The possessor of an immense fortune, his generous heart and hand were ever open to the claims of distress His charities were unbounded. With strong opinions upon political subjects, he numbered among his friends, and still more affectionate admirers, many men of opposite politics to his own. He was an accomplished scholar, and endowed with an intellect singularly vigorous, even to the last. Full of honours, he expired at York House, Twickenham, on Tuesday night at seven o'clock, aged 66. The noble earl is succeeded in the family honours and estates by his eldest son, Viscount Lowther, born July 30, 1787. The deceased was a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts, Lord-Lieutenant and Vice-Admiral of the counties of Cumberland and Recorder of Carlisle.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

A royal mandate will be issued in a few days, in virtue of which the degree of Doctor in Divinity will be conferred by the University of Oxford on the Rev. E. Field, of Queen's College, Bishop elect of Newfoundland. The rev. gentleman will be consecrated in about three weeks, and will immediately afterwards proceed to his distant diocese.

The Lord Bishop of Gloucester has instituted the Rev. G. T. Spring, B.A., of Wadham College, Oxford, to the rectory of Hawling, Gloucestershire.

The Dean of Lincoln has presented the Rev. W. Gibbs Barker, of St. John's College, Cambridge, to the rectory of Mackley, Derbyshire.

The Marquis of Bristol has presented the Rev. Hervey Oakes, M.A., of Jesus College, Cambridge, to the rectory of Newton, Suffolk

A new church is in course of erection at Sunderland, Durham. The foundation stone was laid a few days since by the Duke of Cleveland.

The Bishop of Hereford has collated the Rev. W. P. Musgrave to a canonry in Hereford Cathedral.

DIOCESAN OF ST. ASAPH AND BANGOR.—On Tuesday last a meeting of the clergy was held at Archdeacon Clerke's rooms, Oxford, when petitions to both Houses of Parliament were unanimously adopted, deprecating the intended union of the sees of St. Asaph and Bangor. The petition to the House of Commons will be presented by Sir R. H. Inglis, M.P.

The Lord Bishop of Winchester has instituted the Rev. G. T. Cubitt, M.A., to the rectory of St. Thomas's, Winchester. The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. J. Barlow to the rectory of Guildford, Surrey. The Rev. T. Kenworthy has been presented to the rectory of Acworth, Yorkshire. The Archdeacon of Exeter has given notice that he will commence his visitation at Exeter, on the 30th of April; thence he will proceed to Honiton and Tiverton. The Dean of Exeter will commence his visitations on the 1st of May. The Bishop of Gloucester will hold a general ordination on the 1st of May. The Lord Bishop of Gloucester has instituted the Rev. G. T. Spring, M.A., to the rectory of Harding, vacant by the death of the late incumbent. Mr. Henry Thomas Hope is the patron of the living.

The Lord-Lieutenant and Privy Council have disappropriated the rectories of Burry and Bathlogwan from the archdeaconry of Meath, leaving it now worth about £1000 a year, subject, however, to the deductions for tax to the ecclesiastical commissioners, poor rates, and the building charge, which is considerable. The Rev. Edward Adderley Stopford, late incumbent of Caledon, county of Tyrone, has been appointed to the archdeaconry by the Lord Bishop of Meath, the patron.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

BANK OF ENGLAND.

A General Quarterly Court of the proprietors of Bank Stock was held on Thursday. The meeting was very numerously attended.

At 10 o'clock, the Governor (Wm. Cotton, Esq.), the Deputy Governor (J. B. Heath, Esq.), and the Directors entered the meeting, when the minutes of the last Court having been read and affirmed,

The Governor said, this was one of the half-yearly meetings of the corporation for the purpose of considering a dividend; it was also one f the quarterly meetings appointed by the charter. He had, therefore, to inform the proprietors that, after a careful perusal of the affairs of the Bank, the Directors considered that a dividend of £1 10s. per cent. on the half-year, arising from profits and realized up to the 5th of April next, might be declared—of course deducting 7d. in the pound for the property-tax. It was right, however, for him to state, that in order to pay the half-year's dividend of 3½ per cent., it would be necessary to take a sum of £10,503 2s. 6d. from the "Rest," to make up the required amount.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

The Governor then announced that the dividend warrants would be ready for delivery and payable on Saturday, the 6th of April next

The Governor then said, he believed there was no motion regularly before the court, and he hoped the honourable proprietor would not persevere in his intention of moving a vote of thanks to the directors. He could assure the meeting that himself and his colleagues had done all in their power to promote the interests of that great corporation, interests which he believed were necessary to hold for the general benefit of the country. He should also state that his brother directors considered it would be advantageous for him (Mr. Cotton) to retain the office of Governor for another year. If that was the wish of the proprietors, if he did not perform his duty so ably as he could wish, he would do it honestly, zealously, and faithfully. (Cheers.) It certainly was for the directors to say whether they would continue him another year in office, and he left it entirely in their hands. If that was their decision, and the wish of the proprietors, he would willingly undertake the duties.

Mr. Harrupp proposed a vote of thanks to the governor, deputy governor, and directors, for their uniform and constant attention to the interests of the Bank and its proprietors

The motion having been seconded, was unanimously agreed to.

The Governor, in the name of himself and the directors, returned thanks. He thanked them for their kindness and confidence, and could assure them that no want of zeal or interest in their welfare would be wanted on the part of the directors.

The court, which was one of the most unanimous ever assembled in the Bank parlour, then adjourned.

ARTISTS' BENEVOLENT FUND.—On Wednesday the annual meeting of the members of this charity, established in 1810, under the patronage of George the Fourth, by whom the charter of incorporation was granted to it, was held at the Freemason's Tavern, Great Queen-street B. Bond Cabbell, Esq. presided. It appeared that the fund is raised, and wholly supported by the contributions of its members, for their own relief in sickness or superannuation. According to the annual report read, the receipts during the year were, including a former balance of £59 5s. 7d., dividend on stock, £261 18s. 9d., &c., £1518 13s. 1d.; deducting the expenditure, a balance of £109 17s. 9d. remained with the Treasurer. The stock possessed by the institution now was [illegible]

[illegible] Hogarth, Esq., Lower Grosvenor-street. It was first established as a temporary receiving-house for the sufferers from the great fire at Hamburgh, in October last year. Subscriptions were received at the Mansion House and Bank Parlour, and Baron Rothschild, Esq., M.P., was appointed treasurer for the purpose of receiving the money and issuing orders upon it. The fire broke out in the poorest district. They subscribed among themselves and raised a fund, which has been distributed each year among the poor (who are first visited to see if their claims are just), in coals, food, covering against the inclementseats of the weather, &c. Many of the most opulent inhabitants of Hanover, Eaton, Belgrave, and other squares, had rendered it their assistance, and the meeting now held graced further aid. At one o'clock, James Emerson Tennent, Esq., M.P. for Belfast, took the chair, and after expressing his pleasure at meeting so respectable a company, said he considered that it was not only the duty of the rich and powerful to assist institutions like these, but that it was a high privilege for them to be allowed to associate with the middle classes in their benevolent and charitable exertions. He believed this society was a consoling and unostentatious one, and carried out fully the principle of the Divine assurance, that the poor should not perish from the face of the earth, but that help should be afforded by the more fortunate of their brethren. The Report detailed the great good that had been done, and the resolutions were agreed to in support of the society, which received a handsome increase to its subscriptions when the meeting closed.

CALEDONIAN ASYLUM.—On Thursday last, a quarterly general court of the members of the institution was held at the Freemason's Tavern, Great Queen-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields, Lord James Stewart in the chair. There were present Sir George Rose, Bart.; P. M. Stewart, Esq., M.P.; Dr. Stewart, Captain M'Intosh, &c., &c. The usual formal business having been gone through, the Earl of Zetland, and James Matheveon, Esq., M.P., were elected vice-presidents in the room of the Duke of Buccleuch, appointed president, and Lord Lynedoch, deceased. It was next announced that the fund was accumulating for the erection of an additional wing to the present building, intended to fit it a-commodation of one hundred girls. There are at present ninety-five boys educated and maintained by the charity. The Rev. John Lees, the secretary, announced his intention of resigning the office. After a vote of thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.

OPENING OF THE METROPOLITAN BRIDGES TO THE PUBLIC.—In the last number of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS, it was stated that a communication on this subject had been received from the Government by the Metropolitan Anti-Toll Bridge Association. It appears that this body proposes that the bridges should be purchased from the present proprietors for the sum of £250,000 to be derived from a continuation of the coal duty, a county rate, &c., &c. It appears that Waterloo-bridge, which is proposed to be purchased for at from £250,000 to £450,000, cost £1,060,000 if the claims upon it for arrears amount to nearly £6,000,000. Towards the re-building of London-bridge, and its approaches, £1,200,000 was voted, which is now being paid off by the coal duty. The cost of the construction of Blackfriars-bridge was paid also by the coal duty.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.—At a Court of the Governors of this institution, held on Tuesday, 135 presentations for boys were issued for the current year; and at the same time a highly honourable testimonial of the approbation of the Court was unanimously voted to Mr. H. J. S. Maine, of Pembroke College, Cambridge, a former pupil and present exhibitioner of Christ's Hospital, on the occasion of his having been placed at the head of the Classical Tripos, at the recent examination for honours in that university.

EAST INDIA HOUSE.—A quarterly general meeting of the proprietors of East Ind'a Stock was held on Wednesday at the East India House, Mr. Cotton in the chair. The minutes of the last court were read, as was also correspondence between the Court of Directors and the Board of Control on the subject of the pension granted to Captain Pattison, which showed that the grant had been confirmed by the government. There were three motions of which notice had been given. The two following were withdrawn, in consequence of a statement made from the chair that the subjects were at present under consideration: "That the despatch of Lord Auckland, of the 17th November, 1836, by which his lordship rejected the proposed plan of the Bengal Government, and recommended the annual money payment of £6000 to the Temple of Juggurnaut (to which recommendation the directors assented, by their despatch of the 2nd June, 1841), be considered by the Court of Proprietors, as not duly appropriating such money payment, upon the ground of no original pledge or engagement having ever been given for the same by or on behalf of the Company, as erroneously alleged by Lord Auckland in his despatch." "To call the attention of the Proprietors to the subject of Appeals from the Courts of Sudder Adawlut, in India, to the Privy Council, with the view to the substitution of a less expensive, and, as regards the last resort for the entire Native Courts, of a more efficient court of ultimate appeal."—Mr. Sullivan then moved, "That there be laid before the Court of Proprietors copies of all minutes of proceedings of the Court of Directors, together with all papers that may have been recorded by individual directors, on the affairs of Scinde."—The motion having been seconded, the Chairman said that the Court of Directors could not accede to the proposition of the hon. proprietor for the production of these papers. He thought there were two good reasons for not producing them: one was, that after what had already taken place in this court, it was unnecessary, and that therefore they could do no good; the other was, that the subject was still under the consideration of the Court of Directors. (Hear,)—A short discussion then ensued, in which Mr. Fielder, Mr. Weeding, and Sergeant Gazeley took part, and Mr. Sullivan ultimately withdrew the motion for the present, on the understanding that it would be open to him again to bring it forward at another court.—Some other business having been disposed of, the court adjourned.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

HOME CIRCUIT.—LEWES.
(Before Lord Denman.)

THE BRIGHTON MURDER.—John Lawrence was placed at the bar to take his trial for the murder of Chief Constable Solomon at Brighton, the particulars of which lamentable occurrence appeared in this paper last week. Mr. Clarkson and Mr. Cobbett appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. C. Jones conducted the defence. The witnesses examined before the magistrates and coroner were then called, and they repeated their former evidence, which fully corroborated the statement of facts made by the learned counsel for the prosecution. Mr. Chadwick Jones then addressed the jury for the defence, and contended that the expressions used by the prisoner in Solomon's office, together with the entire absence of any conceivable malice or motive, showed that the prisoner was acting under a sudden impulse or frenzy, which deprived him temporarily of reason, and made him an irresponsible agent. The learned judge having summed up, the jury immediately returned a verdict of guilty. The prisoner, who had been greatly agitated during the time the judge was summing up, was now supported by the turnkeys; and Lord Denman at once proceeded to pass sentence. He warned the prisoner to make use of the few days which remained to him in this world, in seeking that repentance which should prepare him for the next; and told him that there was not the slightest chance that the extreme penalty of the law would not be inflicted. The sentence of the Court is—"That you be taken from hence to the gaol from this county, at Horsham, and thence to the place of execution, and that there you be hanged by the neck till you are dead, and may God have mercy on your soul: and that your body be afterwards buried in the precincts of the prison." The prisoner was then assisted out of the dock in a highly agitated state; and as he descended the stairs he gave an earnest gaze on the crowd, as if looking for some one, but he made no sign of recognition. The trial lasted three hours.

SERIOUS ACCIDENT.—On Tuesday evening, about six o'clock, W. B Glasse Esq., residing at No. 7, South-crescent, Bedford-square, was proceeding along Portland-place, on horseback, accompanied at a distance by a youth, his groom, when the animal, a high-spirited one, upon which the latter was riding, took fright, and ran with great force against a lamp post; by the concussion the horse was nearly stunned, but after a short lapse of time, it started off again, and came with such violence against some railings, that it dropped dead upon the spot. The groom fell under the animal, and, on being extricated, he was immediately conveyed in a cab to the house of Mr. Chisholm, the eminent surgeon in Devonshire-street, Portland-place, where it was found he was a severe concussion of the brain, his right ankle was also dislocated, and he was bruised very much in various parts of the body. It is expected, however, that the sufferer will recover.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

POSTSCRIPT.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT.—There is a report in circulation, as I cannot learn from what authority, that it is the intention of her Majesty, during the future be made at the police-court, should be sworn to on oath to make a similar excursion to the Isle of Wight to that made by his Royal Highness Prince Albert on Monday last, taking a special train at Esher station, and proceeding to Southampton, from the Royal Clarence Victualling Yard, at Gosport, whereby the excursion is made with dispatch and much privacy, and will enable her Majesty to escape that public demonstration of respect and commonest that inevitably follows her Majesty's movements through such a populous place as Southampton.

The Earl of Lovelace had an interview with Sir J. Graham at the Home Office yesterday morning. The following deputations also had interviews with the right hon. bart.:—A deputation appointed at a meeting of the manufacturers of Leeds, headed by Mr. Aldam, M.P., and accompanied by Mr H. Benyon, Mr. Williams (woollen manufacturer), and others. Another deputation from Manchester and Salford, consisting of Messrs. Forster, Bentley, Wawklyn, &c.

MEDICAL REFORM.—On Monday next the first aggregate meeting of the members of the medical profession takes place at the Crown and Anchor, in order to protest against Sir J. Graham's new bill, and to take other means for the protection of the members of their body. Up to the present moment about 400 practitioners and students, principally from London University Hospital, have enrolled their names as members of the "Medical Protection Assembly." From the provincial societies throughout the country deputations will be sent, and petitions will be adopted for presentation to the Legislature. Mr. Wakley, M.P., Mr. Carpue, Dr. Lynch, Mr. Morgan, Dr. Mackenzie, Dr. Maddocks, Mr. Hall, and a large number of eminent surgeons of the Metropolis, have expressed their intention to be present, and to take part in the proceedings.

SUMMONSES GRANTED ON OATH ONLY.—Yesterday, Mr. Hall, the chief magistrate at Bow-street, issued an order, that all complaints for a summons [illegible] in future be made at the police-court, should be sworn to on oath by the [illegible] Thanks in accordance with the opinion of Mr. Justice Patteson, [illegible] the Court of Queen's Bench. Up to the present time, the [illegible] have been granted on the mere statement of the party, provided they appeared of sufficient consequence to the magistrate sitting for the time being, to warrant his interference.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE DOVER LINE.—A dreadful accident occurred yesterday on the above line, at Folkestone. It appears that some empty waggons were proceeding down the inclined plane at Folkestone Harbour, for coals, when the person who were riding upon them, fearing they could not slacken the speed, instead of "putting on" their "break," jumped off, thus allowing the waggons to proceed full speed to the harbour. The consequence was, that one poor fellow, a plate layer, was run over, and almost cut to pieces, and two waggons were driven into the sea. The poor fellow was still alive when this report was made.

We have received the Paris papers of Wednesday. The debate on the Secret Service Bill closed the evening before, with a majority for Ministers. The numbers being—Ayes, 225; Noes, 169: Majority, 56. There is no other news of moment in these papers.

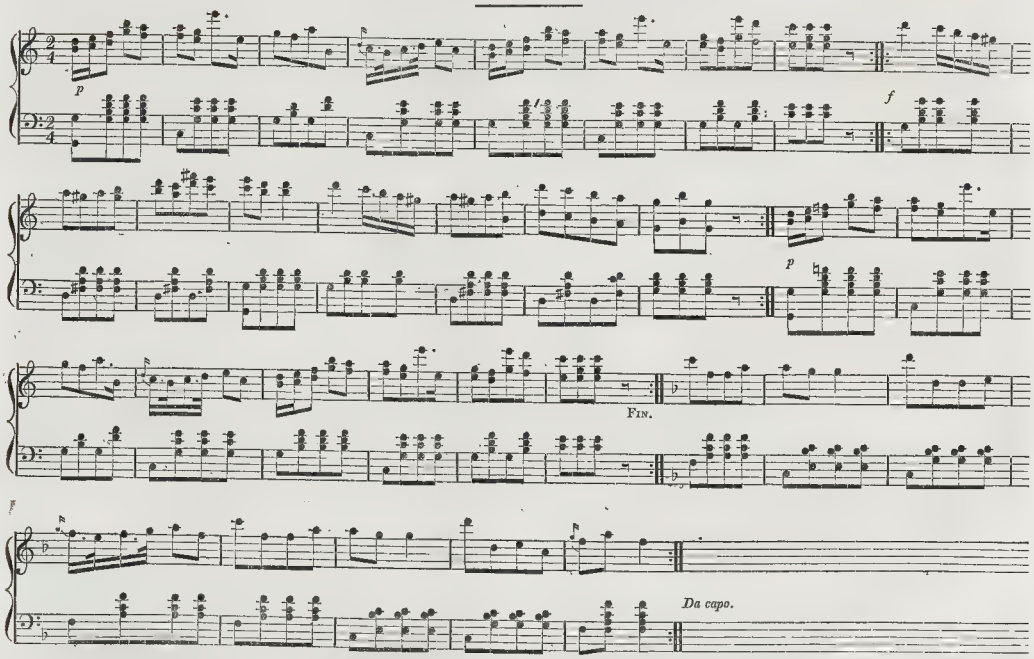
THE POLKA DANCE.

THE BOHEMIAN POLKA.

THE PARISIAN POLKA.

POLKA DANCE.

COMPOSED BY JACQUES OFFENBACH.



We have received from Paris, by the last post, the accompanying sketch of the new dance recently imported from Bohemia into the French metropolis, entitled the Polka, and which, to the exclusion of all other considerations—Legitimacy, Tahiti and the Right of Search not excepted—has seized this volatile and light-hearted people universally by the heels. With all respect for the lore of our learned neighbours, we think that St. Vitus, and not St. Denis, must have been the patron saint of France; but, be that as it may, there can be no doubt that that saint is their guardian angel, who, by infusing into them this lively elixir, withdraws them from the morbid contemplation of fancied and imaginary wrongs, and the long train of fatal and inglorious consequences which generally follow. The English are an imitative people, and we may reasonably expect to find the Polka amongst the other west-end importations during the season. Our daily contemporary the Times, thus alludes to the rage which prevails in Paris with regard to this most recent innovation.

"The Paris papers are destitute of news. Our private letters state, that 'politics are for the moment suspended in public regard by the new and all-absorbing pursuit—the Polka—a dance recently imported from Bohemia, and which embraces in its qualities the intimacy of the waltz with the vivacity of the Irish jig. You may conceive how completely is 'the Polka' the rage from the fact that the lady of a celebrated ex-ministter, desiring to figure in it at a soirée dansante, monopolized the professor par excellence of that specialité for three hours on Wednesday morning last, at 200f. the hour. This is an unfortunate diversion for the war party, whose subscriptions for the sword of honour for Admiral Dupetit Thouars will be put hors de combat by this fascinating novelty.'"

The Polka is an original Bohemian Peasant Dance, and was first introduced into the fashionable saloons of Berlin and St. Petersburg, about eight years since. Last season it was the great favourite at Baden-Baden. The Polka is written in 2-4 time. The gentleman holds his partner in the manner shown in the engraving; each lift first the right leg, strike twice the left heel with the right heel, and then turn, as in the waltz.

The Bohemians accompany this movement with characteristic gesture, but the action is rather rude. The Berlin Polka combines grace with elegance.

The Polka we now publish has been composed expressly for the Illustrated London News by a celebrated French artiste; and we feel great pleasure in being the first to introduce it to our subscribers.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

The various play-bills give token of preparation for the Easter entertainments. The long-promised opera by Benedict will be produced at Drury-lane in the course of the Easter week, and the celebrated dancer, Madlle. Grahn (who has gained considerable popularity in Italy) will make her appearance immediately after the termination of Mons. Duprez's engagement.

So fast does report travel, that it has already come to our knowledge that Mr. Mark Lemon and Mr. Tully, the composer, are busily occupied in constructing a musical piece, which will be brought forward during the next season at Drury-lane.

Herr Staudigl will return to this country in the course of a few weeks, when Mr. Bunn will give him an opportunity of again delighting the English public by his powerful voice, and by the able manner in which he acts some of the most arduous characters in the operatic drama.

Amongst the various novelties announced for production at the English Opera House, under the management of Mr. Keeley, is a burlesque by Mr. A'Beckett, the author of the "Yellow Dwarf" and the "Magic Mirror," &c. The opening address will be written by Mr. A'Beckett, and spoken by Mr. and Mrs. Keeley in their capacities of manager and manageress

The bal masque at Covent-garden having proved successful, Mons. Jullien promises to give the lovers of such entertainments another treat of the same nature.

Madame Vestris and Mr. Charles Matthews will resume their engagements at the Haymarket Theatre immediately after Easter.

Mrs. Yates has announced her annual benefit, which will take place at the Adelphi on Thursday next. On this occasion Mr. John Parry will sing one of his comic songs, and Mrs. Fitzwilliam will appear in Mr. Mark Lemon's farce called "Out of Place."

FINE ARTS.—THE BRITISH INSTITUTION.

LA FETE DE MARIAGE. PAINTED BY GOODALL.

"Fête de Mariage." Goodall.—This is a picture of extraordinary merit; the artist having combined the happiest styles of the Flemish school with what we may nationally and proudly call the Wilkie. There is all the natural simplicity and truth of the former, united to the minute detail of the latter; while there is, same time, more than mere "dull depiction" exhibited in the various groupings, the most beautiful of which is that in the foreground, where some young revellers are enjoying the unpressed grape—

"In wild, but sweet ebriety"

This passage or extract would alone be sufficient to form an interesting picture, and prove the artist a genius. The bride and bridegroom are about the least interesting characters in the scene: the former, receiving an old gentleman's congratulations, looks as if she had just used the cosmetic of a pink ribbon infusion, and the husband seems as if he were already sorry for turning Benedict. But "ubi plura nitent," we must not complain of minor faults, which, after all, are only foils to set off the general effect of the whole. The accessories of this clever production are admirably painted, with a Hogarthian consideration of detail; and although we have no reason to doubt that the pictorial works of the ancients were very admirable, yet it is impossible for ideal or traditional beauty to supplant that which we have at present. Parrhasius, Zeuxis, and Apelles, might have been very good limners in their time; but, although all good, we could safely and proudly say there was not one GOODALL amongst them. This picture alone would prove the high state of British art, but it is surrounded by scores of others of kindred merit. The size of the "Fête de Mariage" is 4 ft. 1 in. in height, and 5 ft. 9 in. in width: it has been purchased by Sir Charles Coote, for the sum of £400.

A correspondent has favoured us with the following playful accompaniment to this exquisite picture

Bretagne, September, 1843.

My dearest Sister,—In the progress of our tour through this charming country, we arrived, yesterday, at the pretty village of Guemné, and it was my good fortune, this morning, to witness one of those rural festivals, which are always so full of interest in every land and clime—A Fête de Mariage—which, in this country, with its varied and striking costumes, presented a scene of undescribable gaiety, accompanied as it was with so many honest and happy faces. I was rambling along the straggling High-street, and had just passed the village church, when my attention was attracted to a large open building, which had the appearance of a Halle-au-Blé, or market-place. I heard the sound of music, and of cheerful voices, among which the sweet tones of infantine prattle could be discerned, as well as the ringing laugh of merry maidens, and joyous youths, while the peal that was swelling from the old church tower, left me in no doubt of the event that was celebrating within the building before me. I entered the rustic hall, and seated myself on a bench unnoticed by the gay throng. At first, my eyes were dazzled by the variety that met their gaze—variety not only of costume and colour, but of age and character; there were from 50 to 70 persons present, of every period of life, from the aged to the infant at its mother's breast, and all looking so happy that no eye could behold those beaming countenances without feeling a corresponding note of happiness awakened within the heart. Baskets of flowers and rich fruits were scattered about here and there, adding their bright and gorgeous hues to the beauty of the scene. A party of merry dancers at first concealed the principal group; but as they few past in the many round, my gaze immediately rested on the bridal pair, and the surrounding company of deeply interested and affectionate relatives and friends. The bride was attired in white, with a wreath of flowers round her hair, which was drawn back from her lovely forehead; a large bouquet lay in her lap, from which some flowers appeared to have fallen at her feet—those pretty little feet, just peeping out, were ornamented with large crimson bows; her countenance was animated and happy, and she looked really lovely as she sat smiling and blushing by the side of her mother, receiving the compliments of a very courtly-looking old gentleman, who appeared by his dress to be one of the principal people of the place—perhaps, the mayor or the prefect of the district. I could only see his shining bald head, and his bending form as he made his salutation to the bride; but, surely, he must have been saying something very agreeable, to judge by the arch, smiling looks of the two pretty bride's-maids, who were stationed behind the bride and her mother. But, now for the bridegroom; and, if I tell you that I admired him much more than the bride, you must not think that it was only on account of his personal beauty; it was the look of perfect happiness, and goodness of character, that made him so handsome in my eyes; he was attired in the holiday costume of the Normandy peasant—a light blue cloth, with crimson bows at his knees, and his shoes, with a carnation at his breast. He had just stepped away a few paces from the side of his bride to give his hand to the hon curé, who had then entered the building by a side door, followed by a company of happy smiling faces, all peering with lively interest on the gay scene. But, oh! that dear, kind, benevolent looking old pastor. There was something in the meeting between that venerable man and that handsome youth that quite went to my heart. I felt sure that he had not only christened that young man, but had watched over him and guided him with his holy counsels through his boyhood and his youth; how else should they look so kindly on each other—the one with such benignity and the other with such a look of affection and gratitude; to add to the interest of the scene, the father of the bridegroom had at that very moment placed his hand upon the youth's shoulder, and looked as if he was saying, "he is a good son, and I have cause to be proud of him." * * * * But how shall I describe all that I saw and felt. I was particularly struck with the elegant figures of two young and lovely sisters, who were standing, their arms encircling each other's waists, looking with affectionate interest towards their good pastor and their two young friends: and then there was a sweet child who seemed to participate in the general feeling of happiness, and knew not how to express the delight of its innocent little heart, than by reaching up to its father for a kiss. After gazing on these groups, I turned my eyes on the dancers, who were whisking round and round right merrily. I can scarcely tell what struck me most in the expression of all those countenances, the individual delight which sparkled on every face, or the interest which they showed for the young couple by the arch glances cast in that direction of the room. Among the bystanders there was a grotesque gipsy-looking fellow, whom it was impossible to look on without a smile. He appeared to be exerting all his eloquence to persuade a pretty young woman to be his partner, whether for life or for the dance I could not guess; ugly as he looked in comparison with the lovely faces around him, he seemed so good humoured and so tender, that he really added no little share to the interest of the scene. * * * In the foreground there sat a charming party of children of various ages, with a basket of delicious fruits beside them; and one lazy, luxurious little rogue lay sprawling on his back, holding a beautiful cluster of purple grapes over his mouth, as if he expected that the rich ripe balls would drop one by one down his throat, without his taking the trouble to pluck them! It was, indeed, hot enough to make any one feel lazy; and delightful it was to look out, beyond the dancers, upon the clear blue sky, the picturesque house tops, and the old church tower; then, as my eye rested again on the dark massive beams over my head, how pleasant it was to see the graceful waving folds of the tri-coloured flag over the corner where the youthful pair were receiving the congratulations of their friends, its light and airy texture contrasting beautifully with the beams of the Old Halle.

On looking around me again, I first caught sight of a gentle, loving face, whose expression touched my very heart. She was a young and lovely mother, with her infant at her breast; she was in the midst of the children (perhaps some of them were her young relatives), and was gazing forward thoughtfully on the new-married pair. How much that lovely countenance seemed to say, it was the only thoughtful one that my eyes had yet rested on, and still I was not sad. It spoke of a mother's anxious cares—perhaps of sleepless nights and watchful days—but where could her husband be? Surely he was not present; he could not be one of the dancers; oh, no, for they were all too much engaged with their charming partners. Ah! no doubt he is far away—perhaps a soldier in some foreign clime—or a sailor on the tempest-troubled ocean; and for this reason the young mother looks so thoughtful amid the merry throng.

As my glance wandered in search of fresh objects, it fell on an aged couple seated at some distance from the dancers: they were very aged, but how happy they looked—they were evidently thinking over their youthful days, with many a fond recollection. The old man was leaning on his trusty staff, the old

VISIT OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT TO THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert left Claremont on Monday morning, at half-past six o'clock, attended by Major-General Sir Edward Bowater, Equerry in Waiting, and the Hon. G. E. Anson, and proceeded in a carriage and four to the Esher station of the South Western Railway, en route for the Isle of Wight.

A special train, consisting of three first-class carriages—the state carriage occupying the centre—propelled by the Lark locomotive engine, had previously arrived at Esher, from the Nine Elms station.

Precisely at a quarter to seven o'clock the royal carriage drew up in the station yard, and the train sped rapidly on towards Gosport. The morning was remarkably fine, and nothing occurred to interrupt the enjoyment of a very delightful journey, the whole distance from Esher to Gosport (seventy-five miles) having been completed in two hours and twenty minutes.

At Gosport station the Prince was received by Sir Charles Rowley, the Port-Admiral, Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, Major-General Sir H. Pakenham, Commandant of the Garrison, Captain Rowley, &c. &c. His Royal Highness immediately entered Admiral Rowley's carriage, and, in company with that gallant officer, drove direct to the Clarence Victualling-yard, where the Admiral's barge was in waiting to convey him on board the Black Eagle. So soon as the approach of his Royal Highness was observed, the yards of the various ships in port were manned, and as the Prince stepped into the Admiral's barge, a royal salute of twenty-one guns was fired from the St. Vincent flag-ship, and the Victory. In a few moments his Royal Highness was on board the Black Eagle, steaming on in the direction of East Cowes Point. A stiff breeze from the N.E. raised a little swell in the Solent, but the passage across to East Cowes point was made in less than three quarters of an hour. The Prince was engaged during the whole time walking to and fro on the deck with Captain Rowley, and occasionally entering into conversation with the commander of the vessel, Mr. Samuel Cook. It had been intended to have landed in the Admiral's barge (which was towed over by the steamer) on the beach immediately below Osborne House, and a suitable position had been selected, but in consequence of the prevalence of the north-east wind the surf ran so high that it was deemed imprudent to attempt it, and the vessel was put about and brought to anchor in Cowes Roads to the west of Norris Castle. The Prince here entered the barge, a salute of twenty-one guns being fired at the same moment from the Royal Yacht Club station, and in a very few minutes his Royal Highness landed at East Cowes. The Prince immediately entered a carriage belonging to Mr. Ward, of West Cowes, and proceeded direct to Osborne House. Arriving there, his Royal Highness minutely inspected the apartments, and subsequently walked through the grounds down to the beach, returning into the house to lunch.

The following arrangements are stated to have been made with respect to the purchase of this property. It has been agreed to give £28,000 for the freehold outright, providing her Majesty is satisfied with the accommodation the house affords. In any event the mansion is taken for one year certain, at a rental of £1000, subject, however, to the approval of his Royal Highness on Monday, and the Prince's opinion is said to be decidedly in favour of entering upon it, at any rate for that term, if only by way of trial.

The object of his Royal Highness's visit being completed, he left East Cowes under a royal salute, and having re-embarked on board the Black Eagle, the passage from Cowes to Gosport was made against a strong head wind in less than an hour. The Prince was again met by the gallant admirals before named, and Major-General Sir H. Pakenham, who accompanied his Royal Highness to the station, and at eight minutes to three o'clock the special train was again on its way to Esher. The journey was completed in one hour and fifty-eight minutes.

One inconvenience attended the early arrival of the train at Esher. The royal carriage had not arrived. The Prince, however, made no difficulty of this, and, in company with Sir Edward Bowater and Mr. Anson, proceeded on foot to Claremont.

The second section is headed, "Lord Ashley and Dr. Southwood Smith," as the leaders of an enlarged scheme of philanthropy peculiar to our own age: the association, too, is otherwise appropriate:—

Dr. Smith is now engaged with Lord Ashley, and other influential and benevolent men, in the formation of an association for improving the dwellings of the industrious classes, by the erection of comfortable, cleanly, well-drained and ventilated houses, to be let to families in sets of rooms, with an ample supply of water on each floor; a fair return for the capital invested being secured. Eleemosynary relief forms no part of the undertaking, as tending to destroy the independence of those whom it is designed to benefit. The association has fully matured its plans, and will endeavour practically to show by model-houses what may be done by combination to lessen the expensiveness of the dwellings of the poor, and to increase their healthfulness and comforts.

* * * * * *

Lord Ashley is yet young, and few men have before them a more noble or more successful career. He has great natural advantages; the qualities requisite for the performance of the mission to which he has felt the vocation. He is not only intellectual, but possessed of the greatest industry, perseverance, and confidence in his cause, yet sufficient of himself from the very depth of his feeling concerning it; not wanting in firmness, yet candid and conciliating; and though earnest even to enthusiasm, tempering and directing the impulses of zeal by a sober and sound judgment. His singleness of purpose, his unquestioned sincerity and honesty, his diligence in collecting facts, his careful sifting, lucid arrangement, and concise and candid exposition of them, and his plain unaffected language and unpretending address, have secured him the deeply respectful attention even of the House of Commons. Sustained in his appeals to that difficult assembly by the profound consciousness that the cause he advocates must engage on its side the sympathies of our common humanity, on which he throws himself with a generous confidence, he often produces the highest results of eloquence. He has already calmed the fears of the capitalists, conciliated the Government, engaged the co-operation of the Queen, placed under the protection of the law the little children of the factories, placed under the protection of the law the still more helpless children doomed to the mines and collieries, and to the female children and women, by the measures carried therein, he has said—"You are free, and shall do the work of beasts in the attitude of beasts no more." Lord Ashley has still to emancipate apprentices, to obtain a general registration of accidents, to improve the localities and dwellings of the poor, and to give the compensating benefit of education to those whose early years are spent in labour. Because the first attempts to accomplish these great objects have failed, let no evasions, obstacles, delay, discourage him, nor let him

"Bate a jot—
Of heart or hope; but still bear up and steer Right onward."

"Thomas Ingoldsby," as the head of his school of humour, is treated, as Mr. Horne owns, "with an iron hand," and, we think, somewhat too seriously. The author is more at home in his sketch of Walter Savage Landor, which follows. That of William and Mary Howitt is little beyond a slight notice of their works: the following anecdote is worth quotation:—

In 1832, Mr. Howitt produced the "Book of the Seasons," a volume the publication of which was attended by a circumstance curious in itself, and which proves that young authors not a little discouraged by the opinions of publishers. The "Book of the Seasons," was offered to four of the principal publishing houses and rejected by them; till the author, in disgust, told the gentleman in whose hands it was left, to tie a stone to the MS., and fling it over London-bridge. At length Colburn and Bentley took it: the press with one simultaneous cheer of approbation saluted its appearance; it has since gone through seven large editions.

The brief sketch of Dr. Pusey glances at his doctrines. The other authors included in this volume are G. P. R. James, Mrs. Gore, Captain Marryat, and Mrs. Trollope; Sergeant Talfourd; R. M. Milnes and Hartley Coleridge; Sydney Smith, Albany Fonblanque, and Douglas Jerrold. Their characteristics are thus thrown off:

* * * * * *

The three writers who form the subject of the present paper are so full of points and glances, so saturated with characteristics, that you may dip into any of their volumes, where the book fully opens of itself, and you shall find something like the author. The Sergeant you shall see is always pleased to be so "pleasant," that it is extremely difficult to stop; and it is remarkable that he clears off his jokes so completely as he goes, either by a sweeping hand, or by exposure of them on such fragments as he wants for a bridge to the next one, that you never pause in reading him till fairly obliged to lay down the book. Albany Fonblanque very often gives you pause amidst his pleasantries, many of which, too, most of which, are upon politics, or jurisprudence, or the rights and wrongs of our social doings, so that the laugh often stops in midvolley, and changes into weighty speculation or inward applause. In his combined powers of the brilliant and argumentative, the narrative and epigrammatic, and his matchless adroitness in illustrative quotation and reference, Fonblanque stands alone. Douglas Jerrold is seldom disposed to be "pleasant"—his merriment has a grim look as does not often make you laugh, but make you by the shoulders—as he would say, "See here, now!—look there now!—do you know what you are doing?—is this what you think of your fellow-creatures"! A little of his writing goes a great way, and does not encourage a return to the book for another dose, till next week, or so. The exceptions to this are chiefly in his acted comedies, where there is a plentiful admixture of brilliant levity and stinging fun; but in all else he usually reads you a lesson of a very trying kind. Even his writings in "Punch" give you more of the baton than the beverage "in the eye." Sydney Smith has constantly written articles for the pure enjoyment and amusement of fun; Fonblanque never; Jerrold never, except on the stage—and that was probably only as "matter of income," rather than choice. Sydney Smith, in hostility, is an overwhelming antagonist; his arguments are glittering and keen as a rapier, and well balanced with good sense; they flow onwards with the ease and certainty of a current above a bright cascade; he piles up his merriment like a grotesque mausoleum over his enemy, and so completely and ingeniously that nothing but a mining over by any retort. Fonblanque seems not so much to fight "on editorial perch," as to stand with an open code of social laws in one hand and a two-edged sword in the other, waving the latter slowly as a warning, a grave face, while dictating his periods to the laughing amanuensis. As Jerrold's pleasantest works are generally covert satires, so his open satires are galling darts, or long bill-hook spears, that go right through the mark, and divide it—pull it nearer for a "final eye," or thrust it over the pit's edge.

This is readable gossip, but scarcely rises to the dignity of criticism. The paper, "William Wordsworth and Leigh Hunt," which concludes the volume, has but little that is attractive.

WANDERINGS IN SPAIN IN 1843. By MARTIN HAVERTY, Esq. 2 vols. T. C. Newby.

The title of this work well bespeaks the ever shifting and multicoloured variety of its contents: it is scarcely possible to produce a dull book respecting Spain, and we should pity the man who earned himself notoriety by this means; but Mr. Haverty's work is something better than merely provident: it is not only a sort of guide book to the localities of his route, but it is well stored with information on the past and present political position of Spain, and its prospects; and it contains chapters on the several schools of painting in Madrid. The latter is especially worthy notice, seeing that the object of paramount interest for the stranger in Madrid is decidedly its museum of paintings, which contains the richest collection of works of art in the world, and happens, at the same time, to be less known to foreigners than any of the other great museums of Europe.

We shall not be expected to follow the "Wanderer" from Paris, in January of last year, to Madrid, and back to France, or trace him through the several stages of his Pennsular excursion. It will be more interesting to glance at a few of the novelties of his note-book; before doing which, we should observe that his descriptions have the life and freshness of a recent date, and reflect with the subject to vivid beauty. Our first extract relates to the Limousin, and

MADAME LAFFARGE.

I was within three leagues of Le Glandier, the scene of the well known tragedy in which the unfortunate Madame Lafargue was guilty (or not guilty) of the epithets "unfortunate" and "guilty" are perhaps improperly connected. But when I looked around on that wild, remote, and almost desert district, with its ignorant and superstitious population, in the midst of which the refined, and accomplished and beautiful Marie Capelle, the victim of a mercenary marriage—un mariage de convenance—was doomed to pass her life in solitude, regret, despair, I could not help shuddering at her fate, although I dared not stop to consider whether in that involuntary emotion there was any lurking apology for her crime. Many people in that vicinity believe her innocent; and they say that foreigners, who since her trial, often turn from the high road to visit the old monastery and the forges of Le Glandier, where she lived, generally express sympathy for her fate. There was at all events much of romance and of deep passion in that affair; and how many whom justice has condemned as criminals have thus obtained the sympathy of less rigorous humanity? The hotel-keeper

NEW PRINTS.

"Columbus propounding to the Prior of the Franciscan Convent of Santa Maria de Rabida his theory of a New World." Painted by Sir D. Wilkie, R.A. Engraved by H. T. Ryall, Historical Engraver to the Queen. Moon.—The subject of this splendid conception of the artist is one which grows upon our admiration the more we consider it. It embraces in its theory a thousand things which were once thought to be visionary dreamings, but which since have proved to be glorious realities. The idea of a New World must have been startling even to the inventor himself—how much more so to those whose learning or philosophy could not understand the theorem without demonstration! In his choice of subject Wilkie has been most felicitous: let us now consider his treatment of it. Columbus is seated at a table, with a map before him, on which he is describing with a pair of compasses to the Prior on his right hand, certain measurements and calculations from which he deduces his theory. The calm dignity, the consciousness of truth, the certainty of being in the right, which are depicted on his mild countenance admirably contrast with the different degrees of belief and scepticism which are seen in the faces of the Prior and the other two figures on the left of the picture; whilst, on the other hand, there is a restlessness, a vacancy, in the expression of the boy, which tells you he is yet too young to either understand or be interested in the matter which his master is propounding. But the due behalf him seems to be a little abstracted from the consideration of his bone, for he appears to be listening to something extremely novel and surprising. Altogether it is a magnificent production of the artist's genius. Of its engraving, by Ryall, we know not in what adequate terms to speak. It certainly is one of the most magnificent specimens of stippled engraving we ever witnessed: it has all the strength of line, together with a delicious softness which harmonizes its lights and depths most sweetly.

"Westminster Abbey and Bridge. The Debarkation on Lord Mayor's Day." Painted by David Roberts, R.A. Engraved by Edward Goodall.—This picture is a clever production, as far as composition is concerned, but, as to fidelity to the scene it professes to represent, it is quite absurd. Standing from the assumed position of the spectator, could possibly see the two towers of the Abbey and that of St. Margaret's in the direction they appear; besides, by the laws of perspective, the bridge must seem quite as much within either of the former. The engraving, by Goodall, is most admirably executed. The dark masses of the bridge on the right, the liquid lustre of the middle and fore-part of the scene, with the misty softness of the distance, are made to harmonize most sweetly.

"St. Paul's Cathedral. The Civic Procession on Lord Mayor's Day." Painted by David Roberts, R.A. Engraved by Edward Goodall. A more faithful picture than the last, although the artist had not such graceful materials to work upon; still, however, he has contrived to make a splendid representation of one of the finest architectural glimpses or vistas in the world; which, like Venus semi reducta, perhaps charms us more than if all the dingy houses of Ludgate-hill were out of the way. Lord Mayor's procession is a mere adventitious thing in the picture, and rather spoils it than otherwise. Of Goodall's engraving we can only speak as we did of the former, in terms of the highest praise.

MUSIC.

MR. LOVER'S NATIONAL ENTERTAINMENT.

On Wednesday evening the large Concert Room at the back of the Princess's Theatre was crowded to excess to hear this poet, painter and musician's free and easy, colloquial chit-chat, and most interesting conversation upon the traditions, music, and manners of Ireland. The entertainment, for it was truly such, was assisted by the vocal ability of Miss Cubitt and Miss Rollo Dickson, who sang some of Mr Lover's words, adapted to old Irish airs, most delightfully, each obtaining enthusiastic encores. Mr. Lover himself most musically and feelingly recited some of his own songs, particularly "The Angel's Whisper," which he has most happily wedded to the old Irish melody of "Mary! do you fancy me?" There were several drolleries intermixed with historical illustration, and altogether afforded a most delightful treat to a host of literary musical and artistical friends of the host.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

Mr. Robert Bell's comedy of "Mothers and Daughters," which was produced last year at Covent-Garden with signal success, and then suddenly and unaccountably withdrawn, is about to be republished, with an explanatory preface, containing the history of the whole transaction. Mr. Bell, it appears, has finally vindicated the rights of the drama, and the right of the public to have their verdict respected, obtaining, after lengthened litigation, a full amende from Mr. Bunn.

M. Habeneck, the great chef d'orchestre at the Académie Royale, Paris, has met with a serious injury by falling through a trap-door which had been incautiously left unbolted; his face is much injured, and his wrist dislocated.

Miss Birch. This eminent vocalist has been rapturously received at Berlin, and is shortly to appear at a concert given by the Court. The unrivelled Liszt and the "sorcelle" Milanollo are also to perform.

Madame Thillon.—This lady (late Miss Hind) is engaged at the Princess's Theatre, and will shortly make her appearance in an opera by Auber, to be conducted by the composer in person. This, we believe, will be the first, at least public, visit of the author of "Masaniello" to our metropolis.

Ancient Concerts.—The second concert will take place next Wednesday, under the direction of his Grace the Duke of Wellington. The vocalists engaged for the occasion are Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Dolby, and Mrs. Alfred Shaw; Messrs. Machin and Bennett.

We are glad to perceive a growing disposition to encourage native artists in the announcement that a very clever operetta by Mr. Gratian Cooke—the libretto by Mrs. Gore—is about to be produced at the Princess's Theatre. This is highly creditable to the management, and we trust that it will be also beneficial.

STRAND THEATRE

A new piece, entitled the "Soldier's Orphan," was produced at the Strand Theatre, on Tuesday evening. It is of a serious character, and turns upon the adventures of a certain Colonel Villars, who is living in a remote part of Switzerland, with an only daughter. She becomes enamoured of a young Frenchman, in whom her father the colonel, is very ill written, and it was excellently acted by Bennett, and Mrs. Montgomery, who sustained the part of the heroine. There was a unity about this lady's delineation of the character, which was exceedingly artistical. There was no aiming at making points; but, as a whole, her personation of Julie was beautiful, and the character was completely worked up to a climax at the close. The piece was quite successful.

The Irish Civil Engineer and Head Pacificator.—On Tuesday night, at the conclusion of the meeting of the London Institution of Civil Engineers, the President, Mr. Walker, in allusion to Tom Steele, who was present, said, that before separating he hoped the assembly would give expression to its gratification in having among them again their brother member, "the head pacificator of Ireland." The proposition was received by a crowded meeting with loud applause. Mr. Steele, who, in energetic terms, his fervent gratitude for such a resplendent compliment from such a body, and that he was not going to make a speech, but that, having given utterance to his own feelings, he begged permission to say a few words on the part of his country. He then gave assurance, with deep solemnity, that there had been generated by recent events, in the souls of his countrymen, a spirit of intense gratitude and of attachment to the people of England for their conduct, such as never before existed in Ireland since the creation of the world. He then resumed his seat.

LITERATURE.

A New Spirit of the Age. Edited by R. H. Horne. 2 vols. Smith, Elder, and Co.

Contemporary Biography, as the memoirs of living persons are popularly termed, is rarely attempted with success in our literature. The requisites for the task are careful industry, or rare talent for observation, and sound judgment in estimating motives and appreciating results; conjoined with a peculiar aptitude for seizing upon points of character, and felicitously placing them before the reader. These are first-class qualifications; but the catalogue is scarcely complete, unless we add to it a certain delicacy of treatment, and nice perception of merit, which may be described as the finishing touches of the biographical portrait. Of the difficulty of his work, the author of the volumes before us appears to have been duly sensible, if we may trust the motto he has selected for his title-page:—

"It is an easy thing to praise or blame:
The hard task, and the virtue, to do both."

The title and plan of the work are ably acknowledged to have been taken from Hazlitt's "Spirit of the Age." The author has evidently selected such men as represent certain sections of "the spirit of the age," and by their positions in the public mind are deemed by the author to be entitled to such eminence. Thus, Mr. Dickens is at the head of his class, and Mr. Horne's estimate of his genius is, perhaps, the best written portion of the volume. We are much gratified with the remark, that Mr. Dickens is an instinctive writer; and that his irony and sarcasm are almost invariably found directed against social wrongs, "the insolence of office," against false notions of honour, against mere external respectability, and with a view to defend the poor against injustice and opposition. His favourite method, however, of exposing and attacking wrongs, and "abating nuisances," is through the humour and delineation of characters actively engrossed with their own objects and designs. With theories or systems of philosophy, which are not to his mind, he also deals in a similar style of pleasantry. The opening chapter XIII. of "Oliver Twist" are an admirable instance.

We shall quote a few passages onward:—

A curious circumstance is observable in a great portion of the scenes of the death of Nelly, and her burial, which it is possible may have been the result of harmonious accident, and the author not-even subsequently fully conscious of it. It is that they are written in blank verse, of irregular metre and rhythms, which Southey and Shelley, and some other poets have occasionally adopted. The passage properly divided into lines, will stand thus,—

NELLY'S FUNERAL.

And now the death bell
She had so often heard by night and day,
And listened to with solemn pleasure,
Et'en as a living voice—
Rung its remorseless toll for her,
So young, so beautiful, so good.
Decrepit age, and vigorous life,
And blooming childhood, helpless infancy,
Poured forth—on crutches, in the pride of strength
And health, in the full bloom
Of promise, for mere dawn of life—
To gather round her tomb. Old men were there,
Whose eyes were dim
And nerves trembling—
Grandames, who might have died ten years ago,
And still been old—the deaf, the limb, the lame,
The sightless,
The living dead in many shapes and forms,
To see the closing of this early grave.
What was the death of one child more or less,
To that which still could crawl and creep above it?
Along the crowded path they bore her now;
Pure as the new-fallen snow
That covered it; whose day on earth
Had been as fleeting.
Under that porch, where she had sat when Heaven
In mercy brought her to that peaceful spot,
She passed again, and the old church
Received her in its quiet shade.

Throughout the whole of the above only two unimportant words have been omitted—in and as; "grandames" has been substituted for "grandmothers," and "e'en" for "almost." All that remains is exactly as in the original, not a single word transposed, and the punctuation the same to a comma. The brief homily that concludes the funeral is profoundly beautiful:—

* * * * * *

Oh! it is hard to take to heart
The lesson that such deaths wil teach,
But let no man reject it,
For it is one that all must learn,
And is a truthful, universal Truth.
When death strikes down the innocent and young,
For every fragile form from which he lets
The parting spirit free,
A hundred virtues rise,
In shapes of mercy, charity, and love,
To walk the world and bless it.
Of every tear
That sorrowing mortals shed on such green graves,
Some good is born, some gentler nature comes.

Not a word of the original is changed in the above quotation, which is worthy of the best passages in Wordsworth, and thus, meeting on the common ground of a deeply truthful sentiment, the two most unlike men in the literature of the country are brought into the closest approximation.

* * * * * *

As a general summary of the result of Mr. Dickens' works, it might be said that they contain a larger number of faithful pictures and records of the middle and lower classes of England of the present period, than can be found in any other modern works; and that while they communicate very varied, and frequently very squalid and hideous knowledge concerning the lower, and the most depraved classes, and without the least compromise of the true state of men and things, the author nevertheless manages so skilfully that they may be read from beginning to end without a single shock to the most unaffected delicacy. Moreover, they tend on the whole to bring the poor into the fairest position for obtaining the sympathy of the rich and powerful, by displaying the goodness and fortitude often found amidst want and wretchedness, together with the intervals of joyousness and comic humour. As Hazlitt says of Hogarth, that "he doubles the quantity of our experience," so may it be said of Dickens, with the additional circumstance, that all the knowledge of "life" which he communicates is so tempered and leavened, that it will never assist a single reader to become a heartless misanthrope, nor a scheming "man of the world."

* * * * * *

Mr. Dickens is in private, very much what might be expected from his works,—by no means an invariable coluridence. He talks much or little according to his sympathies. His conversation is genial. He hates argument; in fact he is unable to argue—a common case with impulsive characters who see the whole truth, and feel it crowding and struggling at once for immediate utterance. He never talks for effect. He is the truth-teller of the time. He tells a story admirably, and generally with humorous exaggerations. His sympathies are of the broadest, and his literary tastes appreciate all excellence. He is a great admirer of the poetry of Wordsworth. Mr. Dickens has great personal activity, and is fond of games of practical skill. He is also a great walker, and very much given to dancing Sir Roger de Coverley. In private, the general impression of him is that of a first-rate practical intellect, with "no nonsense" about him. Seldom, if ever, has any man been more beloved by contemporary authors, and by the public of his time. His portrait in the present work is extremely like him.

Translations are regularly made in Germany of all Mr. Dickens's works. They are quite as popular there as with us. The high reputation of the Germans for their faithfulness and general excellence as translators, is well supported in some of these versions; and in others that reputation is perilled. Bad abbre-at Utrecht showed me a letter in the hand-writing of Madame Lafarge. It was addressed to one of the witnesses who appeared at her trial, and was written in an affecting style; and as I closed it, I could not help exclaiming—let the moralist blame me as he will—Pauvre Mme Cappelle!"

The following re-discovery of the natural wealth of the country is very striking:

SILVER MINES OF VALENCIA.

At the period of my visit to this part of Spain, public attention was engrossed by a species of enterprise, which could scarcely be called new, as it was only revived, after having lain dormant for centuries. It is a well known historical fact, that the Carthaginians, and after them the Romans worked innumerable mines in the mountains of the south of Spain, and procured from them great quantities of gold, silver, lead, and other metals. The sides of those mountains are still seen perforated with the mouths of caverns, whence came the silver and gold that glittered round the throne of the Cæsars; yet it did not occur to any of the modern occupiers of the soil, to try if some of the precious metals were not still left within. After the treasures of the new world had been laid open to them, the Spaniards despised the wealth which was contained in the bowels of the earth at home, and accordingly the working of the native mines was discontinued; and thus remained neglected and forgotten until within the last few years. Now, however, a new spring has been given to the energies of the people in this useful branch of industry. Such ore which has been found lying on the surface of the earth, has induced them to explore the mountains for more. Mining companies have been formed, and the prices of shares have risen to an enormous extent. It is quite certain that a great many persons have already, in consequence, realized fortunes; but it is also to be feared that the spirit of speculation has overstepped the bounds of prudence, and that many will find themselves sadly disappointed. Several foundries have been established along the coast, for the purpose of smelting the ores, and separating the silver from the lead, the argentiferous leadmines only being those which are thus exploited. When I was at Alicant, there were two smelting foundries in operation there—one belonging to an English company, and the other to a mixed company of Englishmen and Spaniards, and three others were in progress. Near Carthagena several foundries have been established, and in one, managed by the Messrs. Pellet, Frères of Lyons, I had an opportunity of seeing the progress of the work, and several fine specimens of the ore. For the coppel process, or the separation of the pure silver from the brute metal, it was always deemed indispensable to have the furnace fed with wood; but as that species of fuel could not be procured in sufficient quantities in Spain, unless at an enormous expense, the economy of the foundry-men had, it was hoped, discovered a means of dispensing with it.

One of the most interesting chapters is that which relates the fate of Lieut. Boyd, one of the unfortunate band of patriots who, with their leader, General Torrijos, were massacred under circumstances of peculiar atrocity, at Malaga, in December, 1831: of this most singular and tragic episode in modern Spanish history, the author has learned on the spot several curious and authentic circumstances which have never before been given to the public in a connected form; and he has here woven them into a brief but striking narrative; the following is the conclusion of the tragedy:—

SCENE OF LEGAL BUTCHERY.

The long and gloomy night of the 10th of December at length had an end, and the fatal morning of Sunday the 11th was ushered in. The prisoners, who had laid in their irons the whole night on the cold floor, and who had neither changed their clothing or reposed their limbs upon a bed since the morning they had been compelled to wade ashore among the surges at Fuengirola, were now marched into church to receive the last rites of religion. The good fathers of the convent had been unremitting in their spiritual labours during the night, and I have been told that the horrible scene had such an effect upon one of them, that his reason wandered from that day forward, and that he died a few months only before my visit to Malaga, his shattered intellect still a melancholy memento of the blood-stained horrors he then witnessed. Mr. Boyd was a Protestant, and of course did not participate in the religious service. The hour of ten o'clock arrived, and the first batch of the prisoners, consisting of twenty-five, tied in a line by the arms, were marched from the convent gate to the sea shore, scarcely more than two hundred yards distant. Torrijos was the first in the line; Boyd, his faithful friend, the second; and the venerable Don Flores Caldaron the third. The conduct of all the prisoners was most heroic. Glorying in the cause for which they suffered, they all embraced their leader before they were taken out, and exhibited an example of fortitude and brotherly love worthy of martyrs; all, too, showed the utmost anxiety to save the life of Mr. Boyd, protesting to the last that he was innocent of the charge for which they suffered, for not having known that there was to have been a descent made on Spain until after he had left Gibraltar. When he stood with his devoted comrades in line on the beach, the brave Torrijos commanded the soldiers to fire steadily, but they were unequable of obeying, and did their work in a most bungling manner. After three or four rounds, Torrijos and Caldaron came to the ground, and brought Mr. Boyd, who was tied between them, down also; but he raised himself immediately, and the brutal soldiers had not done with him in that scene of butchery until they sent so many bullets through his head that half of his skull was found in the sand when the body was removed. The massacre of the next batch of twenty-four was conducted in a still more brutal manner, several of the poor victims having been shockingly mutilated. The firing occupied three-quarters of an hour in each case, and the total number shot was forty-nine, the remainder of the prisoners having been only decoy-ducks of Moreno's, and being sent off well provided for to some other part of the country.

Mr. Mark's son (now his successor at the consulate) was sweeping with his carriage on the beach during the massacre of the first batch, and having thrown the British flag over the remains of poor Boyd, brought them in the coach to the Consul's house, followed by a vast crowd, and there the body was conveyed by the same means at midnight to the English cemetery, in which Mr. Boyd's remains were the first that were deposited. Mr. Mark, his son, and his servants were the only persons forming the melancholy cortège. The road lay by the sea shore, and the noise of the surges, which seems never to die away on that beach, was the only sound that interrupted the solemn silence. In the morning the General, on whose already delicate health the harrowing transaction had produced most injurious effects, nevertheless returned to the cemetery, and was assisted by a few friends in consigning the body to the tomb, with the rites of Christian burial. To the bodies of the other victims those last rites were denied. They were piled on the dung-carts of the police, with convicts for drivers, and then cast into a common trench, that of General Torrijos having, at the entreaties of his wretched sister, who was present, been placed apart from the others—a distinction also conferred on the mangled remains of Caldaron, and, I believe, on one or two others.

Pass we to a gayer subject.

ANDALUSIAN COSTUME.

The ladies have not yet changed the Spanish costume. They have, it is true, so far yielded to the spirit of innovation as to have resigned the high comb, and to have lengthened the dress considerably, but still they have faithfully preserved that graceful and distinctive article of Spanish dress—the mantilla—and resisted the introduction of caps and bonnets. The mantilla is most frequently a thin, black veil, which in the street is often drawn over the face, but is generally suffered to fall loosely over the shoulders from the back part of the head, where it is secured by a pin to a wreath of hair. Some ladies, especially in Barcelona and Madrid, occasionally wear bonnets à la Française at the theatre, although it scarcely ever happens that they carry them to the pasco; and when even Italian opera singers and French modistes appear at the promenade in bonnets, whatever may be the peculiar grace of the wearers, the contrast is decidedly favourable to the mantilla. There is a certain air of repugnance equally in the appearance of ladies wearing the Spanish costume; for their respective ranks are generally only to be distinguished by superior elegance of carriage, where most are gifted with that natural grace, or by the degree of costliness in the materials of their dress. There is the same simplicity and absence of affectation to be observed in the duchess who traces her pedigree to the hidalgos of Pelayo's court, and in the wife of the humblest shopkeeper or tradesman. At church they sit upon the same carpet, and in the theatre occupy the same bench in the Cazuela—one, perhaps, distinguished from the other by a richer fan, or finer gloves, or a fairer face, but not in any way conspicuous to the eye at a distance. I have heard elderly ladies complain not only of the innovation of long dresses and the abandonment of the high comb as lamentable encroachments on the national costume, but of the growing taste of young ladies to exchange the traditional black of their ancestors for light colours; the latter, however, must still get credit for their taste in selecting only those colours which are not too brilliant or gaudy. All profusion of ornament is also carefully avoided; and, in fact, that coquetry in dress which we seem to think the natural privilege of the sex is apparently transferred by the ladies of Andalusia to the "lords of the creation" themselves. Hence, if we consider the combination of effect resulting from the graceful figure which, tapering from the head unadorned by art to the flowing drapery of the faldo, or full skirt, realises such artistic conceptions of beauty in the ease and voluptuous elegance of carriage so general among Spanish females; the rich complexion which, as well as the rapid rolling passion within, tells that "Phœbus votes not his horses far from thence;" the gentleness of manner combined with intensity of feeling; and, finally, the large, dark, expressive eye beaming with the soul's emotion; if, I say, we take the combined effect of those qualities all so conspicuous in the Andalusian lady, it is no wonder that even without that beauty which is called classic, she should be the most fascinating of her sex.

One of the early chapters in the second volume narrates "the Story of Don Gaspar, the German artist, together with some less perilous adventures encountered by the author himself in the Sierra Morena," a very agreeable romance of travel. A chapter onward details the opening of the Cortes of 1843, with graphic power of no mean order: here is a spirited trait of the Queen

ISABEL II.

The following anecdote which I have heard, among a great many similar ones at Madrid, may serve to illustrate the manners of the Spanish Court, and the growing character of its young mistress. Ostal ric, a young woman who held a subordinate place in the charge of the royal wardrobe, had gained the good graces of the Queen to such an extent, that her presence became invariably necessary at her Majesty's toilette, and it was suspected that she was favoured with more of the affection of her royal mistress than any one else about her person. The Camarera Mayor, Madame Mina, was foolish enough to be jealous of Catalan, and carried her resentment against her so far as to have her dismissed from the palace. For one day, the absence of Catalina at the usual hour was accounted for by some frivolous pretext; but the next day the Queen refused to prepare for the promenade, unless the favourite domestic came to assist at her toilette, and another excuse was framed, which, after much trouble, sufficed for the moment. On the following day, however, when the hour arrived to prepare for the usual drive to the park, and the Queen found that her favourite was not in attendance, she refused to leave the room, and, having ordered that the guardian should be immediately deprived of the governess the office of the guardian, Señor Argüelles for the moment, that young person was produced. Isabel seized him in a rage, tore it into fragments, and, having ordered that the guardian should be immediately deprived of her office, sent for Catalina, she took her sister by the hand, as if she felt that she was the only friend she had left, and, hastening into another room, closed the door, saying, that neither she nor the Infanta would stir thence until her orders were obeyed. Catalina made her appearance soon after, and it was only then that the daughter of Ferdinand VII. allowed a tear to escape, and uttered, with sobs, the name of her mother, who was far away.

The following will be read with interest:—

CHARACTER OF ESPARTERO.

The character of Espartero, like that of every public man, will of course be variously estimated. His brief connexion with the Exaltados has, in the opinion of many, rendered him responsible for the crimes of that party. No doubt he encouraged many of the unjust acts of the Exaltado statesmen. And by his measures against Barcelona, his massacre of the Ursino generals, and his wanton and profitless bombardment of Seville, he has shown himself capable of excessive cruelty; but it is probable that he never intended to extend his friendship for the Exaltados beyond his approbation of their constitutional principles, as opposed to the conservatism of the Moderados; and it is not likely that his name will descend to posterity, as that of a great, bad man. Adopting the words of a French writer, to whom I have already referred, the military character of the Duke of Victory amounts just to this;—that he is a soldier of ordinary capacity, that his military career is distinguished by no great strategic combination, indicative of extraordinary talents, that he has the good and bad qualities of his country, for he is at once an intrepid man and a boaster, irresolute yet perseverant, a great lover of little means, and that he is blessed with patience and contentment in the highest degree.

Up to the period of the revolution of La Granja, Espartero was only known as a military man. He, then, for the first time mingled in politics, but his career as a statesman can be scarcely said to have commenced until the very eve of his accession to the regency. His acts, however, since that time, have fully proved that he is no statesman. He carried with him, into the management of public affairs, all that indecision of character and fitful energy which was exerted only by starts, and instead of devoting his whole time to the arduous duties for which he was badly fitted, he spent his mornings in bed, playing cards with his ministers, and his days in cultivating flowers on the terraces of the Buena Vista.

A few months since he held in his hands the destinies of Spain; whether vanity and ambition with the temptation of opportunity would not lead him to assume the popular customs of Spain, is related in some sensible remarks on the national character: the account of the bull-fight at Madrid, on Easter Monday last, is a clever piece of writing in its way, by no means common-place, notwithstanding the hundreds of times the brutalities of this pastime (!) have been described: the concluding paragraph is worth extracting.—

HISTORIQUE OF BULL-FIGHTS.

One word on the "origine of bull fights. Some attribute their origin to the Romans, while others seek for it no farther back than the conquest of Mexico. The latter opinion is evidently founded in error, for there is abundant evidence that bull-fights were known in Spain, at least, in the time of the Moors. For centuries the nobles monopolised the office of toreros; and it is said that Charles V. himself, on one occasion, charged a bull with his lance, whilst Don Sebastian, the King of Portugal, was a renowned toreador. Bull-fights were abolished in the revolution of 1820, but restored by Ferdinand VII. in 1823; and since that time regular schools of tauromachy have been established at Cadiz and Seville, where it is brought to a well-defined system, and its exercise being confined to expert "professional" men, but few accidents fatal to human life occur; whereas, at the time it was the pursuit of the nobility and gentry, a man's life was sacrificed at almost every combat. The last remarkable death in the bull-ring of Madrid, was that of Pepe Illo, a famous matador, who, a few years since, while plunging the sword into the bull's neck, fell on the horns of the enraged beast, and was thus dragged three times round the arena, amidst the cheers of the spectators! Many other terrors have, however, been since killed or maimed in that ring. Of the principles on which tauromachy is grounded the leading ones are;—that the bull butts without seeing the object against which he strikes, that he vents his rage on the cloak of the clubs, on the flag of the matador, or on the horse of the picador, instead of the man; and that when he feels the barbed darts of the banderilleros in his neck he halts, and thinks not of pursuing his assailant.

Here we must take leave of the "Wanderings," but not without observing that the work is one of the liveliest that the season has yet produced; it is brimful of entertainment and information, from the author's start from Paris to his bidding, "with grief and loneliness, farewell to Spain!"

FIRST SALE OF THE DEVONSHIRE COLLECTION OF COINS AND MEDALS.

The sale of the first portion of his Grace the Duke of Devonshire's magnificent and extensive collection of coins and medals commenced on Monday, at the rooms of Messrs. Christie and Manson, King-street, St. James's-square. This collection, which ranks amongst the finest in existence, is said to have cost his grace upwards of £50,000 in forming, and contains many valuable and rare specimens of coins of all ages. The sale commenced with a few lots of Greek copper coin, which brought but low prices. In the Greek silver, which followed, were many rare specimens, amongst which we may notice a fine one of the famous Syracuse medallion. This medallion, remarkable alike for the beauty of its workmanship and for its extreme rarity, is the second only which has been sold in this country; the first fetched the sum of £125, and the present one, after severe competition, realised 41 guineas. A specimen of the same medallion was added to the collection at the British Museum three years ago. Several others were fine, as Metapontum, Velia, Croton, Panormus, Ænus, Ægina, of which we have given an illustration, with the tortoise on the obverse, and the indented squares on the reverse.

ÆGINA.

The Roman weights attracted great attention: they consisted of the As and its various parts, and the denarius. The As (from Æs, a piece of copper or brass) was originally of copper or mixed metal, and weighed twelve uncize or ounces. The first coinage of the "As," as money, took place about B.C. 587. The one we have chosen for illustration has on the obverse the head of Janus, and on the reverse the prow of a ship, denoting that Saturn arrived in Italy by sea. The "As" was divided in parts, as the Semis, the Quincunx, the Triens, the Quadrans, &c. &c. The Triens has on the one side the thunderbolt, and on the other the fish, with four pellets, to denote its value, as being the third of the As, and, consequently, of four uncie. We have given one of these, as showing the above distinction. The

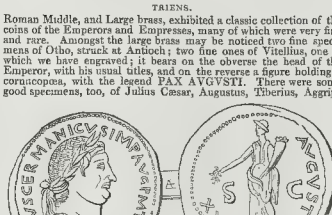
TRIENS.

Roman Middle, and Large brass, exhibited a classic collection of the coins of the Emperors and Empresses, many of which were very fine and rare. Amongst the large brass may be noticed two fine specimens of Otho, struck at Antioch; two fine ones of Vitellius, one of which we have engraved; it bears on the obverse the head of the Emperor, with his usual titles, and on the reverse a figure holding a corncopœa, with the legend PAX AVGVSTI. There were some good specimens, too, of Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Tiberius, Aggrippina, Claudius, Nero, Galba, Vespasian, Titus, Trajan, Marciana, Matidia, &c. &c.



VITELLIUS.

In the Roman Consular silver, were many fine and well-preserved specimens, of the various families. Amongst which we may note the coin of Æmilia, as restored by Trajan, which we have engraved: it is in fine preservation, and very rare. There were likewise some fine ones of Aburia, Æbia, Aunia, Alliena; Antonia, rev. Cleopatra; Antonia, rev. Augustus, &c; Aquilia, Atia, Cocceia, with head of Marc Antony, Crepereia, Didia, Domitia, Horatius, Julia, &c. &c. These all brought high prices. In the Imperial silver were some splendid ones of Augustus, with rare reverses—Agrippa, Claudius, Marc Antony, Julius Cæsar, Poppæa, Clodius Macer, Antonia, Caligula, Otho, Julia, Domitilla, Hadrian, Trajan, Marciana, Matidia, Julia Domna, Didius Julian, Ant. Pius, Pescennius Niger, &c. &c. which all realised great prices.

In the series of Roman silver medallions were many interesting specimens, which sold well. The Imperial gold and the Consular gold were splendid, and formed one of the most important attractions in the catalogue. They contained amongst the rest, fine ones of Junia, Arria, Cestia, Cornelia, Claudia, Domitia, Musidia, Servilia, Brutus, Vibia, Julius Cæsar; Pompey, obv. head of the Emperor, MAG. PIVS. IMP., enclosed within an oak wreath, rev. the heads of Pompey and Cæsar, facing each other, extremely rare, and in the finest state of preservation; Marc Antony, Augustus, &c. This series sold at from sixteen to forty guineas each. Among the bronze Contorniates, were good specimens of Alexander, Augustus, Nero, &c. There were likewise some few fine Padouans.

The sale of this collection, although we may feel regret at its being distributed, cannot fail to promote in a great degree the study of history and the various departments of the arts and sciences. The great attendance of celebrated collectors, antiquaries, and amateurs, both of our own country, and from foreign empires, showed the great degree of interest attached to the sale; and the competition and consequent high prices of several of the lots lead us to anticipate a favourable close. The first day's sale realized between £700 and £800; and the portion now under sale will not terminate until next Monday.

THE NEW ZEALANDERS.

NEW ZEALAND DANCER.

THE NEW ZEALANDERS.

Several circumstances have occurred of late to render the position of New Zealand a subject of pressing interest and importance. We perceive by the Report presented by the Committee of the New Zealand Society, to a meeting of the members on the 6th inst., that, very shortly, Mr. Baldwin, in the House of Commons, will inquire of the Colonial Secretary what means have been used to settle the disputed questions in the colony, and whether an efficient military force will be supplied for its protection. The Society have also lately received from the colony a letter from the town-clerk of Wellington, enclosing a petition, in duplicate, to the two houses of Parliament, and requesting that these should be entrusted to members of the Legislature for presentation. The petition set forth the critical position in which the settlers were placed, in consequence of the state of feeling existing between the natives and the British residents, and dwelt also upon the claims which the population of Cook's Straits, who had contributed nearly £30,000 to the support of the official settlement of Auckland, had upon the sympathy and assistance of the Government; and concluded by praying that an adequate protection should be afforded them, and means taken finally to determine all disputed titles to land in the colony between the natives and the Crown.

NEW ZEALAND WAR DANCE.

A deputation of the Aborigines Protection Society have also had an interview with Lord Stanley at the Colonial Office, to present a memorial on the subject of the aborigines generally, and with special reference to those of New Zealand. Pei Kai-ana, a New Zealand chief, accompanied the deputation.

A meeting of the shareholders of the New Zealand Company was held on Saturday last, when a report was read, stating that the Directors had been compelled to suspend entirely the proceedings of the Company as a colonizing body; and they made representations to her Majesty's Government of the actual state of their affairs, in the hope that some arrangement may be made for the restoration of public confidence, both here and in New Zealand; the Directors then adjourned for a fortnight, to await the reply of the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The report calls attention to the fact that the New Zealand Company have been engaged for five years in forming settlements, whose population now exceeds 10,000 souls, at a cost of above £500,000, (besides a much larger outlay by the settlers themselves), but that its title to land is yet unsecured by the grant of a single acre from the Crown.

We are persuaded, therefore, that the annexed Notes and Illustrations, from a Correspondent, for some time resident in New Zealand, will be received as well timed.

The three annexed engravings are from coloured sketches, made by our Correspondent during his recent sojourn in the colony.

The islands of New Zealand, situated between the 34th and 48th degrees of south latitude, are distant in an easterly direction about 1200 miles from Sydney, New South Wales. The country partakes of a mountainous character generally; a few volcanos, both active and extinct, rear their peaked summits in the northern island; whilst in the southern, a vast range of mountains, capped with snow, traverses its whole length. A comparatively low and fertile tract extends from the base of Mount Egmont to the sea, forming a rounded promontory, the N.W. aspect of which has been selected for the colony of New Plymouth. An extensive level district, covered with grass, has also been found in the Southern Island, reaching along the coast from Kai-kora, or lookers-on, to a great distance southward, containing Port Cooper, the site of the intended Scotch Settlement, New Edinburgh. With these exceptions, the land mostly available for cultivation is found on the sides of hills when not too steep; in narrow vallies, and strips of alluvial deposit by the sides, and at the embouchure of rivers, few of which are navigable.

There is some difficulty in giving what may be considered a general description of the natives; they being at present in a state of transition from barbarism and hereditary love of war, to peace and the arts of civilized life. Tribes exist in the interior, which, from their little intercourse with Europeans, remain in a savage state; others have, by the exertions of missionaries, experienced a complete change in their habits and disposition. Some are so far educated as to correspond by letters with their distant friends. Here and there, however, linger some old chiefs, whose early habits of warfare and cannibalism have left dispositions of a dangerous character, as was instanced in the late unfortunate affray and massacre at Wairoa.

The New Zealanders cultivate their gardens with care and neatness, the principal products being maize, potatoes, and water melons. Pigs are domesticated, and taken almost as much care of as the children, yet are seldom used as an article of food, excepting at feasts, fish being daily eaten by those who reside near the coasts. It was denied by Mr. Yates that any freshwater fish existed: an error which probably arose from their being caught only by night. The rising generation neglect the "tattu," because the "pakha," or white man, does not practise it. They imitate the English as far as they can, are very clever at a bargain, and evince a decided preference for European articles of dress. Many ludicrous mistakes were at first made from their ignorance of the use of our garments, such as putting on a shirt as a pair of trousers, tying trousers by the legs round the neck, &c. The canoes are made of various lengths, with the head generally carved grotesquely. Those used for fishing will carry from 10 to 20 men, whereas some old war-canoes are double, and carry with ease more than 100 persons.

There are at present four English colonies, and one French (Akaroa), in New Zealand.

1st. Auckland, the capital, situated in the harbour of Waitemata, North Island, was founded by Governor Hobson, in 1840. It enjoys a delightful climate, and may contain about 3000 inhabitants. Wood is rather scarce; and the soil in the neighbourhood is a stiff clay, principally covered with fern.

2nd. Wellington, in Port Nicholson, was commenced under the superintendence of Colonel Wakefield, in 1839. The harbour is land-locked and capacious; but subject, like every portion of Cook's Strait, to sudden and violent gales, which blow for days together, changing suddenly from the N.W. to S.E., and vice versâ. Mountains surround Port Nicholson, and offer little temptation to the agriculturist; but where the vale of the Hutt is not subject to inundation, some rich land has been cultivated. Cattle, however, manage not only to exist, but to get fat, in places where it would be deemed an impossibility.

3rd. New Plymouth was commenced in 1841, and is situated in Taranaki, which has been called by the natives, the garden of New Zealand. Here there is only a roadstead, open to the N.W. winds, which, however, do not blow "home." Moorings have been laid down for the accommodation of ships. The natives are very few, the country having been almost depopulated by war about nine years since. The soil is good, comprising both fern and timber land; and the district is tolerably sheltered by Mount Egmont from the S.E. winds. The settlers having turned their attention almost entirely to agriculture, are in advance of the other settlements.

4th. Nelson, situated at the bottom of Blind Bay (Tasman's Gulf), on "Nelson Haven," was commenced early in 1842. This settlement was progressing favourably under the superintendence of the late lamented Captain Wakefield, but the available land in the neighbourhood of the town is not so extensive as was at first stated.

These are the three Company's settlements, and contain from 8000 to 10,000 inhabitants. English are also found scattered along the coasts, many having intermarried with the natives.

The French settlement at Akaroa is small; having a good harbour, it is much resorted to by whalers. The climate of New Zealand is temperate and one of the healthiest in the world. The temperature in the summer rarely exceeds 75 degrees; in the winter it is generally from 55 degrees to 60 degrees, at noon. The winds are constantly on the move, often violently. White frosts occur in the winter, but are soon dispelled by the rising sun. Shocks of earthquakes are occasionally felt, but they have done no damage. There is never a deficiency of rain, and the whole country is well watered.

The soil is generally thin, probably from the trees being evergreens, and not shedding their leaves periodically in a mass. It is capable of producing everything that is grown, from the south of France to the north of Scotland. There are no snakes nor indigenous animals; a small species of musquito is plentiful in the woods only, and an irritating minute sand-fly teazes you everywhere, except in the Bay of Islands. The birds are delightful songsters, commencing before day-break and continuing to after sunrise. There are parrots, pigeons, and wild ducks, and numerous sea-birds frequent the coasts.

ROSE, A NEW ZEALANDER.

The exports are at present flax (Phormium Tenax), potatoes, and whale-oil, to which will no doubt shortly be added pork, and perhaps corn, when a scarcity exists in Australia. The government is administered by a Governor (Captain Fitzroy) and a Legislative Council, partly elected by the Governor, and partly composed of the officers under the Crown.

DESTRUCTION OF THE BRIG HIBERNIA.

The sketch represents the brig Hibernia, as she lay in the channel, on Tuesday morning last, at low water. The details of the catastrophe are as follows:—

On Monday afternoon whilst the Hibernia, of Dover, was proceeding up the channel entrance of the Middlesbro'-on-Tees dock, she grounded on the south shore—and about eight o'clock, in consequence of the steep nature of the bank, she fell over, and the crew had to leave her. At ten o'clock, it was discovered that the vessel was on fire, and that the fire had obtained so much hold that it was impossible to save her. The fire is supposed to have originated from the forecastle stove or lamp; at midnight the flames were at the greatest height. At the time our sketch was taken the decks were completely burnt away, and the vessel is a mere shell.

DESTRUCTION OF "THE HIBERNIA," MIDDLESBRO' DOCK.

MDLLE. FAVANTI.

"What's in a name?" says Shakspeare. We reply, "every thing." Favanti hath a sweet sound it is far more musical than Edwards! But does it make the song the sweeter, or would Rubini lose his voice, if a fortune were left to him on condition of his taking the name of SMITH? Alas! for fashion! Had the lady above mentioned married an Italian gentleman, we should not have been surprised to see her announced as Mdme. Favanti, just as Emma Howson was called Mdme. Albertazzi; but to see Mademoiselle Favanti in the place of Miss Edwards, (formerly, we believe, of our Royal Academy) rather puzzles and perplexes us. Be this as it may, the lady is a vocalist of most extraordinary powers, and has had a brilliant success in Italy. Her voice possesses prodigious volume and depth, and will have full scope to exhibit its powers in the part selected for her début. It is curious to remark that La Cenerentola has been chosen by two or three English vocalists on their return from a successful continental trip: Mdme. Albertazzi, for instance, Mrs. A. Shaw, &c.

M. DUPREZ.—The public are rapidly hastening towards a just estimation of this great artiste's consummate skill, every night of his performance proving to be more and more appreciated. The test of this is, that Donizetti's opera of "The Favorite" is postponed until Monday next, such is the great attraction of "Guillaume Tell."

PARIS.—A new tenor, M. Mengis, has made his début at the Opera Comique, in the rôle of the Dauphin, in the doubtfully esteemed opera of "Charles VI.," with considerable success.

Mr. J. L. HATTON. It will be gratifying to all liberal and cosmopolite lovers of music, to learn that this clever composer (our compatriot) has produced his opera of "Pascal Bruno" at Vienna, for the benefit of the great Staudigl, with complete success. At the conclusion of the piece he was loudly called for, and was led on by Lutzer and Staudigl, to meet the enthusiastic congratulations of a numerous and judicious audience.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

On Tuesday evening last, Herold's opera of "Zampa," originally produced at the Opera Comique, in Paris, and of course in French, was presented in an Italian garb, which did not sit gracefully upon any of the Italian representatives, not even upon the talented and versatile Persiani. They either would not, or could not, sing the French music. The overture, by the way, the best composition of the opera, was admirably performed, and warmly encored. Persiani, in many instances "deposuit rudius," and sang in a purely simple style. In the ballad "Colà nel suol d' Etruria," she proved that she could effect as much by artless simplicity (or rather ars celandi artem) as she generally does by the florid display of her volant and most obedient voice; her true expression amply atoned for the absence of her unrivalled power of ornament, and proved that, after all,

"Beauty unadorn'd is adorn'd the most."

Her duet in the second act with Corelli (who by-the-by is a singer of no ordinary merit), "Nil Videre," was loudly and deservedly encored. Fornasari was expected to have personated the hero of the opera, but through indisposition of some kind or other, the arduous task devolved upon a débûtant, an "infelix avis, flebiliter genens," with the misnomer of Felice, for he was anything but happy in his personation of the reckless Don Juan-like part of Zampa. He too was labouring under evident indisposition, but occasionally gave proofs that he could do better things. The comic parts of Rita and Daniele were ably sustained by Mdlle. Bellini and Signor F. Lablache.

To those who have accustomed their ears to the florid strains of the modern Italian school, this opera may probably seem heavy and dull: but there is an union between its melody and harmony combined with the sentiment which they both have to illustrate, that is not often to be found in the generic style, that is now, alas! so much in vogue. Music at one time was an echo to the sense—now she is made to pipe the same lilt to a funeral or a marriage feast: Rossini's "Stabat Mater" is an instance.

Herold is of too good a school to be vulgarly popular; we may call him, in his art, the grandson of Gluck, an immortal composer, who after all is but known to a few, but which few will send down his glorious name to all distinguishing posterity. Who that ever heard it can forget the beautiful "Je pars demain," in Herold's opera of "Marie?" The very soul of tenderness pervades it. His style is rather comprehensive than hybrid, it is a happy amalgamation of French (his native), German, and Italian; the peculiarities of each being artistically and poetically seized upon and appropriated in a novel shape.

It is a subject of deep regret that such an ornament to Music's shrine should have been so early taken from it, and laid untimely "in cold obstruction."

Herold was a man devoted to his art, but doomed, like many others of greater pretensions, to the alternate reception of applause and censure, triumph and failure. He produced many operas in his time, in Italy, Germany, and France; and concluded a short life of repeated disappointments at the age of forty.

HAYMARKET THEATRE.—TAMING OF THE SHREW.

The revival of this curiosity of dramatic construction in its original form was a hazardous experiment in these days, when the scenic display of the painter, the gorgeous costumes of the taylor—the clever tricks of the machinist, and a story told in Pantomime, intermixed with graceful dancing, together with an inconveniently crowded stage, are the "artes et insidiæ" by which a manager can hope for public patronage. It proved successful, nevertheless, and shews that the mere gew-gaw accessories of the stage are not necessary when there is the "mens divinior poetæ" present. None but the genius of Shakspeare could entertain an audience through so many scenes undiversified by anything but the Proteus wit of the immortal Swan of Avon. The said wit, however, is often coarse and puerile, with miserable plays upon words, but ever and anon comes a passage of transcendant intellect and knowledge of humanity. The Induction (which no doubt gave birth to the plot of "The Devil to Pay," in which Mrs. Jordan and Mrs. Davison were so great in the part of Nell) was represented for first time in our days, and most admirably, too, particularly the part of Christopher Sly, which was personated "ad unguem" by Strickland, for as "The thirsty earth soaks up the rain,

And drinks, and gapes for drink again," so did the tinker of his embodiment, "a thirsty soul" too,

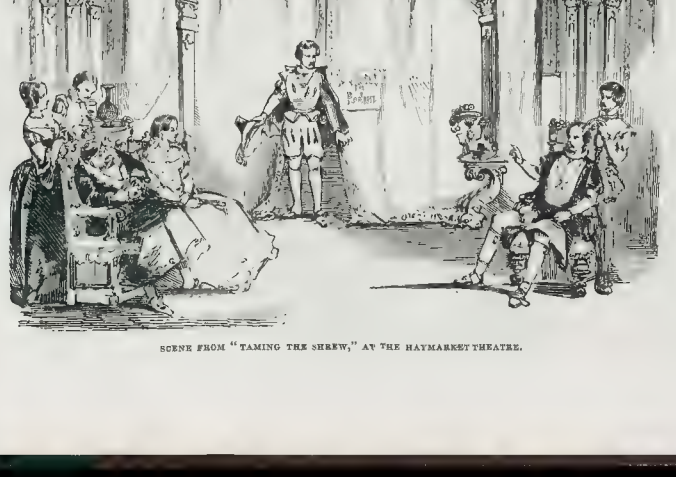
"Accept the challenge and embrace the bowl."

As to the "getting up" of the piece nothing could have been better. Scenery there was not, but its absence was not missed in the general effect produced by some excellent acting. Mrs. Nisbett was by far the best Katherina (as the bills call her) that we have ever seen. A word or two here relative to the change in the spelling of the names of the dramatis personæ. Petruccio is certainly more consonous with the general pronunciation than Petruchio, in which the ch would be hard; but why retain Katherina, which in two instances is anti-Italian?

Webster played in some of the boisterous scenes of the comedy with great spirit, but, to use a vulgar saying, he cowed rather than humbled the saucy Kate. there was more of the rude tyrant than the haughty gentleman about him. Mrs. Nisbett gave a new phase to the character of Kate; she did not suddenly sink into the abject slave of her husband's whim, but now and then broke out into short ebullitions of the hasty temper she was wont to indulge in. Her softening down to gentleness was "fine by degrees" and her irascibility "beautifully less." In short, as we have before said, her Kate was the best we have ever seen, for through the veil of the termigant the lady was still visible.

Miss Julia Bennett as Bianca, "walked in beauty," for she had little else to do. The rest of the dramatis personæ remain in the statu quo of their respectability. By the way, it cannot be a great treat for Strickland and his fair attendants (one standing all the while) to remain on the stage, or one side of the proscenium, before the public. It is true the interval between the supposed acts is very short, but it is a pity that Sly could not have been allowed to indulge in a running commentary upon what he "doubly sees," which would be a great relief to the monotony of the scene. The tout ensemble is excellent in the extreme, and proves that the lessee, or proprietor, which ever he may be, is a man of most judicious management and speculation. The scene which precedes the drama is not in the happiest manner of Marshall—it is too clay-y—and the Shakperian overture is a sorry medley of tunes that have been huddled together most clumsily. It is said in the bills to be the composition (?) of Sir H. R. Bishop; if so, we are sorry for it.

The whole revival, however, is got up in good spirit, and evinces much taste and veneration on the part of the liberal manager for the true and legitimate drama.



SCENE FROM "TAMING THE SHREW," AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE.

THE MERCHANT'S DAUGHTER.

BY MISS PARDOE.

BITTERLY again did she reproach herself on the morrow, when, contrary to his usual habit of restlessness, which prompted him to quit his bed at dawn, as his unhappy child resumed her labour, he lay speechless and supine, with closed eyes and motionless hands, and even put away with a depreciatory gesture the food which she tendered, and which he habitually devoured with greediness. The day wore on, and still he retained the same quiet position, seeking no amusement betraying no uneasiness; and a vague terror grew upon Aline. Might this be only a new phase of his disorder? or could it be the precursor of approaching death? Had cold and hunger indeed done their work? or must she prepare herself for some great, and it might be, terrible change, in the nature of his malady? Suddenly a frightful thought grew upon her, an apprehension too horrible for contemplation, and she almost shrieked aloud as she asked herself whether she had ever heard or read of an instance in which harmless idiocy had grown into madness—raving, delirious, frantic madness, ruthless alike towards others, and towards itself. Providentially for Aline she could remember no such appalling precedent; but let not the reader be deceived; it was not for herself that she feared, even in the first moment of her terror; her sole dread was lest their stern landlady should thrust them out, lest the strong hand of power would be stretched out, and that she should be separated for ever from her beloved and unhappy father.

Wearily the day wore on. Aline dared not abandon her work, even to devote herself wholly to her parents but she drew her stool close to his bedside; and, as she pursued her cruel task, strove to arouse him into partial consciousness, and to encourage him to converse. Again and again she proffered to him the morsel of bread and the draught of water which should have been his morning meal; he repulsed both with a silent gesture; and the habitually garrulous and restless idiot still remained motionless and speechless upon his wretched couch. And thus the hours sped by; and down fell the shades of evening, rendered more dense and dreary by a furious storm of rain, which was driven violently against their solitary window by the fitful gusts of wind. The crazy casement shivered and rattled in its ill-fitting frame; and Aline, compelled by the darkness to lay aside her task, cowered still more closely beside her father's bed, as she pressed her cold hands over her throbbing temples and aching eyes. Light she had none, for she had exhausted her last rushlight on the previous night, in the vain hope of completing the shirt upon which she was then working, before she retired to rest; but to her this was no deprivation; it was rather a happiness to shut out the misery by which she was surrounded; and so she sat there in the cold darkness keeping her dreary watch over her idiot-father; shrinking alike from her memories of the past, and from her forebodings for the future; and striving to make the present all in all, and to offer up her prayer of thankfulness that they were in possession of sufficient food for the morrow.

She was suddenly and strangely aroused from her reverie by the voice of her father, not uttering the jibbering and meaningless sounds to which she had now become so painfully accustomed, but full, and free, and melodious, as she remembered it to have been in their days of happiness; and a solemn feeling of awe stole over her as she listened, without daring to interrupt the stream of his discourse

"Give her to me,' he said earnestly, "and young, pure, and beautiful as she is, I will deserve her. Come to us in England. If you seek gold, I will pour it into your lap in a Danaë-like shower: gold is to me what the beach-sand is to the ocean—a thing of no account—a toy to dally with, to cast forth upon the world, and then to draw back into the vortex of my own power. despise gold for its own sake; I have always done so; but I will learn to love it, if this mammon-worship will secure her happiness." And then his wandering fancy abruptly changed its direction; and he spread forth his emaciated hands as if in courteous greeting, as he said in the bland accent of kindness, "Nay, nay; cheer up, my young friend; merit and genius must always ultimately make their way, even in this work-o'-day world. Let me hear no more such dark forebodings. It is easy to talk of starvation; but believe me when I tell you that it is a mere chimera. It is impossible to starve in London——"

Aline shuddered as she listened.

"Come," resumed the bland voice, "you shall paint two pictures for my gallery; and, in order to change the current of your gloomy fancies, the one shall be the Visit of the Queen of Sheba to King Solomon, surrounded by all her costly offerings; and the other, the Payment of the Tribute money to Cæsar. Do not be niggardly in its amount, and I will deal with you, on their completion, in as proportion to your own liberality."

Oh! it was very terrible to that young girl to sit there, amid storm and darkness, worn down with toil, and sick with famine, and to listen to words like these, which brought vividly before her a period that she struggled to forget, lest its memory should overthrow her reason; and yet there was a strange charm in the harmonious modulations of the accustomed and beloved voice which was pouring out the tide of idle words. After a while, there was once more a short pause, and then again the silence was broken by a new fantasy.

"Gold! I must have gold! It is for my child—for Aline. She shall be a bride for the proudest noble in the land. Will not that lovely forehead grace a ducal coronet? Do you hear? I must have gold! It shall be all hers—when I am dead. I cannot give her all till I am dead. There is a strange attraction in the yellow, bold-faced metal; I never thought to love it as I do. I will have no argument: nothing but gold—gold. Aline will lay us side by side in a stately sepulchre. She will not heed its cost, for the ruins is bottomless, and all its sides are one. Who bids me buy a peerage? That, indeed, were empty, tawdry vanity! No, no; I will die as I have lived, plain Arthur Freeling—a millionaire: it may be, that is destiny—but an unbilled commoner, proud of the honest name I leave behind me."

"Heaven sustain me!" murmured Aline, as she strove to still her suffocating sobs. "Will this fearful night never end?

"My darling Aline! my sweet daughter!" pursued the unconscious speaker "come, and let us gaze together on the beauties of the starry heavens. Is not the moonlight glorious? Look yonder, where it falls upon the lake, and, fringing the summits of the lumes with silver, seems to have collected all its brightness around your mother's favourite seat. And do you mark how beautiful that mother looks, Aline, in the midst of the pure radiance which enfolds her like a par ment? Did we not know that she has but this moment left our side, we might believe her to be a disembodied spirit, the beatified dweller in a better world."

As he spoke thus, the soul-stricken girl silently rose, and, hanging over him, gently grasped his hand.

"And do you know, Aline," continued her father, returning the pressure, which did not for an instant sever the thread of his thoughts, but rather appeared to knit them together more closely; "do you know, now that I look upon her again, she seems strangely pale; and yet no sorrow can have touched her since her mother died, for what has she to do with care?"

"Father! dear, dear father!" gasped out his agonised listener.

"The night air is growing chill," continued Freeling, with a shiver which made the crazy bedstead totter under him; "and the moon's light is failing rapidly. I can scarcely see your mother now. Eugenie! dear Eugenie! come in, come in; you will be frozen to the very heart by the keen blast that is soughing through the leaves, although all was so bright and calm an instant back." And once more he shuddered violently as if suffering under sudden ague.

Again and again did the unhappy Aline endeavour to profit by this part al gleam of reason, to win some sign of recognition from her fast-sinking father; but service as she was, she felt a withering conviction that these were the last fitful flashings of the expiring lamp of life, and that each moment which passed by was she returned unrecognised, would rob the remainder of her term of life, however brief might be its duration, of some sweet and consoling memory, which would afford her at once solace and strength to bear up amid the misery the lonely, hopeless misery—which must then be her lot. But, alas! she listened, and she strove in vain. The vital spark was quivering in its socket; the feeble frame was already burnt out. Feeling was to die, as he had lived since his misfortune, ignorant of his reverses, and unconscious of the forlorn and desolate condition of his once-idolized child.

Throughout the remainder of that wretched night, he wandered, at intervals, into the past; recalled scenes of unequal happiness, or played over again the feverish game of speculation and anxiety; lost himself in complicated calculations of his wealth; and cried aloud for gold to enrich his heiress.

It was a scene to make the heart quail, and the spirit shrink, when the cold dawn glanced feebly in through the uncurtained window of the miserable garret; while the rain poured down in torrents, plashing heavily as it rebounded from the roof, and fell sullenly on the earth without; and the loose rattling shingles of the wind rattled the fastenings of the worn out door and casement, awakening a dissonance to unite the dull ear of the dying man refused to hearken. But the watcher heard it all; and, as she drew the scanty coverlet of her squalid pallet about her shoulders, her dim eye turned from her father to the growing light, and then slowly lingered upon every object within the desolate chamber; until, with a sudden start, she rose feebly from her seat, and snatching up her work from the table, where she had laid it on the previous night, with a long-drawn sigh of patient and hopeless endurance, resumed her ungracious toil.

But why prolong a description so replete with misery? Suffice it, that as the daybeam grew more bright, the strength of the sick man faded. Nature had exhausted all her resources, various as they are. The total deprivation of exercise and pure air—for poor Aline had possessed no time to lead her mindless charge abroad into the revivifying sunshine, and to renew the weakened springs of life by the genial breezes of Heaven—combined with an utter want of wholesome nourishment and warmth, had worn the once strong man into a mere shadow of his former self; and just as the world began to waken about them, and the stir of the busy crowd in the street below to mingle with the dreary sighing of the wind, he fell asleep for ever, without a struggle and without a pang—so gently and so calmly that Aline never knew the precise moment which had made her wholly an orphan.

And then came the hideous bustle and business which follow closely and remorselessly upon the poor man's death. The tread of heavy and hurried steps—the clamour of coarse and jealous voices—the cold questions and mean upbraidings—the parish coffin, and the pauper grave. And Aline stood upon the brink of that unsightly grave, and she saw her father thrust into its shallow void, and she heard the service read roughly and coarsely, as a form—a remnant, and she saw the clods hurled by a slovenly hand upon the formless chest in which they were enclosed; and then, without a tear, she tottered back to her solitary garret, for she had no longer a home to weep for. Her relatives were as at an end, her miserable watch was over; life was to her a blank; and she was beyond either hope or care in this world.

Pleasant indeed would be our final task if it were here permitted to us to chronicle the blessed advent of some good Samaritan, with heart and purse alike overflowing, who should rescue our virtuous and ill-fated heroine from the death of misery and famine which was about to terminate her trials; but alas! such startling, sudden, and most happy contrasts are, in nine hundred and ninety nine cases out of every thousand, the mere privilege of the romance writer. Human life and human destiny are rarely so interwoven; and it is at best but a fitful glance over the wretchedness of an individual, while the great principle of sorrow is suffered to pursue its work of ruin and the selfish exotism of the strong to overwhelm the struggling efforts of the weak. Nor are the unbridled appetites of the Juggernaut car of speculative cupidity are permitted to crush the moral and vital energies of the victims of poverty and hardship, so long must the simple story of Aline Freeling be a mere "oft-told tale;" for the proud necessities which abound themselves in uncomplaining silence, and the high-minded toil which prefers the pangs of an honourable hospital to the contempt and scorn of the fed and insolent charity, will continue to deluge the world in tears that will ascend to Heaven, and fall back in curses upon the supine and grasping spirits that have called them forth!

Aline Freeling died in the wretched garret which had been so long her home. Here!—the home of the daughter of luxury and affection—whose infancy was cradled upon velvet—whose youth looked on wealth as a mere toy for her hand succoured it—whose every impulse had been sympathy, and tenderness, and love. Such was her death—alone in the night-watches, shivering upon her straw—her wasted and wan features covered by her scanty coverlet—her energy—exhausted by exertion, heart-broken by despair—friendless, aimless and hopeless. She had laboured mechanically while power remained; from daybreak to set of sun she had sat bending over the needle, plying it with unremitting employment. While her father lived she had wrought with wild and untiring energy, for she had a holy incentive to exertion; but when all was over—when her last parent, her friend indeed was lost to her for ever—when the frightful conviction was forced upon her, that she was utterly desolate—what marvel that her hand failed as her heart sank, and that it required a week to enable her to complete what had once been the task of a single day.

Enough of this dark theme. She died: and when her iron landlady, for the last time, approached her pallet to put her forth, that a new victim might be installed in her squalid room, she lay still and stark before her; and in her long, thin, and almost fleshless fingers, was still grasped the purchase of her next meal of bread. She was wrought by destiny even in death, for her task was already half accomplished; the shirt was partially completed; she had earned a penny, which was never paid!

(The End.)

NATIONAL SPORTS.

YACHTING.

Now the Queen is all for the sea service.

The aquatic season of 1844 will be right royal and goodly marked with a white stone in the log of old Neptune. Its prospect, as regards the two first sailing societies in the world, may conveniently be discussed during this, the interregnum, dividing the sports of the winter from the pastimes of the spring—when public demonstration has been given of the intention of the sovereign to unfurl, as banner of the pro nde st of our national sports, the flag that in less happy times so long and so gloriously braved "the battle and the breeze." The Queen has now a sea palace—no amphibious conceit like the pavilion at Brighton—a Chinese affectation only fit to lodge the skipper of a junk but a home well beseeming the representative of Britannia—on the bosom of whose glad green lawn float gallant navies, with Spithead, Portsmouth, Gosport, and Haslar, for a background. In our last a design was given of Osborne House, as seen by those who look on its sea front—and we spoke of it as the mere residence, for the present yachting season, at least, of our gracious sovereign. Since then we have visited it—loitered through its park—arural region but wanting in venison—a great discouragement to the flavour over the poetry of the place—and stood within its picturesque bay.

> A pleasant spot, beside the sea,
> Where Naids and Nereids love to meet;
> Where the waves, beneath the star-light, flee
> To the yellow sands with silver feet.

This harbour lies about two miles E.S.E. of the estuary of the Medina, which separates the towns of East and West Cowes. These are the head-quarters of the two leading yacht clubs of England, the R. Y. S. having its club-house at the latter, and the R. T. Y. C. at the former. Last season was the first in which these distinguished societies mustered together for the purpose of joining fleets on the prime, and company at the board. During the present they will rendezvous in the Solent in force and bravery as yet unknown; and there is reason to expect, after a fashion to remind us of the olden chivalry. When in attendance on the royal fleet, it is proposed that each yacht, in addition to the flag of its particular club, shall bear a banner of silk emblazoned with the coat of arms of its owner.

The appearance of the Queen at the head of these clubs, of each of which she is the munificent patroness, will be a good omen for the prosperity of the Royal Yacht Squadron, in which unhappily jealousy and disunion have lately prevailed. One cause of this we believe to be the introduction of the system of handicapping into its sweepstakes and plate races. The handicap is a fertile source of discontent everywhere, and we shall be glad to see it banished from all our sporting contests on shore as well as afloat. Above all we would see nothing continued likely to interfere with the existence and prosperity of our sailing societies. The slow but sure benefits they have worked for our marine in time of peace are not as generally known as they deserve to be. At the present moment there is on the stocks of her builder, White, of East Cowes, a vessel launched by him for a member of the R. Y. S.—the Water Witch, which went for something like a six years' cruise to the coast of Africa, on a slaving voyage, the most trying service in our navy in time of peace, that has returned with every spar, cloth, and inch of standing rigging she left with her, a fact which will no doubt hear and shake their heads. To yachting we owe the vast improvements in the texture and appearance of our canvass, the fabric of our cordage, the mechanical proportions observed in ship architecture, in short in the whole of our marine economy. To a zealous capable of being made more convenient for its office—your amateur loves to feed well at sea; he directs and suggests alterations, finds the money to design and accomplish them, and anon the navy adopts the plan, and Jack gets a more orthodox "blow out."

In the yards of East and West Cowes, the Whites and Ratseys are up and at it. The Flower of Yarrow—Lord Conyngham's—is nearly ready for sea, while Joe White is grinding the old Menai young again. She is being new decked, new copp ered, new masted, new spar'd, and new rigged, which is not far off being made a new ship. On the same slip is another old one—launched in the same year with the Menai, some nineteen agone we think—being overhauled in a similarly whole-and-sound manner. The sailing amateur who wants a craft ready made, may pick and choose at these marts, where a large assortment is for sale, with brooms at their mast heads. Marine stores, cables and cordage, are in excess of direction—a whole town of them east of the river, on the road to Osborne. The Yachting season, of 1844, opens on Thursday, the 4th proximo, by a trip down the river of the Royal Thames Yacht Club. "Ars floreat Cœta."

BETTING AT YATTENDALL'S.

MONDAY.—Whatever may be the amount of betting this afternoon, was derived, not from its extent but from the effect produced on the marketable value of some of the favourites. Thus, for the Chester Cup, Pharoah upon a moderate investment, was 8 to 1 against him; but by the influence of an opposing party, small in number but bent on mischief, one was reported to 30 to 1; Red Deer and Tecita were talked up four or five points. The Prior had bona fide backers at an improving price; Vatel's friends plenty of supporters, was promoted to 25 to 1. Nor was the Derby without its mutations: the Ugly Buck once more obtained a decided lead of Rattan; how long he will keep it who shall say? Large sums were laid on the latter,

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Since Monday, several fresh arrivals of English wheat have taken place up to our market, and the stands to day, exhibited a full average number of samples. Even the finest qualities met a very dull sale, and prices had a downward tendency. There were no arrivals of foreign wheat except on lower terms The supply of barley was not large, yet the sale for it was heavy, at barely stationary prices Malt sold at a very was not large, yet the sale for it was heavy, at barely stationary prices Malt sold at a decline of 2s per quarter. The demand for oats, beans, peas, and flour was extremely inactive.

Tea.—The increased arrivals of tea, which have caused the demand for it to rule heavy, are not in variation can be noticed in prices. A public sale of 785 packages of Assam tea, is yet no variation can be noticed in prices. A public sale of 785 packages of Assam tea, is appointed for the 2nd prompto. The deliveries during the present year show an increase of almost one-third over the corresponding period in 1843.

Sugar.—Some very extensive imports of most kinds of sugar have been reported this week, and which have caused considerable dullness in the market, in general, and prices have declined from 6d to 1s per cwt. In the refined market, standard lumps may be purchased at 75s. bonded crushed 72s per cwt.

Coffee.—The speculation noticed some time since in Ceylon coffee has much subsided, good ordinary being now only 63s per cwt. All other kinds of coffee are dull, at barely late rates

Cocoa.—Foreign is very dull on sale, and prices are with difficulty supported.

Rice.—At public sales, Bengal produced 10s to 10s 6d per 1cn bonded white, and 9s to 9s 6d for what was damaged.

Rum.—A good demand exists for all kinds of rum, and the late advance in prices is well supported. Proof Leewards are 2s 1d to 2s 3d per gallon Indigo.—This market is very fine, with a good business doing. The next quarterly sale will amount to about 2500 chests.

Provisions.—For Irish butter, the demand is active, at a trifling improvement in value. Carlows are worth 3s to 92s; Corks, 90s to 92s; Limericks, 88s to 90s; Waterfords, 86s per cwt. The bacon trade is active, at rather enhanced rates, prime singed sides producing 40s to 42s per cwt. Lard is again 1s to 2s per cwt. dearer. Hams are in better request. Nelson's Patent Opaque Gelatine to be at least equal in strength and purity, if not superior to the best Isinglass, for every culinary purpose. It is entirely free from any impregnation of acid, such as I have found to exist in other kinds of gelatine in the London market." The Opaque Gelatine is as strong as well adapted for invalids, taverns, cakes use and soup stores, and a safe and profitable commodity for exportation.—Manufactory, Warwick, and 14, Wark ersbury

SPRING.—The prevalency of cutaneous visitations at this period of the year renders the assistance of an occasional purifying the Skin in a pure and healthy state, so that its functions may be duly performed. The high and increasing estimation that the ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain as an active yet mild and soothing extirpator of all impurities of the skin, is daily evinced by the increased demand for its unique article. This preparation, eminently BALSAMIC, RESTORATIVE, and IN-VIGORATING, is equally redoubted for safety in application, as for efficacy in removing all impurities and discolorations; and in promoting a healthy freshness and transparency to the skin and complexion, may truly be said to universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled Shopkeepers, who give the title of "GENUINE" KALYDOR to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most disastrous character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and, by their repellent action exceedingly dangerous. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," are on the wrapper.—All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

ROYAL PATENT CARPETING, manufactured without seaming or weaving.—This CARPETING having now obtained the universal approval of Royalty and the Nobility, and of the Public, for its elegance, durability, and economy, the PATENT WOOLLEN CLOTH COMPANY, who are the sole manufacturers, beg to announce that their Warehouses, 31, Cornhill, is now the most novel and elegant designs, are now out and may be had at all the principal Carpet Warehouses, in London, &c. In consequence of the increasing demand for this article, several parties have attempted to introduce it to the public, by the imitation of a very inferior description, but to state the Patent Carpeting but which, on inspection, will be found to have all the disadvantages of seaming and weaving. The Patent Carpeting is of a superior texture and more elegant in design, therefore is far superior to any article hitherto produced for the same purposes. The Company have also a large assortment of Window Curtains and Table Waistcoatmen, and numerous other goods of their manufacture. Agents have been appointed in most of the principal towns in the kingdom, for the sale of the Patent Carpeting.

JUST RECEIVED FROM AMERICA.—The number of testimonials in favour of PARR'S LIFE PILLS are endless, and are daily pouring in from every quarter of the globe. The following is a specimen which we have received from the Proprietors of the Pills:—

FROM MR. J. D. RICHARDSON.

Leamington, Hanover-street.—Having for a long series of years practised in the profession on this spot, I have had ample opportunities of witnessing the effects of many of the advertised medicines, but I have never met with any which have given such general satisfaction as PARR'S LIFE PILLS, from which I received great benefit. Finding a branch of your house in this city, I procured a few boxes of the medicine, and can now therefore testify to their value and great efficacy, and also to the great character they bear for their genuine and unadulterated strength.

ASTHMA.

Messrs. T. Roberts and Co. Portsmouth, N. H., Nov 27, 1844

Gentlemen,—It gives me much pleasure to inform you that in this town and neighbourhood your invaluable medicine PARR'S LIFE PILLS are in great demand, and are giving great efficacy in the cure of Asthma, and consequently their sale is considerable. Mr. James Ladd, a gentleman of this town, who is a friend of his, an elderly lady, who has been troubled with Asthma for the last six years, so much so that she was unable to walk out on account of it. Being advised to try PARR'S LIFE PILLS she found a great relief from using them, and has now entirely recovered. Another gentleman, a resident of Greenland, a few miles from this town, was cured of a severe attack of Asthma by the use of PARR'S LIFE PILLS. Please send per bearer

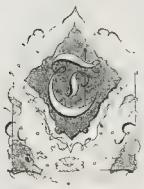
LEGISLATIVE DELAYS.



HE "law's delay" has been made by Shakspeare a proverb, inseparably connected in the minds of all with the "insolence of office." But neither the delay of the law, even though we were to select an example from the Court of Chancery, can equal the snail-like pace at which legislation proceeds in the House of Commons; nor can any "insolence of office," even though an example were sought among the underlings of a Police-office, by any means be compared for its perfect ease and assurance with the systematic neglect that Government seems to adopt as a principle of all that the country is most anxious to see settled. In speaking of Government, we are not singling out that of any one party above another, for, unfortunately, we have been compelled to discover the same defect in all. And, strange, enough they all seem to have the same modes of getting rid of a difficulty, and securing that first of all objects—postponement. A few of these approved methods we propose to notice; one of the chief of them is that important crisis of the Session, called the "Easter Recess," which commences on Tuesday next. The "Easter Recess" is the weapon which Secretaries of State and First Lords of the Treasury use with great effect in prostrating such bills and measures as promise to make too much progress in the first two months of the Session. There is an unlimited license given to mere motions, which produce a certain amount of debating, and not much besides; but actual measures which are embodied in bills, and are before the House, cannot be permitted to get on too fast, and at a certain stage of their career are liable to a sudden pull up by the "Easter Recess," which, though in fact a mere holiday of a few days or a week, has some occult qualities in its "before" and "after," which make it very fatal to the promising buds of legislation, which are gradually to unfold themselves to full-blown Acts of Parliament. The "Easter Recess" first begins to be heard of about the end of the third week of the session, when some honourable member, beginning to have his fears as to a measure that is evidently lagging behind, asks the "right honourable baronet" when he thinks the said measure will be proceeded with? The right honourable baronet replies, with perfect politeness, that from the state of public business, he is apprehensive it cannot be brought on again till "after the Easter Recess." If another measure is wanted, but has not yet been introduced, and a question put as to the time when it is probable it will be brought in, the answer is again, "as ready as the borrower's cap," not before the "Easter Recess." If an independent member originates a bill himself at the commencement of the session, and it becomes—as it is pretty sure to be—impeded till about the middle of March, it is infallibly brought to a full stop by the "Easter Recess." Inquiries pending, communications in progress, everything at the approach of this period is dropped, with a promise of revival "after Easter," which sometimes is the case, and sometimes not. The "Recess" is in fact like a stream that disappears in the earth to rise again at a distance; it takes everything down with it, and some of them may come up again; but the chances are that much goes down that thereafter never becomes visible to mortal eye. We have never known "Easter" play a more distinguished part than it has in the legislation of this year. It has been the plea of making no progress with almost every measure the Government has before Parliament. The Poor Law Amendment Bill is thus postponed, and several others, although the measure we have named was brought in at the very opening of the session, and received strong support from all parties. The Factory Bill is delayed by Ministerial difficulties, with which we are bound to say that "Easter" has nothing to do.

There are several other pleas of delay for a legislative "folding of the hands to rest." As soon as the effect of the "Easter Recess" begins to cease, and the bills that were paralyzed by it are beginning to acquire a little activity of motion, we find another rock a-head in the shape of the "Whitsun holidays." They are, however, of less duration and of less importance; but we have not long got clear of them before we arrive at "the advanced period of the session," a phrase of portentous import, which begins to be heard about the second week in June. At an "advanced period of the session" it is useless to bring in new bills, equally useless to go on with old ones, and the first half of the session having been wasted is made a good and valid reason for wasting the other. As July begins to fade into August, weariness of a daily attendance in the House of Commons takes full possession of the souls of country gentlemen; they "dream" if they do not absolutely "babble" of green fields; visions of the "moors" float before their eyes, with September in not remote perspective; others are anxious to wash away the dust and vexation of Parliament-street and politics at a watering place—unequivocal symptoms of a move are visible, and every thing tells that the "London season" is over, and that Ministers and their measures—that other session to pass away with much the same waste of time and penury of actual work or progress.

Arcadians both, are left
To the Greek kalends of another session;

We do not think we have at all over-stated the case, and might bear out our assertions by detailed proof, were it necessary. It only remains to trace, if we can, the effects of such procrastination. One of the most evident consequences is a vast accumulation of business at the end of the session that must be attended to, and there being but little time left to discuss these measures in, they are passed almost without discussion. Crude and ill-digested measures thus become the laws by which society must be governed; the defects are discovered as soon as they are put in force; some blunder is detected that makes the whole act useless, or some omission that deprives it of its chief value; and the people being vexed by the operation of such enactments, with great reason tax the Legislature with neglect, or incapacity.

It is doubtless necessary that there should be some periods of relaxation for law-makers as well as others, and we have no objection to the "Easter Recess" as one of them; its length is not great, and includes within it the most solemn of the days celebrated by the Church, and respected by all Christians. At such a time it is right there should be a suspension for a while of the struggles and contentions between men and men as to the things on which they differ, in order that they may better remember the greater matters, in which it is to be hoped they agree. But it is a just ground of complaint that the "Easter Recess" is made something more than a holiday. Its recurrence is in every session made an excuse for staying the progress of measures for an indefinite time, dropping them before it begins, and not taking them up again for some time after it is over. It comes over the Parliament annually like a kind of eclipse, the total darkness of which is preceded and followed by a twilight, during which the ordinary business of a Legislature cannot be carried on. There are measures that have for years been lingering about the precincts of Parliament, hovering about it like the condemned spirits in the "Inferno" of Dante—their wailings and mutterings audible to the ear, but never taking a visible or tangible shape; if they did cross the threshold in a bodily form it was only to perish prematurely of an "Easter Recess," or, escaping that, to die off under the annual legislative blight that comes on at "the advanced period of the session," beneath which the bills and acts of busy or would-be busy members "do all fade as a leaf," to revive in the following year, and in the following year to meet perhaps the self-same destiny. Without abolishing the usage which has set apart this period as a holiday, we are convinced that a remedy might be found for some of the evils that arise from it in the shape of hindrance to public business. The "margin" now left before and after it need not be made quite so wide, nor its approach be so soon anticipated. We do not see why a Government should not at least be prepared at the beginning of the session with all the measures it intends to propose during its progress, and, commencing at once, carry them through with only the legitimate delay that may be caused by discussion.

Such miscarriages and overturns as the Factory Bill has met with, as they cannot be foreseen, cannot, of course, be provided for; but with respect to the general run of measures in which the Government is expected to take the initiative, they might be commenced at a much earlier period than they are. Let us take the Government bills of the present session as examples. There has only been one "monster debate" which was avowedly a party one—that on Ireland; it is now close on Easter, and of the bills originated by the Government, Sir James Graham's Poor Law Amendment Act has scarcely got into Committee, and stands postponed till "after Easter." The Factory Bill only got as far as its second clau it broke down, is to be withdrawn, and will be introduced i..din with all the battle to be fought over de novo. The Irish Registration Bill is announced, but is not yet proposed; and the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill has only just been got through the Committee of the Lords, who, however, when they do set about doing business dispatch it off hand; they got through more than ninety clauses of this bill on Tuesday evening in a sitting of four hours. All the Government measures, in fact, are either yet to be brought forward, are in their very first stages, or are actually, as in the case of the Factory Bill, further from completion than they were before. The only thing that has been done smoothly and completely is the financial operation of reducing the Three-and-a-Half per Cents. It is the continual alternation of expectation and disappointment—the expectation of seeing something done, and the disappointment of finding no results, produced that tend to weaken the confidence of the people in the Legislature. We should wish the Legislature itself to apply the remedy, which it is more especially in the power of a Government to effect by bringing in its measures at once, and proceeding with them steadily, though without hurry. If they began at an earlier part of the session, and proceeded more methodically, we are persuaded that its close would not exhibit so long a list of bills abandoned, intentions unperformed, and evils left without a remedy—three things which are so frequently, and with too much justice, brought as reproaches against the British House of Common.

IMMENSE COPPER BALLOON.

The curiosity of the scientific world in Paris has just been raised to the boiling point by the construction of a vast balloon of copper, which is so far completed as to be exhibited to the public. The constructor of this huge work is M. Marey-Monge; and should his anticipations be realised as to the practicability of employing this balloon for purely scientific purposes—as an electrical and magnetic phenomenon—M. Arago will introduce it to the French Institute.

This balloon is completely composed of sheets of copper, the 200th part of an inch in thickness. The idea of the construction of a metal balloon originated with Lana in 1760; and subsequently, in 1784, another metal balloon was constructed by Guyton de Morveau. In the present balloon, the sheets of copper, united by bands, like the ribs of a melon, have been soldered by de Richemont's autogenous process. They occupy an extent of about 1500 yards. The balloon itself is about ten yards in diameter, and weighs 800 pounds, and will contain 100 pounds of hydrogen gas.

It is stated in the Parisian journals, that M. Dupuis Delcourt, the celebrated French aeronaut, will shortly make an ascent in this balloon. The main object proposed by the construction, M. Marey-Monge, is the power of directing balloons by a system which he has developed in a memoir submitted to the French Academy. One of the advantages gained by the substitution of copper for silk, or other fibrous material, is that the metal will prevent the escape of gas, so that the aeronaut may remain a long time in the air, and thus be enabled to study the constant atmospheric currents. It is likewise proposed to employ this balloon in deciding whether it is possible to prevent hail, which is due to the electricity of the clouds. Thus, as the balloon may be kept suspended a long time in the atmosphere, if it were connected with the earth by a metal wire, it would thus conduct the electricity from the clouds, and thereby prevent the formation of hail, so destructive to agriculture. This idea of rendering a balloon a paragrêle is ingenious enough, and we shall be happy to witness its execution. Nevertheless, we have yet to learn the advantage of metal over varnished silk, which has been brought to great perfection in this country, by our veteran aeronaut, Mr. Green, in the construction of his balloons. Altogether, we fear this Copper Balloon will prove another "Aerial Machine,"—a very negative merit.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, March 26.

SPAIN.

The accounts received to day from all parts of Spain are truly distressing—the reign of the innocent Baby Queen, Isabella the Second, is stained with blood in every act, in every step; not content with the numerous murders of Alicant and Valencia, persons of respectability, whose only crime was a hatred to Narvaez and Bravo, were barbarously slaughtered, on the 18th, at Barcelona; on that day, a notary, two merchants, and a priest, were shot in the public square; there were three females saved from the same fate; they, however, have been condemned, two to six years' imprisonment, and the other to two years. Oh! Narvaez and Bravo your energy and courage are loudly applauded against unarmed men, when opposed to men—prepared to act—they are cringing and servile. Thus, it is a known fact, that by their order, and in their own papers, at the time under the surveillance of a secret Committee, the most injurious reports were continually put forth against England; accused, not only with fomenting the late insurrection, but finding money to feed the insurgents. Immediately after the breaking out of the insurrection in Andalusia, Gibraltar was made one of the political chiefs, the obsequious servants of Narvaez, in their proclamations, insinuated that they were the result of English intrigue. The political chief of Grenada went so far as to publish that he had positive intelligence of English gold had been received for the use of the insurgents. Mr. Bulwer, indignant at such bare-faced calumnies, lost no time in calling on the Government to contradict these statements, and demanding a reprost of the functionaries who had made them. Brave—how the name suits the man—Bravo made evasive answers; he was afraid that the political chiefs would openly declare that they acted under his orders; but Mr. Bulwer becoming peremptory in his demands, Bravo was obliged to yield; and the following circular was addressed to all the political chiefs:—"The Queen, having seen that some political chiefs have, in their published speeches or addresses, alluded to the British nation, on the occasion of the revolt of Alicant and Carthagena, has been pleased to command that you shall take care not to make, in your administrative documents, the slightest allusion, directly or indirectly, to foreign powers; for such conclusions, made upon vague and unauthenticated rumours, are of a nature to compromise the friendly relations which unite her Majesty with her august allies, embarrass the march of the Government in its political and commercial relations, create popular antipathy and rancour, repugnant to civilization and the general interests." Now, mind, the circular only forbids England to be insulted in "administrative documents" by political chiefs. In their conversations with those placed under their surveillance, are at liberty to say whatever they think proper! And this is the result of the Quadruple Alliance, and the too-celebrated "non-intervention" of Lord Palmerston!!! It is to be hoped that Mr. Bulwer will watch narrowly every movement of both Narvaez and Bravo. Let him be assured, that, by decisive language, these men will be compelled to do justice to Great Britain.

We have letters from Madrid to the 19th; they contradict the report that Ronat had made disclosures seriously affecting Madoz and his colleagues. On the 21st Christina reached Aranjuez; we have no account of her interview with her royal daughter and the ministers. Roncali, on the 16th, was still before Carthagena, making preparations for besieging it.

A telegraphic despatch received at Madrid states that Almeida had surrendered, and that the Queen of Portugal had pardoned the 500 men that formed the garrison, allowing passports to be delivered to such as demanded them. What a contrast to the conduct of the indiscreet Queen of Spain!

Andalusia is again overrun by robbers; on the 2d the diligence from Madrid to Seville was stopped near to Cordova, and the passengers stripped of every thing they possessed. Amongst the booty the bandits got hold of some valuable jewels belonging to a Belgian nobleman, Count de Merodo, and a cane mounted with brilliants, the property of General O'Donnell.

ITALY.

The following is a copy of a letter addressed to one of our papers:—"Naples, March 14th. Our festivities have been much reduced, owing to the death of the King's sister. The Austrian, Russian, and Prussian members gave splendid fêtes; and, since Lent began, we have had some delightful musical parties at Lady Strachan's and Mrs. Ramsay's. The weather has been throughout the winter most beautiful, and several English yachts, as well as the Crusader, belonging to the Count de Syracuse, have made the bay very animated. Several matches have taken place between the yachts of Messrs. Delafield, Flemming, Flemming, junior, and Berney; but, with one or two exceptions, the Crusader has had the victory."

I mentioned some time since that Ragusa had been visited with a severe shock of an earthquake at the end of February last. I now learn that on the 2nd of the present month Ragusa was again visited with that musical nuisance. Lady Strachan's and Mrs. Ramsay's. I mentioned some time since that Ragusa had been visited with a severe shock of an earthquake at the end of February last. I now learn that on the 2nd of the present month Ragusa was again visited with that musical nuisance. Such was the destruction of property that cabins had been constructed without the town to house the helpless poor.

The disaffection in the Papal States has become so general that Cardinal Spinola has been compelled to send in his resignation; he has been replaced by Cardinal Vannicelli Casoni.

ROME, March.—This city may well be comprised amongst the most fluctuating in regard to the number of its visitors. With the commencement of Lent quietness and departures followed the gaieties of the carnival, but within the last week the arrivals were again numerous, and particularly of English from Florence and Naples. Certainly the sport afforded by the Earl of Chesterfield's hounds causes them infinite delight, as fox and wild boar hunting is much resorted to, as well as horse-racing. A steeple chase has also recently taken place with all the pomp of a Hyde-park display. The beau monde has lately been much engrossed by a mesaillance of the Duke Caffarelli with a butcher's widow of great personal attractions. The law of inheritance is the same as in England, and as the Duke de Caffarelli is one of the most ancient nobles, the affair has created an uncommon sensation. The Duke has been obliged to resign his command in the garde noble of the Pope, which is composed of the elite of the Roman noblesse.

GERMANY.

It would appear, from Vienna letters of the 14th, that the Emperor of Russia has not given up all hopes of bringing about a marriage between the Princess Olga, of Russia, and the Archduke Stephen; and that for this purpose he will visit Vienna some time next May. The Archduke is strongly attached to the Duchess, who is one of the finest women in Europe.

It is again reported that Prince Albert will visit Coburg before the end of the month, but will make but a short stay.

Count Solms Rodelheim died on the 18th, at Assenheim, aged 44.

It was reported in the German diplomatic circles that the expiring treaty of Munich-Gratz, which was concluded for ten years, between the Powers interested in the partition of Poland, was to be renewed.

The following is an extract from the Paul Ampé Gazette:—"In order to avoid giving to the Russian Government pretexts for adopting rigorous measures against the Jews, the Rabbis of the frontier governments have put up a notice, declaring that every Jew engaged in smuggling should be read out of the synagogue. All Jews aware of such acts are to inform against the persons engaged in them, under the pain of being subjected to the same penalty. This threat will be attended with effect, as the Polish or Russian Jews fear spiritual punishment more than the knout."

SWITZERLAND.

Letters have been received from Valais, dated March 17. They state that two Councillors of State of the canton have been sent to Ardon, where serious disturbances had broken out. A conflict had taken place between "La jeune et la vieille Suisse." The peasants had no other weapons than sticks and stones, and several persons were wounded. It appears certain that the Curé of Rivas was the cause of the tumult, and fearful of being arrested he fled. There was found in his house a large quantity of arms and ammunition. On the 13th all was quiet at Ardon.

FRANCE.

Within the last four days several of our diplomatists have been in close conference. Yesterday, as early as eleven o'clock, Lord Cowley and M. Guizot were closeted, and the same afternoon several of the ambassadors met at the house of the Duke della Terra-Ognola, ambassador from the court of Naples. It is said that Spain and Turn were the subjects of deliberation.

In the Chamber of Deputies, on Saturday, it was given as certain that M. Guizot had received despatches from London, announcing that Lord Aberdeen has recalled Mr. Pritchard from Tahiti.

Admiral Hamelin will embark at Brest on board the "Ariane" for Tahiti. On his arrival there he will hoist his flag in the fr gate "Uranie."

M. Gabillet Délessert, ten years a Prefet, and eight years a Prefet of the Police, has been raised to the dignity of a Peer of France. M. Delessert is universally beloved. He is a gentleman of the strictest honour and finest sentiments.

An English and French Company has been formed for laying down a railroad direct from Paris to Strasbourg, by Meaux, Chateau-Thierry, Chalons, Nancy, Lunéville, Rheims, and Metz.

The Duchess of Rohan died on Sunday last in Paris. Marshal Soult, by the death of the King of Sweden, has become the sole survivor of the eighteen Field Marshals created by Napoleon at the Camp of Boulogne in 1804.

The responsible editor of the Legitimist paper, La Nation, has been condemned at the Assizes to six months' imprisonment and a fine of 6000 francs, for articles against the reigning dynasty.

A Royal Prize, of 4000 francs, will be added to the other prizes to be run for at the Caen races. This will make the prizes amount to 10,500 francs—independent of the trotting-match for 20,000 francs.

Professor Rosa has discovered at Milo, not far from the place where the statue Venus, now at the Louvre, was found, some Christian catacombs, which, according to appearances, are as anc..t as the first foundation of Christianity. They are the first catacombs that have been discovered in Greece.

The following extract from the report made to the Chamber by the Marquis de Lagrange will be found interesting to all my countrymen who intend residing in France:—"Since last session an unfortunate season has suddenly raised the price of common wine. Whilst at the places of production it ..... was ..... at from 100 to 150 per cask, under the press of last vintage, some months after, the capital have only increased their prices from 15 to 20 per cent., that is to say, that the quality of the wines has deteriorated, and that the practice of adulteration has increased in proportion as the wine has become higher in price. The increased number of seizures confirms this truth. In 1842, there were 160, and in 1843, 136, and it is worthy of remark that this increase only commenced in the last six months of 1843. It is not, however, the number of seizures that is alone worthy of remark, but the considerable quantity of adulterated liquid, as much as 10,0 casks of wine being seized at the same time. In 1842 426 hectolitres were seized, in 1843, 3154. The quantity therefore near, eight times more in 1843 than in the preceding year, and is far greater than the total of the quantities seized in the nine preceding years. The results, for 1844, are still more alarming. Up to the 30th of March, 735 casks, containing 1692 hectolitres, were seized; the seizures of wine sent from Rouen to Paris, were composed of 1000 casks, all adulterated. The wine trade in the department of the Seine, at the present moment, is fearfully depressed."

To-morrow will be represented at the Grand Opera, Halévy's new opera, "Lazarona," the libretto by St. George. The same evening Mario and Coralli will dance the Pyrrhic dance immediately after the "Diamant de Mineral," and "Ave Maria" will be put in rehearsal. Cerito, after remaining a few days with us, but not appearing on the stage, has left for Brussels, en route for London. Camille Stoepel is immediately to succeed Cerito as "Diamant de Mineral."

Last night was performed for the first time, Auber's opera of "La Sirène," the libretto by Scribe. I will send some remarks in my next. Alcestus, an actor of some merit, made his first appearance last night at the Opéra Comique. Lablache took his farewell benefit at the Italian Opera, yesterday. I need not say the house was a bumper, and the stage covered with laurels, thrown from boxes, pit, and gallery.

Mademoiselle Nissen decidedly quits the French Italian Opera for Milan.

Lucia is expected next week in Paris; he has engaged the Italian Opera for four nights.

The Earl of Westmoreland has been elected a member of the Conservatory of Music of Vienna, and his compositions placed in its library.

Meyerbeer has composed a cantata for the 400th anniversary of Tasso's birthday, which has just taken place at Turin. Pacini has written an opera, called "L'Ebrea," for the Scala.

An opera, called "Pascal Bruno," composed by Mr. Hatton, a pianist, and formerly chorus-master at Drury Lane, has been most successful in Vienna—Staudigl and Mademoiselle Lutzer sustained the principal characters. Mr. Hatton was called for five times. This triumph of an English artist before the severely critical amateurs of Vienna, is an event.

Verdi's opera, "Nerram," was well received at Venice. Derivas obtained great success at Parma in Meredante's "La Regente."

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsular steamer Liverpool, Captain Evans, reached Southampton at seven o'clock on Thursday morning, with Lisbon and other mails. She left Gibraltar on the 17th inst., Cadiz the 18th, Lisbon the 21st, Oporto the 23rd, and Vigo the 24th. She has brought thirteen passengers and a cargo of oranges. The Liverpool was overdue two days, and, therefore, her arrival is most welcome. She brings no political news of the least interest. Upon the subject of the late insurrectionary movements, the papers and letters now received are exceedingly barren.

HOLLAND.

THE HAGUE, MARCH 22.—The Java papers to the 25th of November last have the following news:—

"BATAVIA, NOV. 17, 1843.

"The chief town of Grisse was visited on the night of the 1st instant a little after midnight, and on the afternoon of the 6th, at half-past two, by dreadful fires, by which it was reduced to ashes, with the exception of the old town. 500 houses, of which 300 were destroyed; in the Nine Tramponga, which were consumed, 6000 persons are hereby reduced to the greatest distress, and four lives were lost. The loss in houses, clothes, furniture, merchandise, silver, copper, coin and cattle, &c., is estimated at 265,000 florins.

The States Courant contains the promulgation of the financial law lately passed by the Chamber, and sanctioned by the King.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM.—Everything appears to be going on perfectly tranquil in Stockholm. The late King does not appear to have contemplated a fatal result, having left no will. A good deal of conjecture is hazarded as to the amount of his property. As Princes of Ponte Corvo he was known to have been immensely rich; but the great efforts he made with his private fortune to support the Swedish funds at the period of his election to the dignity of Crown Prince, in addition to the heavy sums of money supposed to have been judiciously distributed about the period of his royal predecessor's decease, must have materially diminished his property. The late King was, moreover, unlucky in his investments. He died possessed of immense estates in Sweden, which for years past have barely yielded an income sufficient to defray the charges of administration. This has led to the belief that the purchase of estates at prices infinitely above their intrinsic value, was a merely indirect mode of conciliating the favour and fidelity of their former possessors.

TURKEY.

Private letters from Constantinople of the 7th inst. announce that no answer had yet been received to the note presented to the Divan by the British and French Ambassadors. The Turkish Ministers had made several proposals during the preceding week to effect an arrangement without complying with the terms demanded of them, but the ambassadors steadily refused to abate an iota of their demand, or to be satisfied with less than a firman. Little doubt, therefore, existed but that the Porte would be obliged to comply.

A considerable opposition was being formed against Reis Pasha amongst the other Ministers of the Porte, joined by an influential party of the Ulemas. It was even asserted that the Sultana Valide had joined in the opposition against the court favourite, and that his downfall was certain.

GREECE.

The Greek Observer of the 10th inst. states, that the moment the last article of the constitution was voted by the assembly, mine in favour of the constitution and the King resounded through the hall and in the galleries reserved to the public, and all the assistants waved their fez and hats in the air in token of joy. The crowd, preceded by the bands of the garrison, repaired to the palace, and the King and Queen having appeared at the balcony, were saluted with enthusiastic acclamations. His Majesty thanked the people, and said, "I rejoice with you at the completion of the Constitution." The citizens afterwards proceeded in succession to the houses of Colonel Kallergi and of the principal leaders of the revolution of the 3rd of September, and loudly cheered them. In the evening all the coffee-houses were illuminated, and public order was not for an instant disturbed.

The next day the charter was read again in the Assembly, and some alterations in the style of it were made. A deputation of twenty-four members was then chosen to carry it immediately to the King. M. Mavrocordato, its President, presented it to His Majesty, who replied—

"Gentlemen,—I receive with pleasure the draught of the Constitution, and feel bound to express to you my satisfaction for the wisdom you have exhibited, and your devotedness to me and my Royal Consort. Being anxious to do everything in my power to promote the prosperity of the nation, I will attentively examine that draught, and lose no time in communicating to the Assembly the result of my observations."

The Malta Mail of the 11th announces that the King signed the Constitution on the 11th.

CORFU.

Prince George of Cambridge, attended by the Hon Captain James Macdonald, aide-de-camp, has returned to Corfu from a tour in the Neapolitan and Papal States; he passed three weeks at Naples, and his Royal Highness is expected shortly to visit England. Lady Seaton and Lady Fitzmaurice have given several balls. Prince George of Cambridge gave a ball on the anniversary of his father's birth-day, the splendour of which, with the beauty of the ladies, exceeds all description; it was very numerously attended. The officers of the 97th Regt. have also given two balls, and nothing was left undone by Lieutenant-Colonel Lockyer and the officers of the regiment for the comfort and amusement of their guests. The Royal Artillery and the Royal Engineers have issued invitations for next Tuesday. Lady Seaton intends commemorating Prince George's birthday on the 26th instant, by a similar entertainment at the palace. The fourth session of the Ionian parliament opened on the 1st, and his Excellency the Lord High Commissioner gave his speech on the 4th inst.

AMERICA.

The New York packet-ship, Patrick Henry, Captain Delano, which arrived at Liverpool on Monday morning last, has in possession of New York papers to the 5th instant inclusive, her day of sailing. She has made a very good voyage of 18½ days.

H. Nelson, Esq. has been appointed, pro tem, the Hon. J. Nelson, Attorney-General of the United States, to the office of Secretary of State, and Commodore J. Warrington, Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, to that of secretary of the Navy, pro tem, vice Upshur and Gilmer, killed on board the Princeton. In communicating the event, officially, to the House of Representatives, the President expresses his deep grief and regret, and entirely acquits the officers and crew of the ship of any blame. It is hinted that Mr. Upshur's office will probably be offered to Mr. Calhoun.

Both Houses of the State of Maryland have passed the bill providing for the unlimited use and accruing on the State Debts. Anti-repudiation seems thus to be really making progress.

The Liverpool packet-ship New York arrived out at New York on the 6th inst.

Congress and the people can scarcely be said to have yet recovered from the nation's shock experienced by the frightful and fatal calamity on board the steam frigate Princeton. The funeral of all the deceased—a public one—took place at Washington on Saturday, every place in the city being closed on the solemn occasion. It is somewhat remarkable that the life of the President Tyler was placed in imminent danger on returning from the ceremony, owing to the horse attached to his carriage taking fright and running away. A similar accident occurred to the carriage of the French Minister, but happily no personal injury was received by the horses were pushed on full speed by the firing of cannon. Several of the newspapers having stated that the gun which bursted was manufactured in England, it may be as well to contradict the rumour. The English-made gun Liverpool burst; but the fatal monster cannon, which produced such horrible destruction, was made at a foundry near New York. It was fifteen feet long, had a bore of twelve inches diameter, weighed ten tons, carried a ball of 230lbs., and required 40lbs. of powder for a full charge.

In the event of Mr Calhoun participating in the Government some singular changes in Oregon and Texas policy might be anticipate d. It is said that the advocates of the legislative possession of Oregon are ready to accept the terms, sold that they would therefore vote for the annexation of Texas to the United States. The Legislature of Massachusetts has instructed the senators and representatives in Congress from that State to vote against the annexation of Texas.

Mr. Fox, late Minister Plenipotentiary of the British government, is expected to remain in Washington until the 30th of June. The Tribune says that President Tyler, and, it is said, about to marry the daughter Miss Gardiner, daughter of David Gardiner, Esq., who was killed on board the Princeton.

In the Pennsylvanian Legislature, things for the first time look a little more promising for a resolution "directing the Committee on Ways and Means to bring in a bill to provide for the sale of the public works, for the purpose of meeting the interest, and reducing the principal of the Pennsylvanian State Debt" was carried in the house by a majority of 45 ayes. This has produced a rise in Pennsylvanian Fives, which left off at 70½ to 71. There are now propositions in the Pennsylvania Legislature. Thus, in the house:—1. By the Committee of Ways and Means, for the sale of the public works. 2. By augmented taxation. 3. Mr. Mountjoy's bill for Direct Taxation also. 3. The sale of the public works to be derived from a sale of these works, as, in such an event, the people may not object to a moderate tax to pay the remainder. The works would not probably be sold for less than 20,000,000 dollars.

Letters received from Havannah, state that there have been negro-Insurrections in six estates at Cardenas, Cuba. Many lives were lost, but the Government suppresses all the particulars.

"The insurrection in Cuba," says a private letter, "is a concerted movement. Planters have been murdered lying into the cities. Many whites have been killed; some of the overseers have been boiled to death in large sugar coppers. Houses have been burnt, and the revolt is spreading. Troops are gone to the disturbed districts."

THE WEST INDIES.

The Royal West India mail-packet, Severn, Captain Vincent, arrived at her moorings at Southampton on Sunday morning, and landed her mails, which were forwarded to London by the next train. She brings dates from La Guayra Feb. 5th, Trinidad 16th, Cuba 19th, Demerara 19th, Barbadoes 21st, Jamaica and St. Kitt's, 23rd, Grenada 25th, St. Thomas's 29th, Bermuda 26th, and Nassau March 16th. She also brings on freight 170 ounces gold dust, 757 ounces silver bullion, 310 ounces of gold bullion, and a few passengers.

The papers received by this steamer contain very little news of interest. In the Jamaica House of Assembly, the Import Duties' Bill had been read a third time and passed. Fears were entertained that, owing to the drought, there would be a considerable deficiency in the next crop the amount of 70,000 hogsheads. The Right Rev. Dr. Spencer, Lord Bishop of Jamaica, held his first ordination on the 18th of February, in the Cathedral Church of Spanish Town. Among the distinguished candidates who were admitted to the holy office of Deacons, was the Right Hon. Major General Berkeley and family, Lady Charlotte Bruce, the Hon. Captain Bruce, the Speaker of the Assembly, &c. &c.

The accounts from Trinidad state that an assault had been committed upon his Excellency Sir Henry Macleod, while riding with his lady in their carriage, by a man named Manuel Martine, who wantonly struck one of the horses, a very spirited animal, a smart blow on the head with a stick which he had in his hand, and which blow so frightened and excited the horse, that Sir Henry, who was driving, had great difficulty in preventing the animal's running away with the carriage. The man was taken into custody, and pleaded intoxication before the magistrates as an excuse for his conduct. The prisoner was fined twenty dollars, which he immediately paid, and was discharged

The advices from the other islands possess not the least interest.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS' MONDAY.

Their lordships sat only for a short time on Monday.

On the presentation of a petition, Lord BROUGHAM took the opportunity of expressing his strong opinion against any limitation of the hours of labour in factories. Such legislation was flying in the face of Providence, and would be grossly inconsistent, unless they went on to prohibit labour in whitelead and all other manufactories deleterious to human life. It would be quite as reasonable to insist that only a certain number should go to sea during a storm, as he would have Parliament extremely cautious how they listened to the humanity doctrines of the day upon a subject so all important to the country.

Some bills on the table were forwarded a stage, after which their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

Mr. Bateson took the oaths and his seat for the county of Londonderry.

The Chester and Holyhead Railway Bill and the Blackburn and Preston Railway Bill were read a second time.

Mr. LAWSON moved the second reading of the Harrogate and Knaresborough Railway Bill.—Mr. S. B. DENISON moved that the bill be read a second time that day six months. He was well acquainted with the locality through which it was proposed to carry this railroad, and he was quite certain that, in the first place, it would never pay, and he was equally certain that the majority of those through whose domains it would pass were opposed to the scheme.

Mr. FERRAND trusted the house would not give its assent to the second reading, in order that its practicability might be established in committee.—Mr. T. DUNCOMBE supported the amendment.—Mr. JAMES characterised the bill as a jobbing and speculating concern, and strongly urged its rejection by the house. The house then divided—

Mr. MACAULAY gave notice that shortly after Easter it was his intention to submit to the house certain resolutions touching the late transactions in Gwalior. He thought it right to give early notice, in order that ministers might, if they thought it desirable, lay on the table before that time any documents which the subject of the clause might appear to them to require.

MR. FERRAND wished to ask the right hon. baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is intended to proceed with the new Poor-laws Bill before Easter?—SIR J. GRAHAM believed the order of the day for going into committee on that bill stood for that evening, and it was his intention to move that the order be postponed to Thursday next.

SIR R. PEEL begged to ask the noble lord the member for Tiverton whether it was his intention to proceed with the motion of which he had given notice, on the subject of the sliding scale, on Thursday next?—LORD PALMERSTON said it certainly was his intention to do so.

IN ANSWER to Lord J. Russell, SIR R. PEEL said he proposed that the house should adjourn for the usual period namely, from Wednesday, the 3rd April, till the Monday week following.

There was a crowded attendance of members to hear the decision of the Government on the subject of the Factories Bill, which was announced by SIR JAMES GRAHAM, who prefaced his speech by an expression of the profound respect which the Government entertained for the opinion of the House of Commons, when constitutionally declared. But there was another duty paramount to even that of yielding to the feelings of a majority—that of an Administration refusing to adopt a policy which they really believed to be injurious to the welfare of the State. The Government had carefully considered the course which they ought to adopt on the Factories Bill, and found that it had three modes of proceeding; the first, acceding to the compromise of eleven hours; the second, to adopt the present clause, and leave the law as it now stood; and the third, to drop the present, and introduce a new bill, embodying those provisions already agreed to in committee, and which might therefore be presumed to be likely to meet with general concurrence. He did not think that the adoption of the seven hours system would be either a safe or an expedient compromise, because the limitation of the operations of machinery would be productive of the most serious consequences. It would be unfair to fix the maximum of wages rather than the maximum of labour. The right hon. baronet argued at considerable length against the ten hours proposition, which he designated a Jack Cade system of legislation; and leaving to the second mode of proceeding that of dropping the bill altogether—said he could not bring himself to forego the provisions which appeared to meet with general assent. He would, therefore, adopt the second proposition, however, the intention of the Government, with all respect to the declared opinion of the house, to oppose all limitation of the hours of labour to less than twelve hours. He, therefore, moved the postponement of the present clause, by which he would move to insert a distinctive order for resuming the committee, and ask for leave to bring in a new bill.—Lord ASHLEY expressed his surprise at the course taken by the Government, and in reference to the term "Jack Cade system," observed that he did not repudiate the application, for the insurrection of Jack Cade arose from the intolerable wrongs inflicted on the people With the people at his back he would still persevere in his object, and he hoped during Friday next to receive a pledge abandoned by those who had hitherto supported him.—A somewhat spirited debate followed, in which Lord Howick, Captain Rous, Mr. Brotherton, and Mr. Vernon Smith took part; after which SIR R. INGLIS asked if Sir R. Peel had not before in the application of the term "Jack Cade" to those who supported the proposition of Lord Ashley.—SIR JAMES GRAHAM said the expression was his own, and was borrowed from a periodical paper. None of his colleagues could be responsible for the use of an expression upon which they had certainly never been consulted.—After some observations from Mr. Bernal and Mr. Ferrand, Lord JOHN RUSSELL said he should not have been astonished were the term applied by the right hon. baronet to himself; but he was surprised to hear it applied to such exemplary Conservatives as Sir R. Inglis and his friends near him.—After some observations from Mr. Hume, Mr. Borthwick, and Mr. C. Buller, SIR R. PEEL said that the term "Jack Cade," used by Sir James Graham, was applied to the principle contended for by the opponents of the bill, and not to the parties who supported the principle. Government was satisfied that it would not be for the benefit of the working classes to limit the hours of labour, and, although in a minority, they felt they were only performing their duty in still persevering in opposing a proposition which they believed would be detrimental to the industrious classes of the community.—Lord SANDON regretted that the Government should have shut the door on everything in the shape of compromise on this subject, when they were so nearly agreeing upon a limitation of the hours of labour of adults.—MR. MORRISON approved of the course pursued by the Government.—Lord STANLEY thought it desirable that no doubtful language should be held on the subject, and he must express his surprise at the conduct of the noble operatives an expectation that Government would ever agree to a proposition so injurious to their interests as that of restricting their labour.—After some further discussion the consideration was postponed until Friday.

In committee on the Mutiny Act, SIR JAMES GRAHAM, in reply to a question from Captain Pechell, said that by the desire of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland a packet was ordered, and would be employed in the collection of the revenue in the poor-rates on the western coasts of Galway—a measure which he should be prepared to defend at the proper time.

On the motion of SIR R. PEEL a select committee was appointed to inquire whether it would be desirable to make any alteration in the law at present in force in respect to the trial of controverted elections.—The committee is composed of the following members: Lord Granville Somerset, Lord Granville Vane, Mr. C. Buller, Mr. Wilson Patten, Sir George Grey, Lord Sandon, The O'Conor Don, Mr. Pakington, Mr. Hawes, Mr. Hogg, Mr. C. Wood, Mr. Heathcoat, Mr. C. Wynn, Mr. Lefroy, and Sir R. Peel.

The other orders of the day were then disposed of, and the house adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—TUESDAY.

The Lord Chancellor having taken his seat on the woolsack, the International Copyright Amendment Bill and the Annual Indemnity Bill were read a first time.

The house went into committee on the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill.—On the 8th clause, which continues the Diocesan Courts, Lord COTTENHAM moved that it be struck out, as these courts had been condemned by all the committees of inquiry, and were quite inefficient for the due administration of justice.—Lord CAMPBELL supported the amendment.—The Lord CHANCELLOR denied that the Diocesan Courts were inefficient; and Lord BROUGHAM admitted them to be bad, but thought they might be improved by this bill.

The house divided—

The clause was ordered to stand part of the bill. The remaining clauses, with the exception of the 67th and 70th, and from 62 to 90 inclusive, were agreed to with amendments, and the report was ordered to be received on Thursday, to which day their lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The second reading of the Chelmsford and Brighton Railway Bill was carried on a division, by 99 against 48. Several other Railway Bills were advanced.

SIR R. PEEL gave notice that he should move the adjournment of the House for the Easter recess on Tuesday next, instead of Wednesday, as he had on a former occasion stated.

Colonel Wood moved for leave to bring in a bill to exempt from toll lime conveyed on any turnpike road in the principality of Wales. The Gallant Member stated that, in some districts, the amount of toll was double the cost price of the lime; and that generally every description of manure, excepting lime, was exempt from toll.—MR. F. SCOTT0N seconded the motion for leave, and estimated the intention of the Government to oppose its further progress. MR. Alderman THOMPSON declared that much more was due to the Welsh people than such a measure as this. Their well-founded and wide-spread discontent were not to be thus pampered over.—SIR CHARLES MORGAN added that the people of the southern portion of the principality of Wales were most anxiously expecting some measure of relief from the Government.—MR. BANKES announced, as the Government were going to oppose the bill, it would be much better, in order to avoid excitement in Wales, to oppose its introduction at once. SIR JAMES GRAHAM had been the cause of the postponement of Colonel Wood's motion until that evening; and he had hoped that a perusal of the report of the commissioners would have induced the gallant officer to have dropped his intention altogether. The Government, though permitting the introduction of the bill, could not be expected to sanction a principle against which such strong objections were stated.—MR. F. BARING expressed his surprise at this. The report of the commissioners would surely come under the special consideration of the Government; yet, by the introduction of this bill, affecting one of the least of the causes of Welsh complaints, they were at the same moment raising and dashing expectations. It was better to refuse permission at once.—MR. HORSMAN, Mr. Ackland, Mr. Darby, Mr. Trevor, Lord Elrington, and other members took part in the discussion.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

MR. HUTT moved that the house should resolve itself into a committee on the corn laws, for the purpose of considering the resolution—"That it is expedient that corn imported into the United Kingdom from the British possessions of South Africa, India, and Australasia, be made subject to the same duty which is levied on corn imported into the United Kingdom from Canada." The hon. member's principal reasons for urging the reduction of the duty of 5s., now payable on grain coming from our Eastern possessions, to a duty of 1s. were—that the importers of wheat from those distant parts of the world, after paying the duty specified, and save for their profits entitled, this year, to make a handsomer; and that the principle of free trade having been applied to Canada should also, in fairness and uniformity, be applied to all our colonies. The motion was seconded by Mr. ANSTEY. Mr. GLADSTONE objected to the proposition, on the grounds that Canada had pethioned by her highest authorities, and in a manner indicating a wide and general feeling in favour of the change, for admission to these eastern possessions. Also, because an uniformity of duty could not be established, unless the other colonies were subjected equally with Canada to a 5s. importing duty. Likewise, because there was an expectation of establishing a trade in corn with Canada, whose supply would not affect the home market, whilst it would be very desirable to obtain a trade that would not be established with our other colonies. Moreover, the boon conferred on Canada had been a special one, and was but a part, though a necessary part, of the general corn law of 1842. The right honourable gentleman, finally, did not think the benefits to be derived from the proposed change would be worth the uncertainness which would be caused to agriculturists by again tampering with the corn duties. If again disturbing them, as proposed, should do more than arouse "the vapours and apprehensions of fussy and fidgetty men," it would be enough to deter the Government attempting it.—Mr. J. BROCKLEHURST supported the motion. He could not see why a difference should be made between Canada and our other colonies.—Lord STANLEY said, if there were any great or real necessity for what the hon. gentleman proposed, nothing to the part of the country rising to a great height, or to there being a deficiency of supply which the colonies could make up, then the hon. gentleman, he was ready to admit, would have made out his case; but, as such was not the case, and the corn laws were last year settled after much discussion, to be placed on the footing on which Canada had been placed, and as it had been shown that the colonies named in the motion could not import corn at a lower price than that at which corn was now admitted, he should oppose the motion; and he must say, he never heard a case that was less made out, or which appeared to him to be of less importance, or for which the house could be less disposed to alter a law of infinite importance to the people of the country, and one which involved some of the most important interests of this country.

SIR G. STAUNTON moved that the house should, on an early day, resolve itself into a committee of the whole house, to consider the propriety of presenting an address to her Majesty, praying that a suitable provision be made for the widow of the late Dr. Morrison and the surviving members of his family, in consideration of the eminent public services rendered by him, and his eldest son, in China.—SIR R. PEEL objected to the motion, on the ground that the case of Dr. MORRISON'S widow and children was not such a peculiar hard one as to warrant the house in adopting the unusual course proposed. The widow was in the actual receipt of a pension of £200 a year for herself, and £25 each for her five children. Her eldest son was appointed to a situation in China, with a salary of £500 a year, and with the prospect, under good conduct, of an ultimate salary of £600 a year; and her second son had been promised by Lord Aberdeen a situation in the Government service as soon as he should obtain an age that fitted him for filling a public office. Under these circumstances, and knowing that there were hundreds of other claimants, whose cases were very pressing, that it was impossible to satisfy, he hoped the hon. baronet would not press his motion.—SIR G. STAUNTON withdrew his motion, and the house adjourned at eleven o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS.—WEDNESDAY.

The House did not sit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—WEDNESDAY.

MR. NUNTE moved the second reading of the Birmingham Corporation Bill. MR. DUGDALE moved, as an amendment, that it be read a second time that day six months.

Lord ASHLEY announced that he would not propose the withdrawal of the Factories Bill. The noble lord said it is not my intention to offer any opposition to the proposal of the Government. I know that in so doing I surrender many advantages which I now possess. But I think it is my duty, when I can, without compromising any principle, to consult the convenience of the house and Government. Therefore, I take this course, on the full understanding that the Government will immediately introduce another bill, and with the discussion upon it on the earliest possible day after Easter. I presume that the house will not ask me now to state what course I may feel it my duty to pursue on that occasion; but I beg leave to s ate that on Friday I shall offer no opposition to the withdrawal of the bill, and I beg to add, that I have come to that determination with the full concurrence of my noble friend the member for Dorsetshire.—SIR J. GRAHAM then rose and said—After what my noble friend has said, perhaps he permitted to give notice that it is my intention to move on Friday that the order of the day for the house resolving itself into committee on the Factories Bill be discharged; and after that order of the day shall have been disposed of, I shall move for leave to bring in a bill to alter the existing laws for regulating labour in factories. If the present bill should be withdrawn, and leave to introduce a new bill should be obtained, I shall move that it be read a first time on Friday, and printed, and I shall fix the second reading for an early day after Easter.—SIR R. PEEL took occasion to correct a misreport of an expression which fell from him on Monday night, and which he most unquestionably used in the low tone of voice in which he spoke. He had been reported to have said that the factory question was no party one, whereas the expression he had really used was, that it was no departmental question.

Lord WORSLEY, in consequence of indisposition, postponed the committal of the Commons Inclosure Bill to the 26th of April.

The County Coroners Bill was read the Masters and Servants Bill were postponed. The House adjourned at Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—THURSDAY.

Their lordships sat only for a short time to receive petitions and notices of motion, but none were of the slightest public consequence.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. -THURSDAY.

There being only thirty-four members present, the House adjourned until Friday.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their lordships sat to hear appeals. The peers present were Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, and Lord Cambell.

The arguments in the case Byron v. Cooper, were concluded, and their lordships postponed their judgment.

The case of the Queen v. Mills; the Queen v. Carroll, stood in the paper for final judgment at half-past four o'clock. It will be recollected that some time since their lordships stated their opinions on the matter seriatim; three of them being in favour of the validity of the marriages, and three against it. At the hour appointed the Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, Lord Campbell, and Lord Camoys, were in attendance. Shortly before five o'clock the Duke of Wellington entered, and after some considerable time, the Lords Denman, Lord Chancellor, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and Lord Cottenham, Lord BROUGHAM moved that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, declaring the first marriage illegal should be reversed.—On a division the house divided, when there appeared for the reversal, 4 against it, 2; the effect of which will be that the judgment below will stand, by which it was declared that the first marriage was invalid.

The Lord Chancellor took his seat on the Woolsack at five o'clock.

The Lord CHANCELLOR said as the opinion of the house on the case of the Queen v. Mills and the Queen v. Carroll had been such as to affirm the decision of the Court below, he should move for the re-appointment of the Committee on the Irish Presbyterian Marriage Law, with a view to legislating upon it.

Messengers from the Commons brought up the Guildford Branch Railway Bill, the Norwich and Brandon Railway Bill, and another private bill.

Lord BROUGHAM brought in a bill founded upon the report of the commission appointed to inquire into the criminal law of this country, which was read a first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock.

The Guildford Junction Railway Bill, and the Norwich and Brandon railway bill, were read a third time and passed.

The Wells (Norfolk) harbour and quay bill, and the Wells (Norfolk) improvement bill, were read a second time.

MR. SHAW called the attention of the house to a petition which he had presented a few days ago from certain parties who had opposed the railway. As it appeared that the petitioners had not complied with the standing order of the house, he thought he ought to call the attention of the house to the circumstance. He merely called the attention of the house to the circumstance, and would not move that the petition be rejected. He would, however, move that the petition be referred to the committee on the bill. After some conversation, it was agreed that the subject should be revived on Monday next.

The Ipswich and Bury Railway Junction Bill was read a third time.

The Middle Level Drainage Bill was read a second time.

The Swansea Harbour Bill was read a second time.

Sir J. GRAHAM moved the order of the day for proceeding with the Factories Bill, in order to withdraw it. — MR. BAILEY COCHRANE complained that the whole of their proceedings had been a complete waste of time. He believed that the noble lord the member for Dorsetshire, but blamed the conduct of the Government in not compromising for a eleven hours bill. SIR R. PEEL defended the course taken by the Government, and after a few words from Lord Ashley, the question of his withdrawing it, after which the other orders of the day were disposed of, and the house adjourned at half-past two.

COUNTRY NEWS.

BIRMINGHAM.—DEATH IN A ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPEL. — On Sunday morning the congregation of St. Chad's Roman Catholic Chapel, Birmingham, were thrown into a state of alarm by the sudden death of a highly respectable member of the body, which took place in the place of worship at about half-past ten o'clock. Mr. James Waring, sen., mercer and draper, of New-street, accompanied by his lady and numerous branches of his family, arrived at the church, and took his seat in his usual kneeling place. At about ten o'clock mass commenced, and the Rev. J. Moore ascended the pulpit, and preached. During the whole of this portion of the service, Mr. Waring appeared as usual and resumed his devotional exercises at the Credo of the mass, and assisted at the various parts, until at or about the Paternoster, when he suddenly fell forward in a state of insensibility. He was instantly raised up, and in a few minutes bled in the arm by Mr. Benbow, but without effect, and before he could be conveyed across the street to the Bishop's house, life was extinct. The deceased was brother of Dr. Waring, Roman Catholic Bishop of Northampton.

CHRISTCHURCH ELECTION.—The nomination for this borough took place at the Town-hall, at 11 o'clock on Wednesday, but on account of the long speeches delivered, the proceedings did not close till after two o'clock. Among the gentlemen present were Sir George Rose, Bart., the late member; James Kemp Welch; T. J. Jasper, James Druitt, W. D. Farr, and W. W. Farr, Esqrs.; also Captain Hopkins (army), and Captain Jackson, R.N., &c., James Harvey, and W. Tice, Esqrs. The usual preliminaries having been gone through, the presiding officer briefly inquired if any elector had a candidate to propose, whereupon Mr. Harvey rose and said, he begged leave to retire from the contest. Sir George Rose, Bart., then proposed Captain Harris as a fit and proper person to represent that borough in Parliament, which proposition was seconded by — Slowman, Esq. T. O. Aldridge Esq. then proposed William Tice, Esq on the Liberal interest, which was seconded by Gilbert Fuller, Esq. A show of hands was then taken, and his worship declared it to be in favour of W. Tice, Esq. A poll was consequently demanded on behalf of Captain Harris, which commenced on Thursday at eight o'clock in the morning.

HASTINGS ELECTION.—A great deal of interest has been excited throughout the borough. It is not believed that more than Mr. Brisco and Mr. Moore will be nominated; although report has it that Dr. Sleigh, Mr. Feargus O'Connor, and half-a-dozen others are expected to put in a claim for the representation. The number of voters on the register is 648; making allowance for disqualifications, deaths, &c., not more than 650 or 700 will poll. Now, the requisition to Mr. Brisco was signed by 400; and, therefore, little doubt is entertained but he will be the victorious candidate. The nomination took place on Thursday.

HULL.—On Monday, the new graving dock at Hull was opened to the public. The works have been completed at the cost of about £100,000. Massive gates were opened at high water by means of two cranes, on an ingenious and improved principle, made by Read and Co. The first ship docked was the Ganges, Capt. Blythe, 74 his majesty's ship lately arriving being decked profusely with flowers. Messrs. Humphrey and Co., ship-builders, have obtained a ten years' occupation of the dock and ship-yard, which cannot fail to be an acquisition to the port.

LIVERPOOL.—FANCY DRESS BALL.—A fancy dress ball was given on Monday night in aid of the funds of the Infirmary, the respective hospitals and dispensaries, and the District Provident Society—the principal charities in Liverpool. The worthy managers could not have given the use of the splendid suite of rooms in the Townhall for the "gathering of the clans," or rather, "of the nations;" and the kingdom furnishes none more suitable for such a purpose, the whole being on one floor, all of large dimensions, and splendidly decorated. Coaches and cabs were in universal requisition, and towards eight o'clock the main entrance being thrown open, and the stewards in waiting in the vestibule to receive the guests, every thoroughfare in the neighbourhood of the Exchange was filled with the din of hundreds of revolving wheels bearing along characters of all nations, and all degrees, from the prince to the peasant. The crowd in Castle-street and Dale-street, and parts adjacent, was literally one dense mass of excitement more and more dense—all who flocked to the scene being anxious to obtain a glimpse of the splendid or grotesque personages rushing to the place of action. At ten o'clock the rooms were filled as completely as the convenience of those disposed to dance would have wished; and the large ball-room presented a unique appearance, a most select company of all nations and all costumes being enjoying themselves in a set of quadrilles, which was succeeded by alternate waltz and gallopade. The number of parties present, as nearly as could be calculated, was 1250. The amusements were prolonged until five in the morning, when the National Anthem having been played, the company separated—tired, they might be, but delighted with their evening's entertainment.

STAFFORDSHIRE.—THE WEDNESBURY MURDER.—On Saturday the inquest on the body of Ann Griffiths was resumed at Wednesbury, Staffordshire. The facts of this melancholy case are as follow: The deceased, who was about thirty years of age, resided with Mr. Crowther, a gentleman of large property; on Saturday week, the man servant left home about nine o'clock in the morning, with the horse and cart; Mr. Crowther also left about an hour after, as was customary with both of them on Saturday morning. The female servant was then alone in the house, the only members of the family present at that time being the mother called and rang the bell, but could not gain admission. He called again in about two hours, but with no better result. About two Mr. Crowther returned home, and was much surprised to see the house in a general state of confusion in the washhouse. Suspicion fell upon a man named Beard, who formerly worked for Mr. Crowther, and who had been seen going towards the house on the morning of the murder. On his being questioned if he had any thing to say, he replied that his shirt were marks of blood, and without any observation being made to him he said "I did not commit the murder." Foot-marks near the house, on being compared with the prisoner's boots, corresponded exactly. Mr. Bent, surgeon, deposed to the frightful state in which he found the body of the deceased. There was a wound upon the head into which he could pass his finger. The head and upper part of the face were very much swollen, covered with blood, and the hair matted. The hands and arms were also covered with blood. He found ten distinct wounds upon the head, and a great quantity of extravasted blood on the brain. The prisoner was then asked if he had any thing to say, upon which he proceeded, in a rambling manner, to say that the boots they had were most certainly his, but that he was not near the place, nor had he the boots on at all the day of the murder. The coroner summed up the evidence, and the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder" against the prisoner, after which he was fully committed to Stafford gaol to take his trial. He is about thirty-two years of age, and is a powerful man.

IRELAND.

Mr. Jonathan Pim, of Mountmellick, is appointed by the Lords of the Treasury distributor of stamps for the King's and Queen's Counties, on the recommendation of Sir Charles H. Coote, M.P., and the Hon. Thomas Vesey, M.P.

The amounts of Repeal rent for the week, as announced by the weekly meeting of the association on Monday last, was nearly £400, including £100 from America. A letter from Mr. O'Connell was read, stating it to be his intention to be present at the Repeal meeting on Monday, in the Rotunda, and had great gratification at having been permitted to pay in recent visit to England, as it had roused a spirit of inquiry and a right opinion on sympathy amongst great masses of the English people, who had been hitherto ignorant and careless of the fate and fortunes of Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE, Q.C.—This distinguished lawyer (who, although engaged for the Repealers in the recent state trials, is a Conservative in politics) is retained as special counsel in Cork in the case of "Jogo v. Hungerford," which involves points of considerable difficulty.

The business of the assizes at Cork City was adjourned from Friday to Monday in the absence of the judges, Mr. Justice Jackson presided, in consequence of the sudden and melancholy death of his sister, Mrs. Tuthill.

ILLICIT DISTILLATION IN IRELAND.—The return of detections and number of persons prosecuted for offences in Ireland against the laws for the suppression of illicit distillation, in the year ending January 5, 1844. Also a return of the number of persons confined in each gaol in Ireland for offences against the laws for the suppression of illicit distillation, on January 5, 1844. In the year ending January 5, 1844, the number of detections was 3,671; the number of persons prosecuted was 1,691, of whom 1,197 were convicted, and 36 acquitted, and 169 were discharged without trial. The number of persons confined in the several gaols in Ireland, on January 5, 1844, was 206.

At Nenagh, on Friday, two men named Leary and Cooke, were tried for the murder of Mr. Nowlan, near Roscrea, on the 9th of June last. Nowlan was a cattle drover, and was found murdered on the high road. The case appeared to be one of highway robbery and murder. A man named Meagher, who could be one of highway robbery and murder. A man named Meagher, who could not read or write, was tried and convicted as a former assizes, and executed for the offence. The jury were in all Friday night, and did not seem likely to agree. On Saturday morning Mr. Justice Burton, who tried the case, sent for them, and inquired if they had agreed? Foreman: We have not, nor is there the least hope that we shall. We wish to be discharged. He added that he was treasurer of the savings bank, and the public would be put to great inconvenience if he were detained all day.—The learned judge refused to discharge them.—At ten o'clock at night the jury came out, and again solicited to be discharged, the foreman saying that it was not unusual for juries to be kept all night before being discharged. They were, however, kept all night. Judge Ball then announced that the judges had consulted upon this practice, and were unanimously of opinion that it was not lawful and must be discontinued. The letter of the law would in future be enforced in all such cases. Ultimately the jury agreed in convicting one of the prisoners (Cooke), and were discharged without finding any verdict as to the other, in consequence of the illness of one of their number. Cooke was immediately sentenced to death.

MILITARY OCCUPATION OF IRELAND.—The country is so crowded with troops that the military and police, having no exercise of an active kind, find a monument of the police, and seeing the sheen of their fire-arms, the officer of the advanced guard of the military, possibly suspecting that the Repealers had at length taken the field, and that his advance was about being impeded, ordered his men to halt, and returned himself to the main body, where he held grave counsel with his brothers in arms for a few minutes. The main body then halted also, and the bugle sent forth its martial notes. A small party was immediately despatched, under proper command, to outflank the police, and took post at a small wood, partly in that rear. The black-jackets, surprised, as well they might be, at such an occurrence, and suspecting that there was some mistake, their officer ordered them to advance in single file to the party sent against them, 'on hostile deeds intent.' As soon as they advanced near enough to be clearly decernable, one of the soldiers cried out 'still-hunters,' on which a film seemed to have fallen from the eyes of the commander of the little party, and he ordered a backward movement, and was received by his comrades amid laughter and congratulations.

MILITARY EXECUTION AT ALICANT.

EXECUTION OF BONET AND HIS ACCOMPLICES, AT ALICANT.

The sketch whence the above engraving has been taken, was forwarded to us by a subscriber, who was present at the horrible execution of Bonet and his twenty-three accomplices, so indignantly execrated in our Paris correspondent's letter of last week. The butchery was perpetrated in the court-yard of the fortress, in which were drawn out two sides of a square of infantry, behind whom were crowds of people to witness the sanguinary spectacle. Bonet and his fellow-prisoners, having been degraded of their military rank and decorations, and had their hands tied behind them, were then ordered to kneel down, five at a time; a half-company of the regular troops advanced, and, having placed their muskets close to the back of the heads of the unfortunate beings, the commanding officer gave the signal to fire, and the prisoners were shot! In the central distance is seen advancing a file of prisoners, each between two soldiers with shouldered arms, to take the place of a despatched victim. To the left is the governor, or general officer, surrounded by his staff. Our correspondent adds:—"It is our fervent hope that, by giving publicity to this wholesale massacre, we may raise the indignation of every humane mind, and that, by a general demonstration, Spain may for ever be prevented from repeating such barbarous murders."

AFFAIRS IN THE RIVER PLATE.—BUENOS AYRES.

The distracted state of Buenos Ayres, the capital of the republic La Plata, and the peculiar position in which British interests there are consequently placed, render the condition of that city a subject of peculiar interest. It will be seen by reference to our journal of last week, that a grave charge of partiality is made against the British Minister at Buenos Ayres, in calling upon that state and Monte Video to stay hostilities, but enforcing the demand only in the latter instance. The author of a pamphlet on "Affairs in the River Plate," however, maintains that the conduct of our Minister, "during a series of trying circumstances, has been discreet, firm, and zealous; though his position has been more arduous and embarrassing from the introduction or intromission of that military element into the affairs of the River Plate, which is admitted on all hands to have been the fruitful source of confusion and vexation."

"First, foremost," continues the above writer, "most fearless of the new states in the fight for independence, was the ancient Viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres, now the Federal Republic of the Rio de la Plata; first in the field, it was also first in the triumph. Enfranchised itself, the scarcely fledged republic carried its liberating arms into Chili; from Valparaiso, all-conquering with the prestige of Maipu, San Martin sailed for the land of Incas, and planted the standard of liberty in Lima. More than thirty years ago, Buenos Ayres opened its ports to the British flag and to British commerce, an age already of contemporary annals, though scarcely a page in the history of nations. The republic of the Rio de la Plata comprehended also Monte Video, on the left bank of the river Plate, and nearest the ocean, as well as the other territory, now separately embodied as the republic of Uruguay." Don Pedro was then prompted to the usurpation of the Argentine territory; but, under the mediation of England, a compromise was effected, by which Monte Video was constituted an independent intermediate state. Thus, "Buenos Ayres might reasonably complain of a lukewarm indifference to its interests on the occasion from a professing friendly quarter. The actual situation of our relations with Brazil, with the paramount influence now achieved by France in that empire, is calculated to excite misgivings for the past; the recent proceedings of British agents in the river Plate have not tended to remedy former lapses, but to exaggerate their consequences into more positive and unmistakeable evils."

The state of La Plata, it will be recollected, was the first to open friendly relations with this country, never interrupted in the whole course of the revolutions of the new state; and the present Government, headed by General Rosas, found in it friendly alliance with Great Britain, the cultivation of which he has not been charged with neglecting.

Buenos Ayres (of which we annex a view, from a lithograph executed in that city) lies on the south bank of the upper part of the wide estuary of the La Plata river, about 100 miles from the place where it enters the sea. Though the estuary is deep in the middle, the beach is so shallow, that persons, as well as goods, are landed in rudely constructed carts, drawn by oxen. The city stands on a high bank, about two miles along the river, and between it and the water's edge is a space planted with some trees. Eastward of the pier stands the fort, or castle, the walls of which are mounted with cannon; here are public offices, and the residence of the President of the Republic. Behind the castle is the piazza, or great square, wherein are a bazaar, and in its centre is a pyramidical monument, in commemoration of the Revolution. The streets are narrow, and mostly unpaved. The houses have flat roofs, and are whitewashed; and there are no chimneys, except those from kitchens. The Town-house is a very fine edifice; there are fifteen churches, including the cathedral, all which, in the time of the Spaniards, were profusely ornamented with gold and silver, but were sacked in the revolutionary wars. The population is estimated at from 40,000 to 60,000, mostly the descendants of Spaniards. No other town in South America has so many institutions for the promotion of science; and several newspapers are published here. The climate is healthy, as its name (Buenos Ayres)—good air—implies; an appellation which was bestowed on it by its founder, Mendoza. The commerce of the place has greatly declined since the blockade by Don Pedro.

Of the Governor, D. Juan Manuel de Rosas, we annex a portrait from a native lithograph. He was elected first in 1829; he then retired for some time, and was recalled to office in 1835; at the latter end of the same year, Oribe was also constitutionally raised by his fellow-citizens to the post of President of the Republic of the Uruguay. In 1836, Rivera, the former President, attempted a revolution, the results of which left him little more than the captain of a band of marauders in the open country, compelled sometimes, on pressure, to take refuge in the contiguous Brazilian province of Rio Grande, until 1838. Then came the famous quarrel betwixt France and Rosas, with the blockade of the River Plate. On the peremptory refusal of Oribe to join in active warfare against Rosas, and his perseverance in reserving a strict and equitable neutrality, the French commanders contracted alliance and made common cause, by sea and land, with Rivera. Against such overpowering odds, Oribe abdicated in 1838; Rivera then took possession of the vacated throne, was duly installed President, and as such saluted with salvoes of broadsides from the fleet of France, his patron and protector. He embarked at once in open hostilities against Rosas and Buenos Ayres.

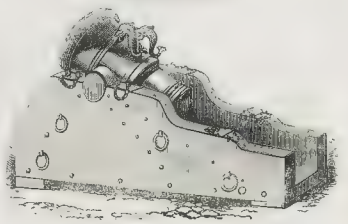
Thus was the war the seeking of Rivera, not Rosas. Its memorable events prove the latter to be a man of extraordinary courage. With his own troops far away in the interior, discouraged by reverses, dispirited by the overwhelming number of foes, and wearied with the difficulties ever increasing to be encountered and surmounted in the midst of commercial stagnation and fiscal penury from the blockade—yet, with all this wreck and ruin surrounded, stood this remarkable man—in a city beleaguered, without land defences, and ungarnished with troops, with not even, personally, the cortège of a guard—in fierce and fearless defiance, unconquered and unyielding still. One by one his foes disappeared; and "at this juncture—whilst the victorious army of Rosas and Oribe was preparing to close the campaign and the contest with the passage of the Uruguay and the capture of Monte Video, and immediately following on the conjoint indiscretion of the notes of the British and French Ministers to Rosas, dated the 16th December, 1842, intimating the decision of their respective Governments, that the 'sanguinary warfare at present carried on between the Governments of Buenos Ayres and Monte Video must cease'—Commodore Purvis made his first appearance on the scene of action, an event pregnant with various cameleon changes in the character of British agency."—Pamphlet, already quoted.

This sketchy narrative of the career of Rosas brings us to the events recorded in due course in our journal. Few public men have been more traduced than the Governor; and one of the atrocities extended to a diabolical attempt to murder the General and his daughter, by means of an infernal machine, at the very moment when Rivera was soliciting the mediation of the British Minister, and he was endeavouring to promote negotiations for peace.

BUENOS AYRES.



THE NAMUR MORTAR.

This stupendous and splendid trophy, taken at the siege of Namur, by the army under Sir R. Goodricke, in the reign of William and Mary, and which was exhibited in the Armoury of the Tower previous to the fire, when the carriage was destroyed, has recently been landed at the Tower, from Woolwich, where it had been sent to be refitted. It is now placed opposite the Ordnance-office, and from its immense size, being 18-inch bore, excites much interest and attraction.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. XII—XIII.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

The Earl of Shaftesbury is a personage of great importance in the House of Lords; on many occasions he might with justice be called the House of Lords himself, as he occasionately unites in his own person the functions of peer and president of the peers, passing bills through a committee of, perhaps, himself and two others, with difficulty detained to go through the business. He is then sitting as Chairman of the Committees of the House of Lords, a post of considerable labour and responsibility, as he has the charge of all private, as well as public, bills, that pass the House. This duty the noble earl has discharged for many years with ability and zeal, and also, which is a still more important consideration, with the strictest rectitude. This is no slight praise, when it is known that the most extraordinary efforts are sometimes made for the purpose of getting private bills through Parliament. His lordship has a most perfect knowledge of the forms of the House; so perfect, indeed, that he sometimes appears to think that a compliance with those forms is everything, and discussion a matter of minor importance. Indeed, he has a very visible disrelish of long speeches, and has sometimes deprived noble lords of the chance of making one, by the celerity and dispatch with which he has "put the question," and declared it carried, thus precluding the necessity of further talk. The family name of the noble earl is Cooper; the second title is Ashley, at present borne by the noble author of the Ten Hours Bill, in the House of Commons. The earldom is a creation of 1672. The Earl of Shaftesbury is in the 77th year of his age; still bustling and active; short and square in figure, with a rather florid complexion, and grey hair, without disguise of wig or peruke. As he appears in the House of Lords, in his suit of full dress black, with the now almost exploded bag and buckles, he looks a good specimen of the old gentleman and courtier. We should state, however, that his style of dress is one of etiquette, not of choice. In the absence of the Lord Chancellor he occupies the woolsack, as President of the House of Lords.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

COLONEL WOOD, M.P.

One of the discussions of the week has been originated by Colonel Wood, the Member for Brecnockshire, who has the honour of coming forward the first with a measure meant to remedy some, at least, of the grievances which caused the outbreak in Wales during the last year. It is a bill for exempting lime from toll, when used for the purpose of manure. The gallant colonel is allowed to bring it in, but beyond that permission has no countenance to expect from the Government, who have distinctly told him that they will oppose its provisions. His speech on Tuesday night amply proved that the exaction of the toll on this article was a great grievance; but there was a general impression that any measure of this kind ought to be more comprehensive. Colonel Wood is the eldest son of G. Wood, Esq., of Littleton House, Staines; he is an old man, being the father of the Member for Middlesex. He is Colonel of the East Middlesex Militia, and Aide-de-Camp to the Queen; he is also an East India Proprietor. In his politics he is a Conservative, though we believe he voted for the Reform Bill; he was a general supporter of the Liverpool an Wellington Ministries. He has been many years in Parliament, havin been returned for the county in 1806. He is not prominent as a part man, and very seldom mingles in the debates. But the local occurrences he has witnessed, and the proceedings in which his position have obliged him to some extent to take part, have turned his attention more strongly to the question he has just brought forward, with, we are sorry to say, so little chance of success.

FINE ARTS.

BRUNETTA AND PHILLIS. (SPECTATOR, NO. 80.) PAINTED BY GILBERT.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

PHILLIS AND BRUNETTA. A Scene from the "Spectator" (No. 10). JOHN GILBERT.

This is a clever picture, embodying a lively narrative from one of our immortal periodicals, in a truly artistical style. There is nothing which tests genius more than transferring to canvass the vivid descriptions of the poet or author; unum est pictura poema, and certainly Mr. Gilbert, in this specimen of his art, has made his subject silently speak. The scene chosen for our illustration is the ball-room, when the fair Phillis, dressed in the rich brocade, awaits with impatience the entrance of her rival. Brunetta appears in a plain black silk mantua, but her train is supported by a negro girl, who is clothed in a piece of the identical brocade which Phillis prides herself upon. At this dreadful and unexpected sight Phillis faints away, verifying, in the words of an old poet,

"It is not woman's loveliness
That woman envies, but her dress!"

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN OF THE BELGIANS.

At an early hour on Tuesday morning it became generally known that her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians was expected to land at the Woolwich Dockyard about five o'clock in the afternoon, and the necessary preparations were immediately made for the reception of the royal visitor with the usual honours.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived at the Woolwich Dockyard at half-past eleven o'clock, A.M., attended by Colonel Sir George Couper, Bart.; and on alighting, entered the residence of Commodore Sir Francis A. Collier, K.L., C.B. and K.C.H. The Belgian Minister and Madame Van der Weyer arrived shortly afterwards; and the Marquis of Ormonde, Lord in Waiting on her Majesty, and Captain Francis Seymour, Groom in Waiting on Prince Albert, to be in readiness to receive the Queen of the Belgians on landing.

A guard of honour, with the colours and band of the Royal Marines, arrived in the Dock-yard at three o'clock, P.M., under the command of Captain Walter, and about the same time an escort of the Royal Horse Artillery, under the command of Lieutenant Gardiner, and B field battery, and r the command of Captain Taylor, to fire a royal salute.

The signal flag was hoisted on the steeple of the parish church at Woolwich, at fifteen minutes past five o'clock, p.m., that the Princess Alice steam-vessel, Commander L. Smithett (accompanied by Captain Hamilton), was in sight, with the Belgian flag at the mast-head. The guard of honour, the Royal Horse Artillery, and the field batteries immediately occupied their respective positions, and Lord Bloomfield, Sir Francis Collier, the Marquis of Ormonde, the Belgian Minister, Colonel Sir George Couper, and Captain Francis Seymour, proceeded to the residence of the superintendent, and accompanied her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent to the landing-place

In consequence of the state of the tide, the Princess Alice went up the centre of the river, nearly as far as Charlton-pier, and came down again inside, between the vessels moored in the river and Wharf-wall, and the commander brought her up beautifully to the landing-place. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians, on the near approach of the vessel, was observed standing on deck, beside Captain Hamilton and her suite, Madame Hoogvorst and Major Moerkerk.

Lord Bloomfield, Sir Francis A. Collier, the Marquis of Ormonde, and Sir George Couper, went on board the Princess Alice steam-vessel, and escorted her Majesty, when landing, which was very easily accomplished by a gangway covered with green cloth and the rails with flags. At the moment her Majesty stepped on shore, her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent warmly welcomed her royal relative, and the field battery fired a royal salute to announce that the Queen had landed. As her Majesty proceeded to one of the royal carriages, the guard of honour of the Royal Marines presented arms, the band playing the National Anthem. Her Majesty was escorted to the royal carriage by Lord Bloomfield and Sir Francis Collier, and entered into conversation with his lordship for a minute or two after taking her seat. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent entered the same carriage as the Queen of the Belgians, and immediately left the dockyard, and proceeded by the road through Greenwich for Buckingham Palace, followed by two other royal carriages and several private carriages, with her Majesty's suite and attendants.

The Queen of the Belgians embarked in the Princess Alice steam-vessel at Ostend on Tuesday morning, at half-past seven o'clock; and, although a strong north-west gale prevailed, performed the voyage in ten hours, having arrived at the dock-yard, Woolwich, at precisely half-past five o'clock, P.M. His Majesty the King of the Belgians accompanied the Queen to Ostend, and on board the packet; but his departure for England has been delayed for a few days, or probably until after his Royal Highness Prince Albert has landed at Ostend, the Princess Alice steam-vessel, Commander Smithett, being under orders to return immediately to Dover for this special service.

ARMORIAL BEARINGS.—CAUTION.—When the act for taxing armorial bearings was passed, about forty years since, it was understood that an "armorial bearing or ensign," engraved on a seal, represented the real or assumed family arms, and was distinguished from fancy emblems or devices by a shield or heraldic lines—that is, colours. Mere fancy devices not so engraved, were considered as not subject to taxation, and they have, consequently, been very generally used by all classes. The very circumstance that an individual had several such seals with different fancy devices, proved distinctly that such devices could not be armorial bearings; for no person could have more than one family crest or coat of arms. Several persons, however, have been recently surcharged for using these fancy engravings on their seals. They have appealed against these surcharges before the commissioners of their respective districts; and the commissioners have decided in their favour. Their decisions, however, have been laid before the judges by the surveyors who surcharged them, and the judges have reversed the commissioners' decisions, and have pronounced every device engraved on a seal, although not exhibiting the family arms, or crest, or accompanied by a shield or heraldic colours, to be an "armorial bearing, or ensign," or crest, within the meaning of the act, and to subject the user to taxation. Although the Government have not thought it advisable to carry out impartially and universally these decisions, yet they avail themselves of every surcharge which has thus been made. The public are, therefore, cautioned to use no seal having any figure or fancy device engraved on it, hereafter, unless they are willing to be accounted arm-bearers, and to pay for that distinction.—Morning Chronicle.

A NOVEL FOX HUNT.

Early on the morning of the 20th instant, a remarkably fine fox escaped from the hands of his keeper, in St. George's-fields, as the keeper was leading him along the road by a chain, attached to a collar, fastened round his neck. On arriving at the end of St. George's-road, Reynard began to display symptoms of restiveness under his restraint, and had recourse to various stratagems for setting himself at liberty. At last, on reaching a lamp-post, he commenced running round it, and continued to do so until he was stopped by having thus wound up the whole length of his chain. This trick he repeated every time that his keeper unwound the chain, until at last the man becoming enraged by the animal's obstinacy and perseverance, administered a few hearty kicks, which so infuriated the fox, that, after several futile attempts to revenge himself by snapping at his keeper, he made a desperate dash forward, and gained his liberty by suddenly bursting asunder one of the links of his chain. Pursuit immediately commenced, and after a long and spirited chase, in which the animal was followed by as motley a pack of dogs as ever were seen running together, Reynard was secured in the yard of a public-house, into which he had run for concealment.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1844.

GOVERNMENTS have ceased to be the leaders of the people, and only do just so much as they are driven to do, and not always that. The consequences of neglect and carelessness were, perhaps, never made so apparent as in Wales, during the riots of last autumn. The Government had allowed little parties and petty interests to get Acts passed that allowed them to tax and toll the farmers and peasantry, almost without limit and without stint. Complaints were made to the local authorities, but they being precisely the parties interested in the abuses, the complaints were, of course, useless. The reasoning of the injured parties being vain, they resorted to the remedy pointed out by the instincts of self interest, joined with revenge. The consequence was a local rebellion, one of the worst effects of which was, that it was partially successful. We say so for this reason—that this success—the abolition of scores of the obnoxious tollgates—was gained from the fears of the magistracy and squires; they yielded to the midnight axe and torch, what they would not have done to any temperate remonstrance, however put. The people have thus been taught to use the remedy of a barbarous time and age—the resorting to physical violence; they have learned a lesson of rebellion, and the opportunity only will be wanting for a repetition of it, perhaps on a larger scale.

But quietness was at last the reward of concession, whatever the power was with which the concession was made, and the Government, driven by the force of public opinion, just as the Welsh landlords were by the force of "Rebecca," sent down a commission of enquiry into the disturbed districts. The commissioners have reported, and proved plainly enough that there were many and just causes of complaint, though, of course, there could be no excuse for violence. The Government must have been in possession of this report some time before it was made public; there are abundant evils described on the face of it, evils which it is the peculiar duty of a Government to remedy, and yet we see no signs of any intention to do what every one naturally expected—to introduce some general measure for modifying or removing the Welsh grievances. The sending down the Commission was a step that did much to calm the excitement of the people. It at least told them that the Government was in some degree cognizant of the evils they suffered from; and, though inquiry was not relief, they still hailed it as the precursor of it. But the clearer knowledge of the state of things gained by the Government through its agents does not seem to have increased its disposition to deal with the affairs of the principality. On the contrary, it seems to stand by, rather allowing individuals to take up isolated grievances, and bring them one by one before the house, each of course totally ineffectual as a remedy, but all raising an expectation in the minds of the Welsh people that something is being done for them, and all helping to waste in useless discussion the time that might be better employed. Colonel Wood has brought in a bill for exempting from the payment of toll the lime used in Wales as manure. This does nothing against the evil that is most complained of—the oppressive number of trusts and toll-gates in Wales; it merely exempts one article from its operation, and it must be borne in mind also that the toll system itself is but one among many other causes of discontent. That the toll on lime operates injuriously we have no doubt; but there is a strong objection on principle to legislating on such detailed points, without touching the evil in its whole extent. The discussion that arose is worth the attention of the Government. Men of various parties, though pointing out the utter inefficiency of the bill, all spoke of the necessity of some general and comprehensive measure. Those best acquainted with the locality, warned the Government that some measure of relief is fully expected. But no intimation could be gained that any such course is contemplated.

The Home Secretary objects, properly enough, to Colonel Wood's Bill, courteously allowing it to be introduced, with a pretty strong assurance that every subsequent stage of it will be opposed. He might just as well, one would think, have negatived it at once, and said, what appears to be about the truth, that the Government is not prepared to legislate on the subject itself, and will not countenance attempts to legislate on the part of others. It is possible that the Welsh people may have expended much of their energy in this last outbreak; and it is also possible that those who profit by the abuses that roused them, may have been taught a little caution and moderation; but the neglect of the ruling powers is as great now as before, though, seeing what they have seen, it is even less capable of being defended.

THE Parliamentary week has been again an anxious one. The contest between Lord Ashley and the Government on the Ten Hours Bill was renewed on Friday last, and carried to divisions that produced the strange result of a victory to both sides without a triumph to either. Sir James Graham succeeded in negativing the ten hours proposition by a majority of seven; Lord Ashley defeated the twelve hours limit of the Government by a majority of three. The result caused some surprise, as it was generally understood that the Ministry had used some more than ordinary exertions to obtain the presence of some of their party, and the absence of others. On Monday Sir James Graham announced the course he intends to pursue. He could not escape the consequence of the twice-repeated decision of the house against his Twelve Hour clause, narrow though the majorities might be, consistent with proper respect to the opinion of the house. But he as resolutely as ever opposed the Ten Hour proposition, and totally refused for himself and his colleagues any compromise of Eleven Hours. Neither would he abandon the task of legislating on the question altogether. But he proposed to withdraw the present bill, for the purpose of introducing another, embodying the amendments that have been already passed by the Committee with respect to the Labour of Children, and omitting those clauses to which the Committee seems to have so strong an objection. There was some degree of doubt whether Lord Ashley would consent to this withdrawal; but on Wednesday he expressed his readiness to do so, and he will wait till the new bill is introduced to begin his labour anew. Of the principle his Lordship contends for we have already, and at some length, expressed our opinion.

Lord Brougham has also this week given his opinion on the question. That the subject had not come before the House of Lords was by no means an obstacle in the way of a man of such genius; he delivered a Ten Hours' Bill speech on the presentation of a petition, thus anticipating, by perhaps a month, the part he will take in the discussion of the measure. The spirit that has infused so much harshness into the New Poor Law, spoke strongly throughout his Lordship's address; it was in the coldest and most unrelieved application of the most severe principles of political economy, that regards human beings as mere machines for producing wealth by labour, paid for in wages great or small, as the case may be, without a moment's thought as to whether they may not have the feelings of humanity, the wish for some respite from toil, and the capacity to enjoy the brief exemption. All the sufferings, all the miseries—physical and moral—of this great class, Lord Brougham passes over, and sets down as incurable—as evils inflicted by an inevitable destiny, which he describes as the "mysterious dispensations of Providence." There have been those who, endowed with powers as great, and humanity far greater, than Lord Brougham's, have shrunk from saying what are "dispensations of Providence." To pronounce what are and what are not the Creator's "dispensations" is a task in which human wisdom may grievously err. All that we can venture to say is that evils exist, and that man is endowed with powers that enable him to remedy some of them, and to escape from others. Famine and disease, earthquakes, floods, and conflagrations are all parts of the scheme of the universe, but the industry of man can ward off famine—his intellect, by investigating the causes, can apply the remedies to disease, and from the attacks of the elements his skill does to a great extent protect him. The Mussulman, with the plague raging round him, sits down, and passively acquiescing in the "dispensation of Providence," makes no exertion to escape it; and the land he dwells in is almost annually visited by a scourge, that the energy, the civilization, and the Christian faith and morals of the denizen of Western Europe, have eradicated. The more enlightened activity appears to us the more religious course, as well as the more philosophical. The principle of Lord Brougham, if carried out, would prostrate every attempt to ameliorate the condition of man. On the same principle slavery might be defended—as, indeed, it has been defended—as a dispensation of Providence. But where evils exist, we shall always advocate trying a remedy, nor with the hardened pride of human knowledge—learned but not wise—impute as Lord Brougham imputes, insanity to those whose benevolence and purity of motive he cannot comprehend. While Lord Ashley is winning golden opinions from all sorts of people, Lord Brougham wonders that he "is permitted to go at large"! The Morning Post very well rebukes this coarse and vulgar insinuation, and asks the ex-Chancellor whether it is by a "dispensation of Providence" that he holds his five thousand a year from the public, his town mansion, his northern castle, and his chateau in the South of France, while he sees millions of fellow creatures toiling in the depths of misery without an effort to relieve them?

THE announcements and advertisements of the daily papers are quite a study; but not any of the many curious and puzzling paragraphs that are included in this portion of their columns puzzle us half so much as those that have of late become more frequent, emanating from the office of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and acknowledging the receipt of various sums of money from unknown individuals, to be applied to the service of the State. Sometimes they come in the shape of "conscience money:" there was an acknowledgment of £50 of this money last week. This we can in a degree account for, as proceeding from some repentant clerk, troubled by the reminiscence of some youthful and undetected appropriation of the public funds. There may be true repentance in the act, and we would neither sneer nor laugh at the restitution, albeit we have heard worldly-minded men do both. But there are other remittances that find their way to the Exchequer that seem sent from some motive, which, if it is not a diseased kind of vanity, is altogether indefinable. Here is one from the Times of Wednesday:—

> The Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledges the receipt of £15, sent to him by some person unknown, to be added to the funds of the Exchequer.

The Exchequer will doubtless feel much indebted to him; his three fines will be deposited therein, even as a shovel of coal might be poured into a Newcastle pit-mouth. It is curious to observe that these donations did not pour in so abundantly when the Exchequer really wanted plenishing—as in the days of the Whigs for instance. But as soon as the Income Tax has filled the coffers of the State to overflowing, men unknown, but whose remains must be of old formation, rush forward with their drop to swell the golden tide;

> Giving their sum of more
> To that which hath too much.

The following, from the same paper, is still more curious:—"The Chancellor of the Exchequer acknowledges the receipt of two sovereigns, to be applied to the use of the nation,' and forwarded to him by some person unknown." Two sovercigns to be applied to the use of England, Ireland, and Scotland, to say nothing of the East Indies and the colonies! Imagine the gratitude of the British empire for the donation of forty shillings! One sighs to think how much it might have done for an individual, compared to the nothing it will do where it has gone. Had the fool who sent it no poor relation, or was there no struggling shirtmaker in his neighbourhood?

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, on Saturday evening, included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anne Maria Dawson, the Earl of Liverpool, the Earl of Aberdeen, Mr. George Edward, and the Hon. Mrs. Anson.

On Monday, the Queen held a drawing-room, the first this season, at St. James's Palace. Her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace about two o'clock, attended by the royal suite.—[A full description of this event will be found amongst our Fashions.]

On Tuesday, the Queen and Prince Albert took an airing in an open barouche. Her Majesty and the Prince visited her Royal Highness the Princess Sophia, at her residence at Kensington. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians and suite embarked at Ostend at half-past seven o'clock on Tuesday morning, and arrived at Buckingham Palace at seven o'clock in the evening. Her Majesty and Prince Albert, attended by the Ladies and Gentlemen in Waiting, received the Queen of the Belgians, on arriving at the Palace. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent joined the royal circle at Buckingham Palace at dinner, in the evening. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by her suite, arrived at Marlborough House from Witley Court.

On Wednesday her Majesty the Queen Dowager visited the Queen at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty, attended by the Hon. Miss Eden and the Hon. Miss Mitchell, arrived at the Palace at three o'clock, and was received, on alighting from her carriage, by the Equerries in Waiting, and the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Household. Her Royal Highness Prince Albert conducted the Queen Dowager to her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent arrived soon afterwards, at Buckingham Palace, and joined the illustrious circle. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians, and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent took an airing in a carriage. Her Majesty, attended by the Baroness D'Hoonvorst, and Major D'Hanins de Moerkerke, visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester, at Gloucester House, and also called at Cambridge House, the residence of their Royal Highnesses the Duke and Duchess of Cambridge. The royal dinner party at Buckingham Palace, included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anne Maria Dawson, Colonel the Hon. George Couper, Baron Stockmar, and Captain Francis Seymour.

We understand that among the early alliances in high life, will be the marriage of Miss Harriet Beresford, second daughter of the late Lord George Beresford, and nephew of the Archbishop of Armagh, and Mr. George Dunbar, late M.P. for Belfast. The Lord Primate and family are shortly expected from the Palace, Armagh, and the ceremony is expected to be solemnized the week after the Easter recess.

Lord Frances Russell will lead to the altar Miss Peyton, a daughter of the Rev. Algernon Peyton, on the 16th of next month.

We hear that Newport's alliance to the Hon. Miss Selina Forester takes place on the 16th of the ensuing month.

A marriage is on the tapis between Sir Piers Mostyn, Bart., of Talacre Hall, Flintshire, and the Hon. Miss Fraser, daughter of Lord and Lady Lovat.

The Queen and Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite, and the household, attended divine service on Sunday morning, in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of London. Prayers were read by the Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay.

The American dwarf, General Tom Thumb, accompanied by his guardian, Mr. P. T. Barnum, of New York, had the honour of attending at the Palace in the evening, where the general exhibited his clever imitations of Napoleon, &c., which elicited the approbation of her Majesty and the royal circle.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

ETON COLLEGE.—Result of the examination for the Newcastle Prize, at Eton, this present Thursday:—Scholar: Hunt, K.S. Newcastle Medallist: Wolley, K.S. The following were named by the examiners as highly distinguished: – Hunt, K.S.; Equal Alphabetists: Messrs. Herbert, M'Nivan, Pearson, Arnold, M.A., and Wright, K.S.; Equal Alphabetists: Messrs. Butler, Hornby, Patteson, and Smith, M.A.

Mr. G. O. Morgan, who was lately elected to the vacant scholarship on Lord Craven's foundation at Oxford, is still a member of Shrewsbury School, and not yet a resident of that University. It is remarkable that the only other instance of an University Scholarship having been obtained before residence is that of Mr Brancker, elected Ireland Scholar, 1831, a so from Shrewsbury School.

His Grace the Archbishop of York has instituted the Rev. J. H. Sutton, M.A., to the rectory of St. Mary's, Bishopshill, Yorkshire. The Rev. Thomas Fenden Wood, has been appointed to the rectory of St. Peter's, Cheshill, in the diocese of Winchester, vacant by the death of the Rev. Thomas Stephenson. The Hon. Bishop of Chester has licensed the Rev. Robert Townley, M.A., to the perpetual curacy of St. Matthew's, Liverpool. The Rev. J. Lloyd, M.A., has been instituted to the rectory of Llanmerwie, Montgomery. The Lord Bishop of Lincoln has instituted the Rev. J. Overton to the rectory of Rothwell, Lee-on-the-Solent, to the Rev. J. Lester to the rectory of Luddington, and the Rev. H. Marsom, M.A., incumbent of Christchurch, Coventry, to the vicarage of Castor.

The Principal and Fellows of Brasenose College, Oxon, have presented the Rev. George Thomas Dufficld, M.A., to the living of Stanford-in-the-Vale with Goosey-cum-Hatford, Berks.

The Rev. B. Gibson, M.A., fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, has been presented by that society to the rectories of St. Mary Aldermanbury and St. Laurence Pountney, in the city of London. The rev. gentlemen have been instituted to their respective incumbencies by the Lord Bishop of London.

Some time since it was stated that it was the intention of the Bishop of London to issue a pastoral letter to the clergy of his diocese, and other parts of his province, relative to the erection of churches and chapels in aid of the Metropolis Churches Fund. The letter is now in the hands of the clergy. His lordship states that eight years have elapsed since he had the pleasure of first commencing a fund to be applied to the building and endowment of additional churches. At that period several additional churches were erected. By the intended arrangement provision has been made for the erection of 50 new churches of which one completed, 2 are in course of erection, and 12 will be proceeded with as soon as the sites are duly surveyed. These churches will contain altogether about 57,000 persons. It appears that some time since the Bills of Mortality has continued to increase at the rate of about 20,000 per annum. The collection, in obedience to the bishop's letter, will be made on June the 9th, being the first Sunday after Trinity.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

BRITISH AMERICAN LAND COMPANY.—On Thursday the half-yearly court of directors was held at the London Tavern, G. B. Robinson, Esq., chairman of the court. Mr. A. T. Gall, chief clerk, read the report. The sales of land during the year amounted to 34,859½ acres, for £17,031 19s 4d, being an increase over the sales of 1842 of 25,547 acres, and of 2342 10s. 4d. The total sales of real property, from the formation of the society, were 77,737½ acres, for £43,608 9s. 7d., leaving 657,674¾ acres in the company's possession. The charges for the total management of the company were £37,889 12s. 6d. The proprietors advanced an entire sum of £213,000, which, after deducting purchases, outlays, and expences, left a balance of £3326 2s. 9d. at the disposal of the company. The report was adopted. A long discussion ensued, relative to the propriety of declaring forfeited sixteen shares, upon which instalments were due, which ended in the affirmative, leaving discretionary power with the directors to grant such time to the defaulters for payment as each individual case might justify. The vacancies upon the direction were filled up, and thanks voted to the chairman.

EDUCATION.—On Thursday evening a very large public meeting was held at the Hanover Chapel, Castle-square, Carlton-hill, Brighton, for the purpose of taking into consideration the necessity for the extension of popular education in that district. Charles Hindley, Esq., M.P. (who had consented to attend the meeting in behalf of the proposed movement, in consequence of the unexpected illness of Sir Eardley Wilmot, Bart., M.P.), was unanimously requested to take the chair. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Messrs. Burnett, Hall, Hoby, and Hawkins, and Messrs. Hindley, Wilson, and Bowman. A series of resolutions were proposed, supported by the Rev. Dr. Collison, the Rev. Dr. Reed, the Rev. J. Carlile, the Rev. J. Viney, and other ministers and gentlemen.

EASTERN COUNTIES RAILWAY.—Last Thursday the proprietors in the Eastern Counties and Northern and Eastern Railway Companies, met at the Shoreditch station. The proprietors in the Northern and Eastern Railway Company met at twelve, when the draft of a bill empowering the directors to apply to Parliament in the present session, for leave to make certain alterations in the proposed extension line to Newport was submitted to the meeting and approved of. The chairman stated that it had been determined on by the directors of the joint companies to apply to Parliament in the next session to extend the Northern and Eastern Railway from Ely to Lincoln, so as to embrace the traffic of the towns of Wisbeach, Lynn, Spalding, and Bracton. The proprietors in the Eastern Counties Company met at one, when the draft of a bill was read and agreed to for extending the Northern and Eastern Railway to Newport, by Cambridge and Ely, and from thence to Brandon and Peterborough. The chairman having intimated his belief that the bill now before Parliament for the amalgamation of the Eastern and Northern and Eastern Companies would pass without opposition, the meeting broke up.

ST. ANNE'S SOCIETY.—On Wednesday a meeting of the governors was held at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, to receive the report of Mr. Alderman Johnson, the treasurer. It appeared that the asylum at Brixton now contains 155 boys, and 80 girls; and that the town establishment provides for 60 additional children, making a total of 293, who are boarded, clothed, and educated on the Madras system.

ST. STEPHEN'S, WALBROOK.—There was on Wednesday (pursuant to adjournment) another meeting of parishioners on the subject of the proposed alterations of the interior of this church, which is now undergoing repair. Mr. Rock was called to the chair, and entered into a long statement of old grievances. Mr. Cunliffe, Mr. Howett, and others spoke, recommending a perseverance in the steps taken, to compel Alderman Copeland to submit to accounts to a full vestry and quit office. The meeting was adjourned to Easter Monday. The Rev. Dr. Croly was present, but took no part in the proceedings.

FANCY FAIR UNDER THE THAMES.—This fair, which commenced on Monday, was continued with great spirit throughout the whole of Tuesday and Wednesday. The decoration of the interior of the Tunnel, and the general fair arrangement of the booths were excellent. The weather was unusually fine, and the number of visitors which the fair attracted was almost beyond credit. In addition to the fair in the Tunnel, there were many like ones outside, at the entrance to the Tunnel. In the entrance, consisting of gingerbread-nut stalls, exhibitions of tumblers and mountebanks, and a display of the ubiquitous drama, in the shape of "Brewer's Fun on Theatre," which was most patronized by the visitors to the Tunnel. The fair finally closed on Wednesday at eleven o'clock.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

COURT-MARTIAL.—A court-martial was held on board the St. Vincent, flagship of Vice-Admiral Sir Charles Rowley, Commander-in-Chief, at Portsmouth, on Monday morning, before Rear-Admiral Hyde Parker, C.B., President; Captains William Wellnott, James Dixon, C.B.R.N., of the Victory; Richard Freeman Rowley (flag), St. Vincent; Sir Thomas Hastings, Excellent; and Commander Robert Willcox, of the Victory; G. L. Greetham, Esq., Judge-Advocate; by Mr. James Hand, second engineer of Her Majesty's steam-vessel Prometheus, Lieutenant Pasco;—"For that the said Mr. James Hand, second class engineer of her Majesty's steam-vessel Prometheus, did on the 27th day of February, 1844, while the engineer on watch, grossly neglect his duty by having allowed the water in one of the boilers on board the said vessel to get considerably below its proper level, and for not having taken the proper steps to arrest the mischief thereby incurred, whereby the vessel was prevented from proceeding on her voyage after reaching Madeira, and which has occasioned great inconvenience to her Majesty's service, and rendered a considerable outlay necessary." Four witnesses were examined for the prosecution. Lieutenant Pascoe, the commander, and Mr. Lloyd, gave the prisoner a good character for sobriety and general attention to his duties, and also for his qualifications as a thorough engineer. The court was cleared for the consideration of the verdict, and, on re-opening, the Judge-Advocate delivered as the result of the deliberations of the court, that the prisoner be dismissed her Majesty's service, and that he is forthwith dismissed accordingly!

APPOINTMENTS.—To Woolwich Dockyard: Mr. Samuel Reed, from Chatham, acting assistant shipwrights' assistant, his appointment as acting assistant of Devonport Dockyard having been cancelled. Mr. William Jones, second foreman of smiths, vice Kenning, promoted to Deptford. To Deptford Dockyard: Mr. O. W. Lang, acting assistant; Samuel Hinton, boatswain; Nicholas Bennell, carpenter of ship-sailing; John Kenning, first foreman of smiths; John Parnell, John William Fuller, and William Sharpe, inspectors of shipwrights. This establishment will be commissioned on the 1st of April next. The present officers are here will be confirmed in their rank, and others will be added immediately appointed. Mr. Kenney, of Woolwich, is appointed master smith, and fifty-four hired shipwrights from Portsmouth, and thirty-eight from Chatham, are ordered to be entered. Mr. William Place, late acting foreman at Woolwich yard, is appointed foreman of this yard. Nathaniel Barnaby, acting leading man of shipwrights at Chatham, is appointed acting leading man of shipwrights at Sheerness.

We have much pleasure in stating that an arrangement has been made, by which, in future, without further expense to the public, but by restricting rigidly the quantity of baggage conveyed with a regiment by railway, the wives and children of soldiers will be carried for a very small charge, and in some cases gratuitously. The arrangement is one totally of a regimental nature.

We learn it is the unanimous opinion that an extensive retirement amongst the Commandants, Field Officers, and Captains of the Royal Marines has been determined upon; which will give short thrifty steps to the junior branches of that distinguished service.

MORTALITY IN THE LINE.—Of nearly 600 young and active men, who composed the gallant regiment of the 92nd Highlanders, when it left Scotland for foreign service, nearly ten years ago, only 143 have returned.

The officers of the Royal Marines gave a splendid ball and supper to the Ladies of Haverfordwest, on the 19th instant. They kept it up with great spirit, and prolonged the last country dance by daylight. Just as the ball was over leaving, their gallant partners received orders to march the next morning for Carrigan, the Marines from Narberth, commanded by Major Whyloes, relieving them at Haverfordwest.

MALTA, March 17.—The Belvidera, the Hon. Captain Grey, arrived in port on Saturday, the 9th instant, from Gibraltar. She had taken Alcazar and Barcelona en route, but brought no news from those places. Two officers of the Royal Engineers arrived by her, viz., the Hon. Mr. Keane and Lieutenant [illegible]. The Devastation steam-frigate got under weigh on the 9th, for Tunis, where she is to be on station, having followed the Ottoman corvette Gul Sefet, having on board the Ambassador from the Porte, Djemail Efendi.

FORGERY IN THE NAVY.—A discovery was made on Saturday, the 9th inst., at Malta, that endorsements to a considerable amount, and forgeries of the name of his commander (sparks), and the second master (Rundle), by Thomas D. Penrose, clerk in charge of the Polyphemus steamer on station there, has been long going on. Immediately on the discovery a court of inquiry sat on the prisoner, and a committee of pursers sat to examine and report upon the stores, &c. Whatever their conclusion was, no one can know, for everything was conducted with the utmost secrecy, but the result was, that he was handed over to the civil authorities on Wednesday. On Thursday he was examined before the magistrate, Mr. Charles Harper, and was remanded to the following [illegible] when he will Tuesday next. But here again public curiosity is baulked, for Mr. Harper, in any case of interest, shuts the door on the public. Both the admiralty and [illegible] at each examination. The amounts of embezzlements and forceries are stated variously from £1000 to £4000, but all is report. Some officers are sufferers both of the grand and little, and a run is going on on Spilsbury, which a tradesman holds a forged Government bill for £240. He, however, outwaited the signature of an officer of the 88th, Mr. Norton, who will be the principal sufferer.—Mr. Penrose enjoyed a high reputation, and was a constant visitor at the regimental messes, but was living at the rate of £900 to £1000 a year, keeping his gigs and racers.

MELANCHOLY AND FATAL ACCIDENT AT DEVONPORT DOCKYARD.—A labourer in the employ of the contractors, was killed on Friday morning at the works of the North Jetty. He usually attended a travelling apparatus, to which is attached a large chain for the purpose of lowering stones, for building the sea wall, into the deep. He with another were employed on this occasion in lowering a large stone; but sufficient care not being taken, the stone suddenly jerked, causing the handles of the apparatus to be whirled round at an immense velocity, when the fellow being taken by surprise, was caught by one of the handles and precipitated with great violence into the dam below, and instantly killed.

A naval court-martial was held on board her Majesty's ship Imaum, on the 7th of February, for the trial of Lieutenant Philips, of her Majesty's steam Ringdove, Com. Sir W. Dan.ell, Kt. There were four charges against the prisoner —the first for being absent from his watch on deck; the second for coming on the quarter deck when under arrest, smoking a cigar in the hand for refusing to go below when advised, and threatening violence to the marines who were ordered to remove him; and the fourth, a general charge of disrespect. The prisoner pleaded guilty generally, and the Court sentenced him to be reprimanded, removed from his ship, and placed at the bottom of the list.

A general court-martial assembled at the Kingston Barracks, on the 13th of February, for the trial of Lieutenant Cox, on charges framed against him from the Horse Guards, of a similar character to those preferred against the same officer in October last, and which the Court then declared itself incompetent to entertain. Lieut. Cox requested that the trial might be adjourned for a few days, as he was not prepared. The Court granted his request

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

THE WHALE FISHERY.—On Tuesday the Truelove, Captain Parker, and the Abram, Captain Humphrey, sailed from the port of Hull, for Davis's Straits, amidst the cheers of a large multitude of persons, who assembled at Sculcoates to witness their departure. Captain Humphrey, it will be remembered, is the gallant officer who, with his crew, picked up and rescued Captain Ross, in the Arctic seas, a few years since. On Wednesday the Prince of Wales, a fine old bark, formerly in the employ of the Hudson's Bay Company, and recently purchased by a firm at Hull, sailed for Davis's Straits, under the command of Capt. Coudrey, with a well-selected crew, and amply found with stores, implements, &c., for the enterprise. The bystanders cheered as she passed out of the docks and basin, and were responded to by the crew. On the same day the Ben Ackord, Captain Lee, from Aberdeen, arrived in Whitebooth Roads, and came into our port, being destined for Davis's Straits, will make the tenth vessel for the Straks and Greenland hence this spring.

THE MERCHANT NAVY.—A deputation waited on Monday upon the Right Hon. the President of her Majesty's Privy Council for Trade and Plantations, &c., on the subject of the establishment of boards for the examination of masters and mates in the merchant navy, and were introduced by Capt. Gladstone, R.N. and M.P. The Right Hon. President of the Board of Trade stated, that the measure had been for some time under the consideration of the Government —that they were inclined to deal with the subject, and hoped that they might be able to introduce a bill in the course of the present session.

MERCHANTS' SEAMEN SOCIETY.—On Tuesday a meeting of the governors of this charity, which is established for the relief and support of sick, maimed, and disabled seamen, their widows, and orphans, was held at the society rooms, Birchin-lane. From the report read by Mr. Watson, it appeared that the receipts amounted to £[illegible] and the disbursements, including £11,624 paid in pensioners, figured at £[illegible]. The captain and the pensioners on the society's funds, viz., 1646 men, 2619 women, and 2795 children.

MELANCHOLY SHIPWRECK.—About one o'clock, p.m., on Thursday, the 21st January, Mr. Thomson, first officer of the Prince, with 20 men, was seen endeavouring to gain safe anchorage in St. Studwell's Roads. The wind being about north, and then blowing a hurricane, prevented her making head-way. Anchor was cast; but she drifted rapidly on the island, and became a total wreck. Such was the violence of the waves, that in a short period not a vestige of her could be seen. The crew consisted of twenty-seven persons, ten only of whom were saved by the land. The captain and ten others were drowned. The other portion managed to get into the two boats, and were carried out towards the Mercinesthaise coast, and landed about five miles south of Bernoum. Of the crew of the boat two died during the night, and one on the beach, leaving six survivors. The captain was seen, by some spectators from the mainland, to be standing upon an isolated part of the rock, looking at the vessel, and the moment was supposed by the overpowering billow. Three bodies were found on the beach, near Ulenaber. It was soon ascertained that the survivors had gone to Plasonnul.

ASSIZE INTELLIGENCE.

SOUTH WALES CIRCUIT.—CARMARTHEN, MARCH 5.

Thomas Jones, David Jones, and Frances Davies, were indicted for having to receive sentence for a burglary committed in the parish of Maddrey. They had pleaded guilty to the charge. His lordship sentenced Thomas Jones and David Jones to [illegible] transportation, and Frances Davies to one year's imprisonment.

John Harris, David Thomas, David Wilhams, Job Evans, Isaac Charles, and John Lewis, all of whom had been found guilty of a riot at the Carmarthen workhouse, were sentenced as follows: John Harris, to one year's imprisonment, with hard labour, and the rest to eight months' imprisonment.

Thomas Hughes, John Jones, and Benjamin Jones, for demolishing the Pontarlerbe toll-gate, were sentenced to one year's imprisonment.

David Lewis, Jonathan Jones, Howell Lewis, Jonathan Lewis, and David Davies, convicted of a riot at Tallog, were sentenced to eight months' hard labour each.

David Thomas, John Jones, Ivan Davies, John Thomas, Thomas Thomas, John Thomas, and David Evans, for a burglary at Pontyrlar, were sentenced, David Thomas to fourteen years' transportation for twenty years, and the whole of the others to transportation for ten years.

After the passing of the sentences a most heartrending scene took place in court; the families of the transgress threw themselves into a perfect frenzy of grief. Sobs and cries were heard on all sides, and there was scarcely a dry eye in the court. The prisoners were then removed, and the assizes terminated.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET. ATTACK ON A GAMBLING HOUSE.—On Monday night last, the police, under the direction of Mr. Superintendent Baker, of the C division, who was armed with the proper legal authority, succeeded in gaining an entrance to a gambling house, No. [illegible], Crown-street, Soho, obtained possession of the implements of gambling and the bank, and capturing thirteen twenty and thirty persons who were either concerned in gambling affairs or connected with the management of the concern. The evidence against the parties, which was of the most conclusive nature, was obtained by Hurxford, one of the Mendicity Society's constables. Four persons, charged as principals, were on Tuesday placed at the bar at Marlborough-street Police Office, before Mr. Mayne, the sitting magistrate. Their names were John Hurlow, John Laing, Lewis Bernard, and Luke Brown. The fine of £50 was inflicted on Hurlow, and £2 each of the rest, under the penalties. The players were then brought to the bar, in batches of four at a time, and were fined 40s. each.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL SQUALL.—TWO LIVES LOST.—On Sunday, about one o'clock, during a heavy squall off Gravesend, the ferry boat, plying from that place and Tilbury, was capsized. Bailey and Howard, two of the watermen, unfortunately sank to rise no more; every assistance could be rendered, although one of the passengers was picked up clinging to the bottom of the boat in such an exhausted [illegible], that, on Sunday evening, but faint hopes were entertained of his recovery.

FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RAILWAY.—Mr. W. Baker held an inquest, on Tuesday, at the London Hospital, on view of the body of John Monaghan, aged [illegible] years, late a porter in the employ of the London and Blackwall Railway Company, who was killed on Saturday night last, as he was conveying some fruit along the line, by the Limehouse carriage, striking him on the back near to one of the crossings.

TRAGICAL OCCURRENCE AT MILE-END.—Same day Mr. Baker held an inquest at the New Globe Tavern, Mile-end-road, on the body of George Furley, aged 18 months, who was drowned by his mother, Mary Furley, in the attempt to commit a double suicide, by drowning herself and child, on Sunday night last, in the Regent's Canal, near the Mile-end bridge. The jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against Mary Furley, who was committed to Newgate.

ROBBERY AT SEVENOAKS.—Between Saturday night last, as he was conveying some fruit along the line, by the Limehouse carriage, striking him on the back near to one of the crossings.

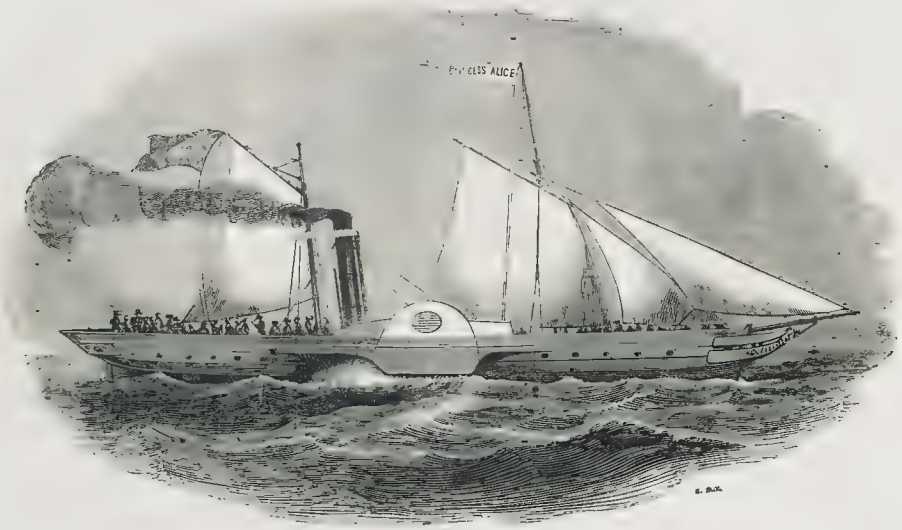
DEPARTURE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT FOR GERMANY.



"THE PRINCESS ALICE" GOVERNMENT STEAMER.

DEPARTURE OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE ALBERT FOR GERMANY.

On Thursday morning, at ten o'clock, his Royal Highness Prince Albert, attended by Mr. G. E. Anson and Sir Edward Bowater, left Buckingham Palace, in a private carriage, and arrived at the terminus of the South Eastern Railway, at London Bridge, at a quarter past ten o'clock. The directors of the railway, considering the circumstances of bereavement which prompted his Royal Highness's departure, with becoming taste refrained from making any of those pageant-like preparations which have characterized the Prince's transit by other railways. A numerous assemblage of highly respectable persons, attired in mourning, had collected on the platform within the terminus.

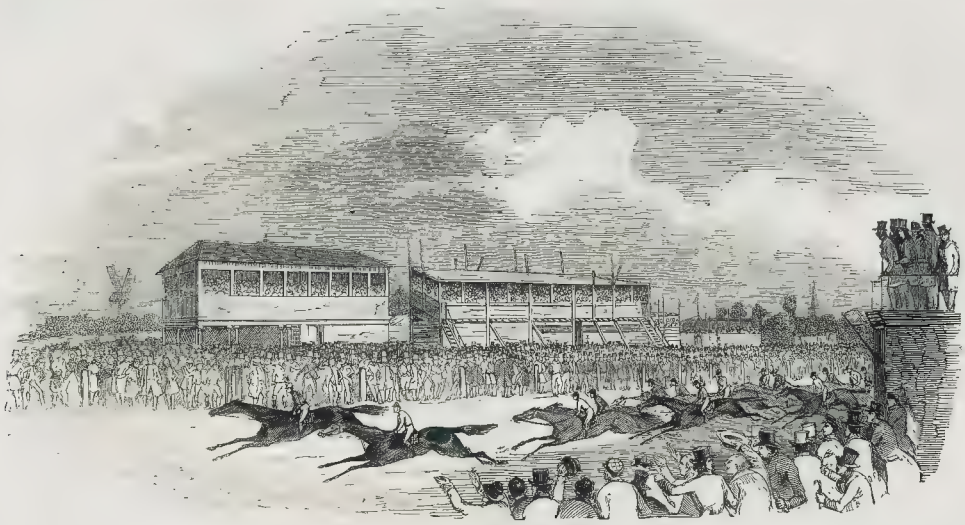
The Prince, on his arrival, was received by the chairman, Mr. Joseph Baxendale, and the secretary, Mr. John Whitehead, accompanied by several of the directors. The royal railway carriage is an elegant chariot-like structure, containing a roomy central apartment, lined and trimmed with rich French white satin damask, and the floor is covered with a carpet of Victoria blue, and white bay-leaves, a pattern stated to have been designed by Prince Albert; in the centre of the roof is a cut glass lamp, with four burners; at each end is a richly carved state seat, and on each side are seats for eight persons. At each end of the above apartment, but entirely separated from it, is a coupé for the accommodation of the royal suite. The exterior of the carriage is painted deep blue, emblazoned with the royal arms, and the Company's significant motto "Onward;" it is further decorated with Nautilus shells and other marine embellishments. The royal train consisted of two first-class carriages, the state carriage, and two trucks, one laden with his Royal Highness's luggage-van, and the other bearing the Prince's travelling carriage. The engine—"The Shakspeare"—was dressed with laurel, and bore a couple of royal standards, to signal to the servants of the line, the appearance of the royal train; the engine being driven by Mr. Benjamin Cubitt and Captain Charlewood. Previous to his departure, his Royal Highness instructed Mr. Anson to express to Mr. Baxendale, his satisfaction at the arrangements made for his journey.

The Prince and his attendants having entered the state carriage, the train immediately left, on the signal being given by Mr. Harrison, the superintendent of the station.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at Dover, on Thursday, at one o'clock, and was received by Col. Jones and a guard of honour of the 77th Regt., under a salute of the guns from the western heights. Owing to the state of the tide, the Prince was delayed two hours, which appeared to disappoint him considerably. He visited the fort, and stopped a short time at the Ship Hotel, and then went on board the Princess Alice. The Goths flag, quartered with the standard of England, was hoisted immediately, and at a quarter past three o'clock the vessel sailed amid the cheers of the spectators who crowded the quays and piers. It is stated that the King of the Belgians will welcome his Royal Highness on his debarkation at Ostend; and that his Majesty intends to return in the Princess Alice to Dover. This fine vessel conveyed her Majesty, the Queen of the Belgians, from Ostend to Woolwich, on Tuesday last, in ten hours, although a very strong north-west gale prevailed throughout the voyage. Her Majesty embarked at Ostend at half-past seven A.M., and arrived at the Dock Yard, Woolwich, at precisely half-past six o'clock P.M.

The Princess Alice iron steamer is built with water-tight bulkheads, and her lines are very fine, and of that form which is sure to obtain a good velocity. She is, altogether, one of the finest steamers yet constructed.

THE PYTCHLEY HUNT BALL, NORTHAMPTON.



THE GREAT NORTHAMPTONSHIRE STAKES

HURDLE RACE.

PYTCHLEY HUNT RACES.

There are few of the provincial "meetings" attended with so much éclat as the Pytchley Hunt, at Northampton, and none which so eminently deserve success; for if we may judge of the distinguished patronage under which it takes place, and the grateful cordiality with which the efforts of these patrons are supported by all classes of the community in this interesting locality, we feel bound to admit that such occurrences tend materially to promote that harmony and good understanding amongst nobility, gentry and commonalty, without which no country can be ever peaceful, happy, or contented. The great feature of these celebrated sports is the series of Grand Military Steeple Chases which occurred on Wednesday, and which was one of the grandest sights that the oldest sportsman has ever beheld in that part of the country. The stewards of the day were—the Earl of Cardigan, Sir G. Houston, Bart.; Lieut.-Colonel Bradshaw, 37th Regiment; Major Laurenson, 17th Lancers; and Captain Barber Inniskilling Dragoons. The stewards of the races were—the Marquis of Exeter, Sir F. Goodricke, and G. Payne, Esq. The following is the order of the sports:—

WEDNESDAY.—GRAND STEEPLE CHASES.

The line run over was selected about two miles and a-half from Northampton, starting in a field close to the village of Wootton, proceeding two miles out and in, and finishing in the starting field. With the exception of an awkward jump out of the first field, and a brook with rotten branches in the third, the fences were fair hunting ones, nothing in short that should stop good horses and willing riders. The weather was favourable, and the attendance greater than we ever met at any steeple chase in this neighbourhood. The heavy weight race was the first on the card, and came off a little after three o'clock, as follows:—

A Sweepstakes of 10 sovs each, h ft, for horses belonging to, and to be ridden by, Officers on full pay of the Army. 12st each. Four miles. Winners of any Steeple Chase previous to the day of nomination, to carry 7lbs extra; the second to have his stake and receive a horse. 60 paid.

Captain Broadley's Tod Slider .. .. .. (Owner) 0
Mr. Hobson's Gangrene .. .. .. (Mr. Innes) 0
Won by about three lengths. Thirteen started; a fast run race; winner cleverly ridden by Hon. Mr. Gage; Mr. Noel well up on Patron. Earl Cardigan claimed the winner.

On Monday evening, the Pytchley Hunt Ball was held in the fine Assembly Room of the George Inn, at Northampton; it was very numerously attended, and dancing was kept up till an early hour.

Next week we shall engrave the grand Military Steeple Chase.

THE ALBERT GATE, HYDE PARK.

We are enabled, by the courtesy of Mr. Thomas Cubitt, to present our readers with a representation of the Albert Gate (named in compliment to the Prince Consort), as it will appear from the Knightsbridge-road, at the end of William-street.

Of the two magnificent mansions that flank this desirable entrance to Hyde Park, from the aristocratic region of Belgrave, Eaton, and Lowndes squares, the one on the easterly side is fast approaching to completion. Our artist has depicted the noble pile with due regard to the taste and genius of the architect, and the masterly manner in which the design has been executed under the superintendence of Mr. Cubitt.

Seen from the high-road, these houses would, probably, be considered by many persons as of too gigantic an altitude; but, viewed from the park, the perfect harmony of the proportions, and the elaborate finish of the details, cannot fail to excite admiration. A very slight difference will exist in the structure of these buildings; we shall, for obvious reasons, confine our description to that nearest the metropolis.

A handsome portico, supported by six stone columns, leads to the entrance-hall, passing through which we were surprised at the vastness and elegance of the grand staircase, occupying an area of nearly thirty feet square. The staircase is of stone, presenting a remarkable specimen of the geometrical mode of construction. A spacious dome of plain and coloured glass, affording abundance of light, crowns this superb cage, supported by twelve lofty arches with pilasters of the Corinthian order; and based by a deep scroll in bold relief, and of truly classic design.

The great dining-room faces the park, but is so situated that the constant passing of equestrians, or carriages, will scarcely be visible to the guests who may assemble in this "banqueting-hall;" this room, and two others, suitable for library and reception-room, constitute the ground-floor. The suite of drawing-rooms give promise of surpassing beauty, judging from those portions already completed; as in the exquisite workmanship displayed in the ceilings, and the magnitude of the windows and door-ways. A stone balustrade extends the whole length of the northern side, which, doubtless, in due time will be filled with choice plants. Six rooms, varying in size, form the second floor, and are intended for sleeping apartments for the family. Above these are smaller chambers for the superior domestics. We feel disposed to envy those whose circumstances in the future look out upon this park; for the extensive range of the prospect can hardly be conceived. The Serpentine viewed from such an elevation, assumes the appearance of a mirror, in which the thickly clustered trees of Kensington Gardens, the plumps upon the sloping banks, are reflected as though the effect were produced by optical illusion. Nor have those who are to occupy the western side any right to complain of want of prospect; for Brompton, Old and New Chelsea, great and little, lie beneath their windows. What in ordinary houses would be termed garrets, are, in this immense building, lofty and well-sized rooms. In the south eastern angle, a flight of stairs leads to the servants' rooms, affording them easy access without interfering with the family or guests. Before leaving this princely habitation, we must not omit to mention that the kitchens are excellently arranged, and the cellarage and underground offices are on a corresponding scale.

Amongst the various noblemen named as desirous of inhabiting this splendid edifice, as soon as completed, are the youthful Earl of Leicester, and the Marquis of Abercorn. £15,000 is the amount of purchase-money. The land on which both houses stand is now the property of the Crown, having been very recently purchased from the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

The iron-work of the gates will be of a similar character to those near Apsley House; and the piers surmounted by the figures of stags that for so long a period ornamented the entrance to Lady Gordon's house, in Piccadilly. These well known effigies, we are informed, on competent authority, were modelled from drawings made by the ingenious artist and popular engraver Bartolozzi.

The gate-keeper's lodge is so constructed as not to obtrude upon the general effect of this splendid addition to the many attractions of Hyde Park.

TRIBUTARY LINES TO THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS,"

ON ITS COMPLETING ITS HUNDREDTH NUMBER.

(By a Correspondent.)

Hail! orbit of thy second year,
Thy circle widening doth appear,
And round its intellectual sun,
Just, comet-like, its course doth run—
Eclipsing with its dazzling light
Some stars that, absent there, were bright!
Long may'st thou in thy glory live
Continuing to store and give
New lustre to whate'er thy touch
Already hath adorn'd so much!
The learn'd the wise—the good—the great
Some most-like, its course doth run—
And in thy store's variety
Indulge without satiety!
Thy pen is dipp'd in honey all—
No unc'rous sytie—no venom'd gall
Doth stain thy pages nothing there
But what the purest mind may share!
Thy handmaids are the Muses—Graces—
Who never wore such happy faces,
As when with Fame they all agree
To twine a lasting wreath for thee!

Leader, Mr. Loder. Conductor, Sir G. Smart.

This society, which, in its foundation, had for its object the furtherance and protection of music in this country, for a long series of years carried out that intention most zealously and successfully. Of late, however, it began evidently to decline; envy and petty jealousy crept in amongst and destroyed the harmony of the original design. We rejoice to see there is a reaction taking place, and that even already a visible improvement in the social and political condition of the body may be remarked. One vast advantage must accrue from the adoption of the society to have the same conductor for the last six concerts: a band consisting of the same elements may be spoiled by obeying the different caprices of different leaders, just as a horse may be in his gaits by the various treatment of several riders, and thus lose much of its grace. We, however, regret that a native musician (particularly when there is no lack of them) has not been chosen to fill the honourable post which has been presided to a foreigner. We have no personal objection to the choice of Mendelssohn—far from it—he is a man of immense genius! But so is Sir Henry Bishop, and ought, if he would have accepted it, to have been in the situation of permanent conductor. It is all very well to allow a musician to direct or preside over his own composition, but that the first orchestra in the world, chiefly composed of Englishmen, should forego its nationality, and submit to the discipline of any alien, however great, (and in this chosen instance truly great,) is not consonant with the feelings of those—

Who tread the land which PURCELL trod,
One time acknowledg'd music's god!

Beethoven's little known sinfonia with which the concert commenced, was magnificently performed by this noble band, particularly the Allegretto Scherzando, which was encored. Mr. Phillips was respectable in Pro peccatis, but he wanted the intensity of feeling and volume of voice which belong to Staudigl and Lablache. Our countryman, Mr. Parish Alvars, in his harp concerto, not only brought forth a most excellent composition, beautifully instrumented, but performed his solos with such exquisite grace, dexterity, and feeling, that we regretted he had not bestowed his genius and time upon a less ungrateful instrument. The Recit. and Aria "Non paventar" "Magic Flute," was a bold venture of Miss Rainforth, but she succeeded beyond expectation. If we mistake not, the last vocalist we heard execute this difficult air (which runs up to F in alt) was Miss Corri, who married Signor Paltoni, the Don Giovanni now at her Majesty's Theatre. Weber's Ouverture was played con fuoco, and obtained a general encore. The second part commenced with Spohr's sinfonia in E flat (No. 1), composed expressly for this society. It is certainly a fine composition, but overlaid with effects. The clearness of his straightforward path or design is too often obscured by thoughts he picks up by the way: flowers they are, to be sure, but he weaves them into such dense garlands of complex, and sometimes ungraceful ingenuity, that the head to his general feet is quite lost sight of. Miss Dolby (who is most rapidly improving) sang charmingly Mozart's "Resta o cara." Herr Buddeus, whom we have heard before, at Braham's concerts, played some portions of Chopin's 1st Concerto on the pianoforte, in a very finished manner. His style, however, is not altogether fitted to Chopin's music: it is too legato; the eccentric, but beautiful, compositions of this writer require the inspired energy of either the composer, or his alter ego, Liszt. Beethoven's "Terzetto" was nicely performed, and the concert concluded with Cherubini's overture "Medée," which is not one of the happiest of that clever composer's best compositions. Sir George Smart formally took his place in the audience and orchestra, and was warmly and respectfully greeted on his retirement. Sir H. R. Bishop will conduct the next concert.

ANCIENT CONCERTS.

The second concert took place on Wednesday evening last, under the direction of the Duke of Wellington. The following was the programme of the ample bill of fare:—

PART I.

Selection from a Service ..... Mozart.
Air, Mr. Machin, "Now Heaven in fullest" ..... Haydn.
Quartet and Chorus, "Adeste Fideles" .....
Air, Miss Dolby, "O Lord, whose mercies" ..... Handel.
Trio and Chorus, "Sound the Loud Trumpet" ..... Avison.
Concerto, Violin principale, Mr. Loder .... Geminian.
Air, Mr. Sims "the turn" ..... Giles.
Hymn, Miss Dolby, and Chorus, "With the Host" .. Mozart.
Aria, Madame Caradori Allan, "Deh! per questo" ..... Handel.
Chorus, "For unto us" (Messiah.) .....

PART II.

Overture, "Henri Quatre" .. .. G. P. Martini.
Selection from Orfeo, "Chi mai del" orbo" ..... Gluck.
Glee, "Since first I saw your face" ..... Ford, 1620.
Double Chorus "He gave them hailstones" ..... Handel.
Quartetto and Chorus, "O voto tremendo" ..... Mozart.

Duet, Madame Caradori Allan and Mrs. Shaw, "Gia P. Arfossi, s'segura" ..... } 1770.
Movement from Handel's Lessons, arranged by ..... } Greatorex.
Aria, Mrs. Shaw, "Ombra adorata" ..... Zingarelli.
Chorus, "Cum sancta spiritu" ..... Calcara.

From this, it will be apparent to all old concert-goers, that there was nothing particularly new selected by his Grace. The concerto by Geminiani was a dull affair, although ably performed by Mr. Loder (who led in place of Mr. Cramer). Old music cannot stand the test of time like old poetry, at least very little of it can, particularly instrumental. The vocalists distinguished themselves by their respective ability, but the whole concert was rather dreary, and went off heavily, there being too many items in the programme. Six or eight pieces performed properly would be enough to satiate the ears of the greatest musical glutton, unless he have an appetite for many things which his forefathers merely tolerated, and which are now served up again, as it were, for their obsoleteness. Old music, in these days, of being inflicted with Martini's overture to Henry the Fourth.

The concert was not very well attended.

IMPROMPTU,

ON HEARING FAVANTI SING.

In music such a wand'ring thing
That not for long she wills to sing,
Confin'd to any land, but changes,
Like the fickle wind and ranges
Over snows, and over flowers,
Russian wilds—Italian bowers.
Lowly cottage—princely dome,
Restless aye to find a home?
Oh! no—she's like the honey-bee
That loves its hive of industry,
But roams awhile abroad to sip
(As hermit gatiers for his scrip)
The sweets of many a distant flow'r,
Then seeks again her straw-built bow'r!
'Twas thus Favanti! thou didst stray
Awhile from native shores away;—
But now with all thy laden sweets
Returning, House thy cooing greets,
And thanks thee for the store of song
That thou hast brought with thee along!

THE THEATRES.

HER MAJESTY'S.

On Saturday evening last, Rossini's opera of "La Cenerentola" was performed, for the purpose of introducing a fair vocalist, well known and appreciated in the musical societies of our metropolis two or three seasons ago, as Miss Edwards, but who, for some reason or other, as we mentioned in our last number, has been persuaded to re-commence her career as a contralto in her native land, under the assumed foreign appellation of Favanti: or, did she think by so doing, that Bonis faveatque, et concilietur amicis?

—if so, she was mistaken, or, at the least, ill-advised. She possesses a native talent, we will even say genius, enough to enable her to keep her ground without the aid of any foreign subterfuge or trick. She is in the possession of a most noble organ, which has been carefully and highly cultivated, and therefore need not have been in dread of any of those foolish prejudices which are operating so internationally wearing themselves out: and we prognosticate that the time is not far distant when ability will stand wholly and solely upon its own pretence, when individual merit will be victorious over party influence and prepossession, and every candidate for fame who enters the lists (no matter what arena of the arts he may select), will be judged fairly and dispassionately by that most honest of all juries—THE PUBLIC—which certainly gave the débutante on this severe trial a most complimentary verdict.

Miss Edwards, or Mdlle. Favanti (which ever you prefer, gentle reader!) has a register of voice not very easy to define. Well, no matter! Artificial distinctions are always conclusive things; so we will endeavour to make a few short descriptions to supply their places. Occasionally she is a contralto of prodigious power and depth—anon she is a mezzo soprano—then again as if—

Scorning the base degrees by which she did ascend, she soars into the legitimate soprano, where she soars and revels in all the florid luxuriance of a Persian. The plot of "La Cenerentola" is so well known that we need not say more than that it differs from the English version of it, called "Cinderella," particularly in the opening scene, which discovers the cinder-wench in humble attire, engaged in a lowly household occupation. Favanti's singing of the nursery ballad, "Una Volta c'era un Re" (once upon a time there was a king), was sweetly sung, but the accompaniment was not quite herself. She gained confidence as she went on, and in a subsequent scene with the haughty sisters, gave a "taste of her quality." In her duet with Corelli, "Parlar Tanto," her veiled powers began to unmasque, and from that time was "Home Sweet Home" as well as actress. She (and he) were loudly applauded. In the second act her declamation of

Figlia, sorella, amica,
Padre, sposa, maestra—oh! infante, was delivered in the perfection of dramatic lyricism. Her "Nacqui al affanno" was touching in the extreme, and the brilliant finale, "Non più mesta," (the touchstone of vocal fluency and grace) was given in a manner that would have made its florid composer stare with amazement to see, or rather hear, how much elegant superstructure could be placed upon his already ornamented foundation. Mdlle. Favanti was enthusiastically called for at the fall of the curtain, and was obliged to obey a general call of "encore." Corelli sang beautifully; he is an artiste of no ordinary class, although his physique does not allow him to rival those of more "capacious mouth." F. Lablache was excellent in the Don, and not unlike (we remember us of his great father; the part of Dandini was performed pleasantly by a Signor Paltoni, of whom hitherto report has said nothing. Altogether, the débutante's appearance must prove as profitable to the entrepreneur as it has been delightful to subscribers and the public.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL CHIT-CHAT.

"ABROAD AND AT HOME."

BEETHOVEN.—It is said that Mendelssohn will bring with him, on his next visit to our country, several manuscript compositions of this mighty man, which have never yet been heard.

CAMILLE SIGORA. This violinist will perform at the second Philharmonic Concert, which will take place on the 15th of April, under the direction of Sir H. R. Bishop.

BRAHAM.—This veteran vocalist is carrying all before him in the North. He certainly is a wonder, be he seen, whether considered constitutionally or artistically. His voice seems to be as fresh as ever, and his energy as great. Long may they continue so.

BEHIND THE SCENES.

On Easter Monday the Lyceum Theatre (late English Opera House) will be opened under the management of Mrs Keeley, with a domestic drama, a new farce, and a new burlesque, the latter being the joint production of Mr Maddison Morton, and Mr. H. Tully the composer. The title of the piece is "Open Sesame, or the Forty Thieves," and the writers have not departed in any material degree from the incidents in the "old familiar" story.

Opera-bouffe has obtained ascendancy in the provinces, and the heroes of the Listrionic drama have some difficulty in obtaining a satisfactory "Learing" amongst the patrons of the stage. During the ensuing week, the people of Manchester will be entertained with a series of musical performances, either at the theatre, or in the more peaceful arena of the concert-room. On Tuesday next, Mr. Donald King, a tenor of some distinction, and who has, it seems, been announced to sing Purcell's "Mad Tom," at Mr. Ransford's concert, will appear at the Lyceum Concert Rooms, on Tuesday next, and on the following Monday he will perform at Birmingham, in Rossini's opera of "Cinderella."

Mdlle. Favanti, the successful débutante at the Italian Opera, is the lady, who, as Miss Edwards, played Cinderella some years ago at the Haymarket Theatre, for the benefit of Mr. T. G. Reid, the composer. Her reception on this occasion was most enthusiastic, but the ability displayed by the young lady was not such as to realize the expectations of the audience. A few years residence in the "land of song" has, however, worked considerable improvement in a voice of extraordinary compass.

The new opera, composed by Benedict, will be produced at Drury-lane on the Saturday in Easter week. It appears that M. Benedict has submitted his production to the opinion of several of the most popular composers and dramatists, and the result has been that a variety of alterations have been suggested. Hence we may expect an opera of more than usual merit, M. Benedict having listened to the suggestions of all his friends, or the friends of the management, respecting the conduct of the libretto.

It is asserted that Mr. Webster is likely to become the lessee of the Adelphi Theatre, and that the Haymarket is likely to fall into other hands. The credibility of such a rumour is somewhat questionable, for it is scarcely possible that the property of a prosperous theatre should endeavour to create for himself an interest in a less-favoured establishment.

Miss Austin, the young lady who is announced to appear in a favourite opera at the Princess's Theatre, is a pupil of Mr. Charles Young, and is the same artiste who made her début at Covent Garden, a few seasons ago, during the management of Madame Vestris. Her success, at this period, was somewhat marred by the more finished performances of Miss Delsy.

SCOTLAND.

DINNER AT KILMARNOCK TO THE EARL OF EGLINTOUN. — On Monday, the 18th instant, an elegant public dinner was given in the George Hotel, Kilmarnock, to this distinguished and much-esteemed nobleman. From Glasgow, Paisley, Ayr, Irvine, Beith, Dairy, Kilwinning, and all adjoining parts, there was a numerous and highly respectable turn out; and at five o'clock very nearly three hundred gentlemen had taken their places at the dinner-table in the ballroom at the inn, which was elegantly fitted up. Pointedly at the hour the Earl of Eglintoun, followed by a few friends, entered. Immediately the whole company rose, and received his lordship with loud cheers, which showed the respect and esteem in which the nobleman is held by all around the district. The chair was given to the earl "as a mark of regard to him as the patron and promoter of all our ancient Scottish games," and never was a dinner better conferred. Colonel Fergusson Hamilton of Carnhill presided.

GLASGOW, DUMFRIES, AND CARLISLE RAILWAY.—A special meeting of the Glasgow and Ayrshire Railway proprietors was held in Glasgow on Wednesday, when the meeting, on the motion of A. Hamilton, Esq., W.S., unanimously resolved to place at the disposal of the directors the sum of £200,000, to aid in the formation of the projected Glasgow, Dumfries, and Carlisle Railway.

THE SCOTT MONUMENT AT EDINBURGH.—We perceive that Mr. Templeton has generously proffered the proceeds of the first representation of his new musical entertainment in aid of the funds for completing the beautiful memorial to the genius of Sir Walter Scott, at Edinburgh. A short time since, too, Miss Helen Faucit, in the same amiable spirit, contributed the sum of £5 for the like object.

MELANCHOLY DEATH OF MR. KEMP, THE ARCHITECT.—On Monday forenoon the body of Mr. Kemp, well known as the architect of the Scott Monument at Edinburgh, was found in the canal. He had been missing for twelve days previously, and was last seen at the house of Mr. Gale, contractor for the monument, on whom he had called to arrange about the progress of the works. It is supposed that, on his return home to Morningside, he had taken the way by the banks of the canal, and that, the night being dark, he had stumbled into the water at the place where he was found, an open and dangerous point beside Lochrin distillery.

SINGULAR PRESERVATION.—On Tuesday last, while a child was amusing itself on the brink of the stream that drives Barns Lint-mill, Girvan, it toppled off the bank, and, unobserved, was carried down by the current to the sluice, where its tiny person stuck at the aperture, preventing the passage of the water. The miller, finding his mill going lazily, fancied he had scrimped her of water, and, going out, raised the sluice, which he had no sooner done than the body of the child, till then unseen, was poured to pass under it, and to float towards the water-wheel, where destruction seemed impending, and where rescue was out of the question, from the impossibility of stopping the mill in time. The child in a second or two had passed under the wheel, and almost as quickly afterwards was pounced upon by the miller, who carried it into his house, apparently lifeless. The "hearty miller," however, was not to be so easily baffled in his humane exertions; well-applied thong and sour brandy—the Robertson almost immediate y, who followed up the miller's rubbing with hot flannels by other restoratives, and eventually the child looked up and smiled, and may live to bless them both.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE. — On Wednesday morning, between two and three o'clock, the byre and washing-house on the farm of Easthaugh, some miles from Edinburgh, occupied by Mr. Whinnerah, were discovered to be on fire. The byre contained ten fine cows and two calves, the whole of which were burned to death. In the washing-house was a gig-horse, which, in the midst of the flames, had broken away, and got out at the door; but its hind quarters being found literally roasted to the bone, it was deemed expedient to shoot it, which was immediately done. The fire was first discovered by a boy belonging to the farm, who raised the alarm; but, before any preparation could be made to stop it, the flames extinguished, or the servants on the farm were well aroused, the roofs of both houses fell in, thereby destroying all hope of any attempt to save the cattle proving curious. What the fire originated from is nothing in question, and the stock mentioned, no other loss was sustained. It is not known how the fire originated.

EARTHQUAKE.—We learn from a correspondent that a rather smart shock of an earthquake was felt at Galashiels on Friday evening, about twenty minutes past eleven o'clock. The shock was experienced by a great number of individuals, and in a rather severe manner in some buildings in question, and &c. By some persons a low, rumbling sound was distinctly heard, and the ground was felt to shake beneath their feet. It is highly probable that more alarming accounts may soon be heard from some other quarter.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

It is fully expected that Mr. C. R. Scott Murray, who has abandoned the Protestant and embraced the Catholic faith, will resign his seat in Parliament for Bucks, when the Marquis of Chandos is of age, which will be in September next.

A meeting of the parishioners of Edgbaston, Birmingham, was held on Friday last, when a tribute of respect, subscribed for by upwards of 400 residents, was presented to the Rev. Charles Pazell, M.A., the rector. The Rev. Gentleman has been incumbent of the parish fifty years.

The Earl of Cardigan lost during the past week two very valuable horses; a favourite hunter, prized highly by his noble owner, was killed on Friday week in full cry after one of the crack packs of hounds in the county of Dublin. He was ridden by Mr. Peel, of the 11th Hussars, son of the Premier.

The Rev. Myles Atkinson, head master of St. Bees School, in a letter addressed to the governors, offers to present them with £500 for the purpose of building a chapel to be attached to the school, which most liberally offer the governors have thought proper to decline, deeming it preferable that the boys should attend the parish church.

The Marquis of Londonderry has handsomely made a donation of the stone required for the "Durham Monument" on Penshe-hill; and the trustees of the Countess of Durham's fund it gratuitously. The contractor for the erection has commenced operations.

There are twelve lines of railway in New England, which have on the aggregate cost 21,013,000 dollars. The total receipts for the past year were 2,..,000, the expenses of working, &c., 1,277,000, leaving the net profits to the companies 1,119,000 dollars. The aggregate return is about five per cent. on the capital invested; but those completed and working, and paying dividends, return at the rate of seven per cent. per annum.

During the last three years the circulation of the Bank of England has increased from £16,446,000 to £21,206,000, of which the increase in the branch circulation is from £6,000,000 to £9,000,000. There we have in this market the Bank of England, with only 12 branches, keeps out an amount of country circulation above three-fourths the amount of all the notes kept in circulation by both the private and joint-stock banks put together, throughout the whole of England and Wales.

The Toulonnais announces that Admiral Hemelin is on the point of going to Brest, where he will command the squadron destined for Taheite, and on his arrival there will hoist his flag on the frigate Uranie.

A Barcelona journal, La Verdad, states that on the 17th a council of war ordered four men and two women to be shot, convicted of being engaged in a conspiracy against the Government. La Verdad complains loudly of the barbarity of these proceedings.

A despatch has been sent out from the Court of Directors of the East India Company to the Governor-General of India, relative to the temple of Juggernaut, and the superintendence of the native religious institutions. It intimates that the express desire of the Court that the authority of the police may be employed on all occasions in preventing the people from dragging the idol's car.

The reigning Count of Solms-Rodelheim died at Assenheim on the 18th of preliminary apoplexy. He was fifty-four years of age.

By the death of the King of Sweden, Marshal Soult has become the sole survivor of all the 18 Marshals of the Empire created by Napoleon in 1804, at the camp of Boulogne.

A beautiful design, by Mr. Barry, for an iron bridge on the site of the present Westminster bridge has been published. It consists of five elliptical arches, is of a light and graceful structure, and is at least fourteen feet lower than that now in use. The plan for this new structure is proposed in consequence of the unsafe and unsatisfactory state of the foundation of the existing bridge, as well as to improve the navigation of the river, and facilitate traffic, by lowering the carriage way. The estimated cost is £185,000.

The contemplated railway station of the Croydon Railway to the Bricklayers' Arms will shortly be opened for the benefit of the public.

The holders of tea are just now rather anxious about their future prospects, and seem disposed to get rid of some of the quantity on hand, in expectation of liberal supplies from China.

The Semaphore of Marseilles, of Thursday, states that an Englishman a few days back put up at the Hotel Paradis, in that city, and enjoyed himself during his stay very heartily. He had plenty of money, and spent it freely. One day his absence from the table-d'hote being observed, a waiter was sent up to his room to call him. The door being found locked inside, and no one replying when the man knocked, it was thought advisable to burst it open. The unfortunate man was found lying on the floor, with a razor near, with which he had cut his throat.

Anticipatory of important changes, not quite completed, in the Post-office, it is stated generally in brief to the public, "letter-clerks are over on Tuesday taken into the "Twopenny" Post-office. A further increase will take place in a few day."

During the last few days a number of inquests have been held before the respective metropolitan coroners, on the bodies of young children, whose deaths had been occasioned by small-pox. During the last few weeks the mortality of infants arising from this fatal malady has been unprecedented.

The site of the contemplated Thames embankment, on the Middlesex side of the river, is undergoing a minute survey, and when carried into effect, will be one of the greatest ornaments of the West-end. A line of stone quays, similar to those on the banks of the Seine in Paris, is to be carried from Whitehall to Blackfriars Bridge upon arches, so as not to interfere with the navigation of the river and the numerous coal barges approaching the wharfs.

At a meeting of the Old Etonians, it was agreed that extensive alterations and additional buildings should be made in Eton College, for the accommodation of the scholars on the foundation, at the estimated cost of £22 000.

By the provisions of Lord Lincoln's Buildings Regulation Bill, it is enacted that premises used for the manufacture of ignitable or dangerous materials shall not be built within 50 feet from any other house or building. Also, that it shall not be lawful for the Commissioners of Sewers to authorise the erection of 50 feet of premises used for carrying on offensive or noxious trades, such as those of blood-boiler, bone-boiler, fellmonger, soap-boiler, tallow-melter, tripe-boiler, slaughterer of cattle, sheep, or horses.

Wolsey's splendid hall in Hampton Court Palace, or, as Evelyn termed it, "the most magnificent room," is once again undergoing repair. The roof is about to be entirely stripped, and the spirit of renovation hovers over the venerable remains of the work of him whose blighted ambition has left a name to point a moral and adorn a tale.

There is at present in artiste busily occupied, by order of the King of Prussia, at Hampton Court, copying upon the most elaborate scale the cartoons of Raphael.

Last Saturday the supply of fruits and vegetables in Covent Garden Market was very abundant, and the sale was both brisk and profitable. Strawberries were sold at 2s. and 2s. 6d. an ounce.

The Royal Academy of Fine Arts at Munich is about, for the first time in the last six years, to have an exhibition, commencing on the 1st of August; for which Government has placed at its disposal the new Palace just completed in front of the Glyptothek.

The Rev. A. A. Rees, some time curate of Sunderland, and lately the unlicensed minister of Thomas-street Episcopal Chapel, Bath, who has thrown off all ecclesiastical authority, and disregarded the admonitions, advice, and guidance of his ecclesiastical superiors, has arrived at Sunderland to form "a real-pious community" under his own leadership.

Measurements have been made of the volume of water of the Niagara river, from which it appears that the motive power of the cataract of Niagara exceeds by nearly forty-fold all the mechanical force of water and steam power available in Great Britain for imparting motion to machinery, including also the power applied for transporting steam-boats and steam-cars, and steam ships-of-war to the remotest seas.

It is calculated that by the new arrangements that are taking place in the Queen's household, there will be an annual saving of not less than £25,000.

The restoration of the venerable edifice, St Olave's Church, which was so severely injured by the destructive fire at Topping's-wharf in the autumn of last year, is rapidly advancing.

In the conservatory at Kew Gardens there are two magnificent specimens of the Strelitzia Regina in flower; the leaf-formed stems are upwards of 20 feet in height.

On Monday, Mr. James Linnell's reduced drawing from Mr. Edward Armitage's proof cartoon, "The Dying Briton," was exhumed to Prince Albert, who greatly admired the performance, and was graciously pleased to allow the print to be inscribed to his Royal Highness.

SUICIDE AT BLACKFRIARS BRIDGE.—On Monday morning, between twelve and one o'clock, a respectably-dressed female, apparently about 25 years of age, ran down the eastern steps of the Surrey side of Blackfriars Bridge, and threw herself into the river. She was shortly afterwards taken out by a waterman, and police constable 93, and conveyed to a surgeon, and from thence, in a cab, to St. Thomas's Hospital, when the surgeon in attendance pronounced her dead.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—FRIDAY.—Although the arrivals of English wheat up to our market this week have been very scanty, the demand for that article, to-day, was extremely dull, and, in some instances, purchases were effected on lower terms. Not a single transaction took place in foreign wheat. We refer to the following return for the quantities of wheat imported into wales, but grinding and distilling ports were amending. Malt, oats, beans, peas, and flour, were unaltered.

ARRIVALS.—English: Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 45s to [illegible] 60s, Norfolk and Suffolk, red, [illegible] new, 46s to [illegible] 50s; ditto white, [illegible] 52s; Lincoln and Yorkshire, distillers, 25s to 28s, malting ditto, 29s to 30s, Scotch, [illegible] 30s to 32s, Irish, [illegible] 30s to 32s, brown ditto, 26s to 30s; rye, [illegible] 30s to 32s; barley, [illegible] 30s to 32s, malting ditto, 32s to 34s; oats, [illegible] 18s to 20s, Scotch, [illegible] 20s to 22s, Irish, [illegible] 20s to 22s; beans, [illegible] 30s to 32s, Lincoln and Yorkshire, 28s to 30s, per 36 lbs. Foreign: Free wheat, 46s to 48s, Dantzig, 46s to 48s; white, 44s to 46s; Rostock, 44s to 46s; Barley, 18s to 20s. oats, new, 12s to 16s; ditto feed, 11s to 12s, beans, 24s to 28s, peas 22s to 26s per quarter. Flour, American, 22s to 23s; Baltic, 2..s to 23s, per barrel.

The West India Merchant reports English sugar and molasses in demand, at full prices, but all other kinds of goods are a mere drug, at heavy stationary figures

The following are the present rates:—Lowest, English, average, 36s to 38s, Bellcrush ng, 38s to 37, Mediterranean and Odessa, 26s to 33s, bumpaced, 28s to 30s per quarter, extraline, 34s to 36s per cwt; brown mustard seed, 12s to 18s; white ditto, 14s to 16s; tares, 5s to 6d per bushel. Regal, dispersed, new, 42s to 46s per cwt for the quarters, Linseed cakes, English, 25s to 26s 10s per 1000; rapeseed cakes, 4..s to 4..s 10s per ton. Canary seed, 37s to 40s per quarter.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 8d to 9d, of household ditto, 6d to 7½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial weekly Averages.—Wheat, 46s 3d; barley, 3..s 1d; oats, 20s 0d; rye, 34s 1d; beans 31s 2d; peas, 31s 0d.

The Six Weeks' Averages each governor Duty.—Wheat, 55s 7d, barley, 33s 6d, oats, 19s 10d, rye, 33s 10d, beans, 30s 10d; peas, 31s 2d

Duties. Wheat, 12s; barley, 6s; oats, 4s; rye, 9s 6d, beans, 10s 6d; peas, 10s 6d

Tea.—Public sales of 30,000 packages have been held this week, but they have gone off heavy, and only about 8000 packages have found buyers. Prices, as compared with those of the previous week, show a decline of 1½d per lb. on Souchongs, and 2d per lb. on common Congous, Imperials, and Hysons. The fine kinds produced full quotations. The declines show a great falling off, while nearly 10,000,000 lbs. are now in bond, which is expected from China.

Sugar.—Owing to the deceptions of raw sugar the market is quiet, yet the merchants have refused to submit to lower terms. The refined market may be considered firm, standard lumps being had at 78s., bonded crushed, 52s. 6d. to 56s. per cwt. Here doing in lower Coffee.—For Java the market is steady, and the sales are very extensive, at full prices. Cheese 48s to 57s. 6d. for good ordinary. In other kinds of coffee only a moderate business is done at late rates

Provisions.—For fine Irish butter, which is scarce, the demand is active, at full prices, prime Waterford being quoted 84s to 86s; Cork, fine, 80s to 82s; ditto, middling, 76s to 78s; and Carlow, 82s to 84s per cwt. In foreign butter little is doing at unaltered currencies In bacon a further advance of from 2s to 4s per cwt. has taken place. Higher prices have been paid for lard. Hams and flitches dull, at 52s to 60s, and 44s to 52s. All other kinds of provisions are quite as dear.

Tallow.—There is a steady demand in this market at full prices. During the [illegible] the spot is quoted at 40s 3d to 40s 3d, for forward delivery the quotation is 41s 9d to 42s For new and for winter it brings 41s to 41s 3d per cwt.

Oil.—Linseed oil has sold freely, at 28s 3d to 29s 6d per cwt. All other kinds of oil are quiet as before.

Wool.—The imports of wool from all quarters continue small. Privately, a good business is doing, at very full prices.

Potatoes.—As is usually the case at this period of the year, the quotations of potatoes are on the advance, the best York reds readily commanding 9s per ton.

Coals.—Stark's, 14s 6d, Carr's Hartley, 15s; Chester Main, 15s 6d, Gen's Redhugh, 14s; Towlaw, 15s 6d., Wylam, 15s., Adelaide, 15s 3d., Hetlu, 15s per ton.

Hops.—This market, although the amount of business doing in it is by no means extensive, remains very steady, and the week's operations are well supported. Yeald of Kent pockets, 85s to 95s 10s., Mid Kent do., 95s 10s to 105s 10s., Farnham do., 110s to 115s; Mid Kent bags, 85s 10s to 95s 10s per cwt.

Smithfield.—The supply of meats on sale here this morning was seasonably good as to number, but of middling and inferior quality, the except the veal. The beasts from Scotland, about 200. The best trade was again in a very depressed state, and prices had a decline of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. The number of sheep were comparatively small, yet the sale for them were inactive, at barely late rates. The lamb trade was active at an improvement of from 2d to 4d per 8lbs. Calves moved off briskly, and were 2d per 8lbs higher. Pigs were dull, with a good demand. Milch cows sold at from 2..6 to 3..0 each. Per 8lbs, to sink the offal.—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 4d to 3s 6d, second quality do, 3s 8d to 3s 10d, prime coarse woolled sheep, 3s 6d to 3s 10d, prime Southdowns in the wool, 4s 0d to 4s 4d, Lambs out of the wool, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; large coarse calves, 3s 6d to 4s 0d, prime small ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 8d; large sows, 2s 0d to 2s 8d; small porkers, 3s 10d to 4s 4d, lambs, 4s 4d to 5s 4d.

Newgate and Leadenhall.—We had a very heavy demand here this morning, on the following terms.—Per 8lbs. by the carcass:—Inferior beef, 2s 2s to 2s 4d; middling ditto, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; prime ditto, 2s 10d to 3s 0d; inferior mutton, 2s 4d to 2s 6d; middling ditto, 3s 0d to 3s 4d; prime ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; veal, 3s 4d to 4s 4d, small pork, 3s 8d to 4s 4d, lambs, 5s 2d to 5s 4d.

COMMERCE AND MONEY.

The money market has remained during this week in the same sound and healthy state to which we have, for some time past, had the satisfaction to frequently to allude. The share market still is the chief attraction for unemployed capital, and a good deal of business has been again done in railway associations. In those lines about to be formed, money is freely invested, particularly in the shares of the Lancaster and Carlisle, Chester and Holyhead, and the North British, the premiums previously paid on them being fully maintained, and the Guildford Wonden Rails Junctions continues to be also in moderate demand. For the Eastern Counties' shares there is a considerable demand, and rather higher prices have been paid for them. In the Midland, North Midland, and York and North Midland, some of money continues to be embarked, and their value has been fairly supported. From the great difficulty which capitalists find in profitably employing their property, it might naturally be inferred that trade was not in a sound condition; but this is not the fact, for a reliance has been more healthy at this early period of the year than is at the present time. The house consumption of manufactures is unusually large, and the export trade at the same time active. This was again proved to be the case on the Royal Exchange this post day, for the amount of bills drawn on foreign nations against the spring shipments exceeded considerably the wants of the foreign bankers, and a further rise in the rates of the foreign exchanges was the necessary consequence. This must the previous month continue to be remitted to the United Kingdom, in payment for the balance of our foreign purchases, and that must the means for internal improvement, and for the productive employment of all the industrious classes of society, be regularly increasing, and the real wealth of the nation proportionally so.

On the foreign Stock Exchange purchases of various descriptions of foreign national securities have been again made chiefly for foreign account, and prices generally are firm. Dutch bonds have touched 97, and in Spanish the improvement is not less than one per cent. Danish are likewise two per cent. dearer, and those of Russia support last week's advance. Brazilian are approaching nearer to their intrinsic value, although they are still much under that point. If the New Grenada Minister would only say that the Columbian money now in this country will be soon applied to the dividends, Columbian bonds would be dearer. Those of Buenos Ayres have been freely purchased at 58, and, in short, the chemist continues to be resorted to by the monied interest for the employment of a part of their capital.

The reduction of the Three-and-a-Half per cents. being now, we may say, completed, less attention has been employed on the English Stock Exchange during this week than previously been shown, but still prices generally have been fairly supported. Buyers of the shares of the Banking establishments are still numerous, particularly for those of the Union Bank of London, in which confidence is weekly increasing. India Stock has nearly reached 200, and Bank Stock has been freely purchased, at 200 to 201. Exchequer Bills have again advanced 2s. and 3s. and 3s 6d to 39 in the anticipation of the Three per Cent Consols. When the New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cents. come fairly into the market, both the Consols and the Three per Cent. Reduced, will, as all events, be worth 90, if not go beyond it; the interest of money, in short, is at present nearly equal to that of steam, in the creation of property

BANKERS' PURSE.—London and Westminster Bank, 2½; London Joint Stock Bank, 1½; Union Bank of London, 1½ to 1¾; Commercial Bank of London, 1½; Provincial Bank of Ireland, 44, National Bank of Ireland, 13½ to 14½, Bank Stock, 201 to 203½; Ditto for Account, 203 to 203½ Three per Cent. Consols, 90 to 90¼; Three-and-a-Half per Cent., New, 102¾; India Bonds, 86, premium; Exchequer Bills, 68 to 70, premium; Consols for Account, 90

FOREIGN STOCKS AND BONDS.—Spanish Fives, 25½; Spanish Threes, 25½ to 37; Austrian Bonds, 118; Russian, 118; Danish 80 to 80; Brazilian, 83; Belgian, 106, Buenos Ayres, 58; Peruvian, 20 to 21; Chilian, 103 to 104; Colombian, 13½; Venezuelans, 41 to 42, Portuguese Converted, 46½; Greek, ex. the Coupons, 14, Dutch 2½ per Cents., 97¾ to 98; Dutch Fives, 101½ to 101; Mexican Bonds, 26½

PRICES OF SHARES IN JOINT STOCK ASSOCIATIONS.—Birmingham and Derby, 60 to 62½; Birmingham, Liverpool, and Manchester, 25 to 27; Bristol and Exeter, 78; Eastern Counties, 13½ to 12, new, 13½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 84 to 85, Great North of England, 103 to 102; Great Western 112; Hull and Selby, 80 to 81; Brighton, 44¾, London and Blackwall, 6¾; London and Brighton, 17¾; London and Birmingham, 235 to 238, Manchester and Leeds, 114 to 113; Manchester and [illegible], South Western, [illegible] to [illegible], North Midland, 12, [illegible], Paris and Orleans, 46½; South Eastern and Dover, 37; York and North Midland, 19½; Eastern Counties, 9; Norwich and Brandon, 6½, Dublin and Belfast, 3½ premium; London and Guildford Junction, ½ premium, Lancaster and Carlisle, 3 premium, Chester and Holyhead, 2 premium; Ditto New, 1 premium; York and North Midland, ¼ to ¾; Chelmsford and Brighton, 6½; Liverpool and Manchester, 220; Strasburg and Bale, 11½ to 12.

THE QUEEN'S DRAWING-ROOM.

Her Majesty held a Drawing-room, the first this season, on Monday afternoon, at St. James's Palace. As this is the second occasion on which the State Apartments have been opened since their being refurnished and decorated, we shall take this opportunity of attempting to describe to our readers the magnificence of the entire suite, acknowledged to be, for purposes of state, the most convenient in Europe. It should be stated that the above restoration was highly requisite, the State Apartments not having been touched by the hand of the decorator since the year 1824; and such has been the economy observed on the present occasion, that the old draperies have been replaced in most of the rooms, but more especially in those apartments used only on state occasions, such as levees and drawing-rooms.

As we described in the 62nd No. of our journal, the entire suite of apartments, and the ceremonial of a drawing-room, it will be only necessary for us to detail the principal changes.

IN THE ARMOURY, OR GUARD-ROOM, forming the entrance to the suite of state rooms from the grand staircase, the arms and trophies which decorate the walls have been entirely cleansed and polished. Other improvements have taken place, adding considerably to the general appearance. From thence the company are ushered to—

THE PRESENCE CHAMBER,

where also much has been done to restore it to its original elegance. The fine old tapestry which, we believe, previous to the fire which partially destroyed the north end of the palace, covered the walls of Queen Anne's-room, has been carefully cleaned, and the rich colours restored. The next apartment is

QUEEN ANNE'S DRAWING-ROOM, OR BALL-ROOM.

The massive cornice, extending the length of the four windows, has been re-gilt; and the draperies are of crimson silk damask, trimmed with heavy gold-coloured fringe. The seats are re-covered with a crimson brocade, and the frames of the furniture have been re-gilt, as likewise the pier tables, candelabra, and other ornaments.

THE DRAWING-ROOM.

This noble apartment, forming the next in order, communicating with the Throne-room, is more sumptuous in its embellishments than the other rooms mentioned above. The carved ceiling has undergone but trifling change, the enriched compartments of the cove and the corner scrolls having been re-gilt. The draperies are new, and designed rather more tastefully than in the Ball room, although of the same material. The elaborately carved cornice, looking-glass frames, and pier tables, have been re-gilt: and the settees of crimson brocade and the other furniture is mostly new.

THE THRONE-ROOM.

Considerable improvement is more particularly apparent in this apartment. The walls are covered with a rich crimson brocade, and the draperies of the four windows are very sumptuous. From the cornice is an under drapery of crimson silk velvet, above which is a gracefully-formed drapery of a fabric of glass and silk interwoven, and called tissue de verre. The glass is of gold colour, and is worked in flowers of a continuous pattern, having to all appearance the effect of exquisite embroidery, and from being on a light crimson ground, becomes most strikingly magnificent, the figures seeming to be in bold relief. The curtains are of the same splendid material, bordered with crimson silk velvet to correspond with the under drapery, handsomely trimmed with gold gimp; the whole being lined with rich crimson ducape. The ceiling, similarly coved as in the Ball-room, is much more elaborately ornamented than any of the others in the range, and with the architraves and mouldings of the windows and doors, have been completely re-gilt and decorated; as have also the superb console tables. The paintings, among which the well-known full-length portrait of George IV., in his coronation robes, by Sir Thomas Lawrence, and the two historical paintings of the battles of Waterloo and Vittoria, have been cleaned, and the frames gilded. The throne—with a trifling exception—is also new. The richly carved canopy is re-gilt, and the pelmet drapery of crimson silk velvet, and its embroideries of our several national insignia, have been carefully restored. The mantle of the throne and the hangings on each side, are of crimson silk velvet, the Royal Arms being embroidered in the centre with the initials V. R. on either side. The curtains are embroidered at the bottom, and fringed with gold. The State chair has been covered with crimson velvet, with the royal cypher embroidered on the banner.

THE ROYAL CLOSET.

Here the window draperies are composed of tissue de verre, to correspond with the throne-room, and the valuable cabinets of buhl, &c., have been repaired. The council-table and massive chair have been suitably restored.

The Queen's Retiring-room, the Entrée-gallery, where the Ministers of State, Ambassadors, and other personages having the privilege of the entrée assemble, and the connecting waiting-rooms, have all been newly embellished and furnished; but, as they possess only minor importance, it is unnecessary to particularise them separately. All the tissue de verre velvet which has been used, is of Spitalfields' manufacture.

THE GUARD-ROOM, ST. JAMES'S PALACE.

On Monday her Majesty and Prince Albert arrived from Buckingham Palace about two o'clock, attended by the royal suite.

Before the Drawing-room, her Majesty, according to annual custom, received a deputation from Christ's Hospital in the royal closet, who were ushered into the presence of the Queen by Sir William Martins, Gentleman Usher in Waiting. The deputation consisted of the President, the Treasurer, and three Governors, accompanied by the Mathematical Master, the Drawing Master, and the Grey Boys educated in the Royal Mathematical School, founded by King Charles II. Her Majesty took particular interest in the drawings and charts of the boys, and was pleased to express her approbation of their execution. Her Majesty inquired the age of a number of the scholars, and was pleased to express the interest she felt in the prosperity of the institution. An engraving of the boys presenting their drawings and charts to her Majesty, last year, will be found in No. 62 of our journal.

Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent was present at the drawing-room.

The Ladies in Waiting on the Queen, the Maids of Honour, and the Women of the Bedchamber to her Majesty, appeared in mourning.

It being a collar day, the knights of the several orders of knighthood wore the collars of their respective orders. The Duke of Wellington wore three collars of knighthood—those of the Order of the Garter, the Golden Fleece, and of the Order of the Bath.

The Duke of Norfolk carried his baton as Earl Marshal of England. The Earl of Erroll also carried his baton of office.

Her Majesty's honourable corps of Gentlemen-at-Arms were on duty at the principal doors in the state rooms, and also in the Portrait Gallery and Presence Chamber.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert, accompanied by her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, and attended by the Ladies in Waiting, and the Lord Chamberlain, the Lord Steward, and the principal officers of the household, having entered the Throne-room, the Foreign Ambassadors and Ministers, and their ladies, were introduced.

We have not space for the entire presentations or lists of company in the circles. The Court appeared in mourning: her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent wearing a costume composed of a black crape dress with flounces embroidered with jet; train and body of rich black double reps, trimmed with crape and jet. Head-dress, black feathers and crape lappets. Half-mourning appears also to have been general among the ladies' dresses.

After the drawing-room the Queen and Prince Albert, and the royal suite, returned to Buckingham Palace, escorted by a party of the household troops.

Our first engraving represents the guard-room, and the progress of the general company. The second illustration shows Queen Anne's room, with the company of the entrée drawing-room in the foreground, and those of the general circle within the brass railing, facing the windows; neither of these apartments was fully shown in our last year's series of illustrations.

Among the presentations were the following:—

QUEEN ANNE'S ROOM, ST. JAMES'S PALACE.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FIGURES.

No. 1. A cachemire Turban-cap. A crape dress, trimmed with satin ribbons.

No. 2. A satin hat. A striped silk dress, ornamented with passementerie (silk gimp), and a quilling composed of the same material as the dress. A velvet, or satin hat. A lace coiffure, with lappets.

BONNET CAP.

The periodical exposition of novelties has commenced at the Palace of the Louvre, and on the reserved days the salons are crowded with élégantes; the following observations have been made on these occasions.

Crape and Satin Hats have now superseded those of velvet; they are frequently ornamented with a half veil of English lace placed on the brim, and with flowers underneath.

Hats and Capotes are now not so low at the ears as they have hitherto been, and the calotte or curtain behind is larger.

The most elegant Coiffures are still composed of lace, placed flat on the head, with lappets descending to the neck.

Lace Caps, ornamented with flowers, are also made in an infinite variety of forms, too numerous to particularize; they are all flat on the head, and the ornaments low on the cheeks.

Dresses with the front of the corsages open are now quite the rage; some are laced in front, others have lappels or facings.

When the question is asked how the skirt of a Dress should be trimmed, it is difficult to be answered, there being at present so great a latitude allowed; some adopt volans, placing them a short distance apart; in this case there are two volans; others ornament the skirt with rolls of bouillonnés (puffings) placed at intervals with a single deep volant underneath. There are, in fact, so many styles admitted, that, in default of a general rule, we must allow all to be right that are becoming.

Madlle. Favanti.—As this fair cantatrice on Saturday last was retiring from her vocal victory, such was the intensity of her feelings that she fell apparently lifeless within a few steps of the stage. Luckily, she soon had medical assistance, and through the skill of Dr. Wardrup recovered in a short time.

Mr. J. H. Tully.—This gentleman, the instructor of the choruses at Drury Lane Theatre, was presented with a handsome gold watch by that body last Monday, as a token of the respect they entertained for him as a man, a musician, and affable director.

RETRIBUTION.

BY THE

BARONESS DE CALABRELLA.

On a rainy evening, in the peculiarly dreary month of November (an English November), two persons were lounging in fauteuils, drawn close to a bright fire which ever and anon gave forth a sudden blaze, and so far illumined the apartment as to make apparent the comforts and almost luxurious fittings up of a well-furnished library.

A large poodle dog was extended on the rug, while the lady's tiny foot rested on its back

"Shall I not ring for lights?" said her companion; "your spirits seem depressed, and this uncertain twilight is calculated to increase rather than banish the gloom by which you are to-day so unusually oppressed. What can be the cause of this sadness, Stella? If any thing distresses you, why not confide it to me? You know my wish, my anxiety, to save you pain; tell me in what I can serve you." And, while speaking, Mr. Nugent arose and gently took her hand. It was cold, and he almost fancied something like a shudder crept over it as he raised it to his lips

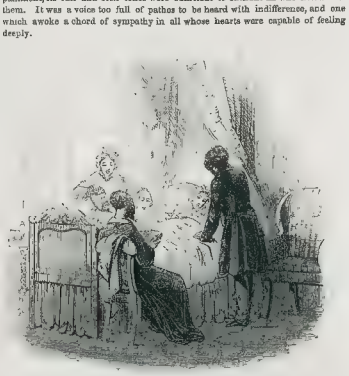
"You are to leave London to-morrow,' said she, "and can you wonder that I am sad, that a sense of my own loneliness should at such a moment obtrude itself'

Mr. Nugent fondly pressed the hand which remained in his, as he replied, "It is true that I am about to leave you, and for an indefinite time, but is it not with the hope of softening those obstacles which prevent our remaining for ever together? Ah! Stella, send me not from you (for is it not you who have bid me go?) with such a rueful countenance. You know how dear, how very dear, my motherless children are to me; do not make me feel that my duty to them forces me to do what will give you pain; would to God that these children knew you—knew you for the good, amiable, high-minded being that you are; but time and their father's proved affection can alone eradicate the unjust prejudices their grandmother has implanted in their young minds. You will write to me daily, Stella. Your beautiful and touching letters, and the high and truthful feelings you so ably paint, will do more than my eloquence to make my children value you; and when your delicacy on that point is satisfied, you will no longer refuse to be their father's wife, their friend and monitress."

Mrs. Hamilton avoided all direct reply, by saying, "I believe you are right, this uncertain glimmer makes me nervous; we will have lights and I will try to be cheerful. Shall I ring to you?"

She sat down to the piano and began to sing, her voice needed but little accompaniment, its full and rich tones were sufficient to enchant all who listened to them. It was a voice too full of pathos to be heard with indifference, and one which awoke a chord of sympathy in all whose hearts were capable of feeling deeply.



On this evening she sang with even more than her usual expression, and Mr. Nugent would have listened on entranced, but for the thought (which was ever uppermost in his mind) that something might yet be added to her comfort during his absence

"Did you not say you wished for a harp, Stella?" said he. "I will write to Erard immediately (and he proceeded to do so), to send you one of his last improved ones. You will practise during my absence, but not too much; remember, you must think chiefly of your health, and go out and amuse yourself as much as possible, if only to enliven my solitude by your lively descriptions."

I beg pardon. Mr. Nugent to his family seat to resume his parental duties, and with a firm hope of soon persuading his children to think of Mrs. Hamilton as affectionately as he himself did; and Mrs. Hamilton, to indulge in every caprice and pleasure which presented itself, or could be imagined by her, at Mr. Nugent's expence.

Mrs. Hamilton was a widow when her acquaintance with Mr. Nugent commenced. She had been brought up from childhood in habits of luxury, and during the few years of her husband's life, the principal of her fortune (which had not been settled) enabled her still to enjoy them; but, on looking into her affairs when she became a widow, she found that a very scanty provision was all which remained to the once wealthy heiress.

Endowed with great personal beauty, and with a highly cultivated mind, Mrs. Hamilton was not long without admirers. Her husband's testamentary dispositions had brought her into intimate acquaintance with Mr Nugent, for he was named sole executor to the will. At the period of Mr. Hamilton's death, Mr. Nugent had been some years a widower, and had devoted his whole time to the care and education of four girls growing fast into womanhood. Had any one said to Mr. Nugent that he would subject these beloved girls to the always galling yoke of a step-mother, he would have left his principles and parental affections misunderstood; but Mr. Nugent, like many others, was firm in his own untried strength, though it was not without certain feelings of alarm that he found himself a constant visitor at Mrs. Hamilton's. At first the arrangement of her affairs served as a pretext, and perhaps hid even from himself the weakness of his heart; but there came a moment when all was made clear to his understanding, and the truth in all its force was felt by the generous and positive nature of his youngest and scarcely best-loved daughter. "Papa," said she, "I hate Mrs. Hamilton; grandmamma says she is a syren, and lures you from your home."

The anxious father stood rebuked by his innocent child. Happy had it been for all if this remark had changed, as well as laid bare, the feelings of his heart. But it was not to be; and Mr. Nugent was no uncommon instance of a man who, because he cannot reconcile two contending interests, endeavours to silence his reason by the force of his feelings. Had Mr. Nugent lived with his children on the terms most fathers do, they would have had no right to complain, however much they might have lamented his making a second choice; but, from the hour of their poor mother's death, he had loudly declared no other should ever fill her place, that his love and his watchful care should be such, that his children should in him find a father's love and a mother's tenderness.

This promise had been religiously fulfilled till his acquaintance with Mrs. Hamilton ripened into intimacy, and then it became enfeebled by the numerous imperfections, his finer feelings deeply interested in her desolate position, and his self-love flattered by her apparent trust and almost child-like devotion to his opinion.

It may here be said that Mrs. Hamilton's means were found at the time of her husband's decease to be quite inadequate to her former style of living; but it had been Mr. Nugent's delight to surround her with every comfort his fortune could command. The expenses attendant on his own individual pursuits were abandoned. Mr. Nugent no longer kept hounds. Mr. Nugent no longer sought to become member for the country, in which his old hereditary estate stood. He neither debarred nor restricted his children's enjoyments; but these which had been his own were relinquished, that Mrs. Hamilton might not have any sacrifice to make.

It was peculiarly convenient to Mrs. Hamilton to make no inquiries as to the source from whence her expenses were duly supplied, and it accorded so well with the delicacy and refinement of Mr. Nugent's feelings that she should look upon him as the purveyor of her comforts, rather than the donor of his property, that silence reigned between them on the subject.

Mr. Nugent became every day more attached to this lady, and at length made her an offer of his hand. This was a moment Mrs. Hamilton had long looked forward to, and was prepared to give it the turn she thought most certain to preserve Mr Nugent's regard, and not compromise her own position, which was far more agreeable to her than becoming the step-mother of four grown girls.

She spoke of her affection for him as a fact he could not doubt, but said she should rest prove its extent by sacrificing her feelings to his interests and his children's welfare.

"I am aware," said she, "of their prejudices against me; and, though I feel them to be unjust, I would not place you in the cruel position of proceeding your wife against your children's unkindness, or shielding them against the ill-humour which I might perhaps feel while under the smart of their injustice. I would willingly," continued she, "devote my life to your happiness: to become your wife would be to realise my highest ambition; but I cannot, will not, enter a family who are determinedly prejudiced against me. Who knows," added she (while tears came opportunely to her aid), "who knows but the dislike to my children may eventually wear away time, influence your feelings, and lessen your regard."

It would be difficult to determine, after the first mortification had been got over, whether Mr. Nugent did or did not feel Mrs. Hamilton's decision a respite. His love for her was great, but his attachment to his children would have made it most painful to him to have caused them sorrow, and he perhaps felt unskilful with the understanding that he was shortly to leave London, and endeavour to win them over by argument and kindness to give at least a tacit approval of his marriage with Mrs. Hamilton. Nine days were, however, to elapse before he could tear himself away, and it was on the evening before his departure that we found them installed together by her fireside, at the commencement of our story.

Mr. Nugent's evening visit had been paid to his children's apartments, but it was not like their mention on former occasions. It had not the same charm of free and perfect unreserve. Both father and children had thoughts in which the other could feel no sympathy, and a fear of saying anything could not have on the forbidden subject, kept up a reserve hitherto unknown in their intercourse, which had ever been one of perfect confidence between parent and child.

Day after day passed, and nothing was heard Mr. Nugent still at ent as to his intended marriage. He looked at his eldest daughter, and thought not unnatural it was that she should dislike to have any one put in authority over her; but in this thought Mr. Nugent did his daughter injustice, from the eldest to the youngest their repugnance to this union arose from the representations their grandmother had made to them of Mrs. Hamilton's character, declaring her to be an artful, designing woman, wholly indifferent to their welfare, except from interested motives.

The daily correspondence Mr. Nugent had solicited was kept up by the lady, and her clear and brilliant style could not but render her letters most acceptable, while, even if they had not conveyed the incense they invariably did to his self love, by professions of attachment and anxiety for his happiness.

During the winter Mr. Nugent's absence was first rendered afflicted with severe illness, and the fond father never left her couch till he heard her pronounced out of danger, and then, during her convalescence, he would so completely devote his time to her—would read to and with her so much—from the eldest to the youngest their repugnance to this union arose from the representations their grandmother had made to them of Mrs. Hamilton's character, declaring her to be an artful, designing woman, wholly indifferent to their welfare, except from interested motives.

But, his child again restored to health, Mr. Nugent could no longer endure his separation from Mrs. Hamilton, and, without having advanced one step in removing his daughters' dislike, he returned to her, to receive congratulations on his return to her determination, and trust to after events to make her and his children friends.

And what had been Mrs Hamilton's real occupations while Mr. Nugent was keeping watch by his invalid daughter? Far different from those detailed in her letters. True, she had freq uented the scenes she described, but it had been in company with one on whom her heart's wealth was bestowed. Very early in life, ere she became the wife of Mr. Hamilton, her fancy had been enslaved by the personal beauty and fashionable appearance of Horace Vernon. When, as a widow, she again met him, the impressions of her youth were revived, and their acquaintance renewed. Till Mr. Nugent's depart ure nothing like intimacy was apparent, but from that hour they were ad lom seen apart. To those who were watching this fusion it became evident that the lady's side there was deep and devoted attachment; for she seemed to live but in the presence of one whose manner rather betokened the endurance of her attachment than any part ourtion of it.

Horace Vernon was known to be poor, was supposed to be industrious, and straggled to possess himself of means sufficient to permit his marriage with a young and very lovely lady in the humble sphere and moderate expectations Fortunes were now neglected for the ignoble one of being Mrs. Hamilton's cavalier servante. This lady had presented him to Mr. Nugent as one whose noble name she had formerly known, and who had spoken of his limited income, and lamented that such high talent should not be more justly appreciated, and mentioned the current report of his engagement to a very lovely girl; the only obstacle to their union being his inability to command practice at the bar. Ever alive to talent, and anxious to protect merit, Mr. Nugent had several times succeeded in bringing Mr. Vernon forward as a barrister, and when Mrs. Hamilton spoke of him in her letters it was with Mr Nugent's generous feelings. The Horace Vernon had become a changed man, and, with the gratefulness of true attachment, the young girl to whom his faith was pledged, discovered the change almost before he became conscious of it himself. Her income had been not filled with reproaches in the common acceptation of the word, but they contained expressions of meekness and sorrow which would have wrung the soul of him who addressed, had not that second year's penury only given the more ardent attachment. Horace Vernon would not admit that he was changed. No—the change, he said, was in the being whose heart was breaking under his cruel and unjust remonstrance. His love, only two weeks prior, gave the young victim force to put an end to their engagement, and Horace Vernon was a free man

Mrs. Hamilton had evidently derived this event, but its achievement was far from giving her the confidence she had expected. True, she had no longer an undivided rival, but from that hour Horace became a cold, calculating, unbending tyrant, rather than an assiduous lover. Her proud and imperious mind had found its master, and she lived in abject slave. Still she loved him, if such feeling could be called love. Many of their hours, when together, were passed in strife and menace; but it yet his absence seemed an insupportable evil, and it was one which he never failed to inflict on the woman on whose pride he doted.

The name for Mr Nugent's return to town was rapidly approaching; in every letter he spoke of it, and Mrs. Hamilton's senses were in a tumult of alarm; for Horace Vernon, knowing her power, had made the condition of his continued intercourse with her to depend on her skilful management of Mr. Nugent. "One act of weakness," he would say; "one moment of folly, and you never behold me more."

"I will save you weakness," she replied; "but remember, Horace, that my reward is not to be long delayed, that I am shortly"——

In no gentle voice did he interrupt her, exclaiming, "Are you mad, or do you wish to make me so? How often have I told you that I cannot, will not, live to be breathed long enough for your own ear to catch the sound? Beware, Stella, I am no Mr. Nugent, to be gulled and trifled with."

Wrung by a mingle threat did he leave her to reflect on measures necessary for the present moment; but Mrs. Hamilton trusted rather to chance for the direction of her present conduct, while she gave herself up to reflect on that future he had forbade her to mention.

These reflections were broken in upon by the sudden appearance of Mr Nugent, who, in eager hope of the pleasure his arrival would bestow, hurried to her house as soon as he got out of his travelling carriage. At the first moment she was so completely taken by surprise that it was beyond her powers of deception to meet him with her wonted warmth of manner; and Mr Nugent almost fancied that she seemed less glad than he had expected to find her But in a few minutes she had regained complete possession of herself, and he was again the slave of her will Her empire seemed more firmly established by their separation, and she exerted more power over him, as though she expected compensation for the time he had been removed from his influence.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Shall we go see the order of the course?—SHAKESPEARE.

The racing season formerly opened on the Warwick course—a course unsung it must be confessed—but it commences with the Spring Meeting on Epsom Downs, where people calculate on the début of a few Derby nags. As the latter tryst took place yesterday, we may assume that the business of the turf is fairly on the tapis, although that enacted twenty-four hours since was not of sufficient interest to call for a recapitulation of its details. The curtain having thus drawn up, we venture forth, in the capacity of chorus (or the old style), if haply not to grace the scene, at least to help on the plot more or to disappoint its immoralities, as it shall fall out. The position of the turf was never, probably, since its institution, so critical as at the present hour. The decision of the House of Commons as to whether betting is to be made a lawful accessory of it, or not, will wholly affect its character. Should the legalising of bets pass into a law, how will its popularity be influenced in a social relation? Will public convenience be served, the cause of honour or honesty promoted? The public impression of the economy of racing, according to the practice adopted, and long recognised by its leaders, was greatly improved by the evidence (or rather the opinion) given by Lord John Fitzroy—whose name is a guarantee for all that is honourable in sporting as in everything else—in a trial for libel which arose out of some charges made concerning the Derby of 1842. Had the public been cognisant of the following circumstance, alleged to have occurred in connexion with the St. Leger of 1836, what would they think of the system tolerated (to say nothing of practised) by honourable men. What would Lord John Fitzroy have said touching his opinion of it had he been examined respecting it?

One of the best two-year-olds of 1835 showed in high form for his three-year-old engagements, and, not being in the Derby, was backed very readily for the Doncaster St. Leger. As early as Goodwood Races, we believe, he had reached 6 to 1; at which figure the public backed him to a formidable extent: of course, countenanced in their speculation by the conviction that they were to have a race for their chance—if, indeed, the "crack" did not walk over. Shortly before Doncaster Races, however, it was publicly announced at Tattersall's, that the favourite would be allowed to run through at all, provided that his proprietor received, as a premium, the odds to £12,000, at double the market price—or, in plain English, a douceur of £6000!

That he did receive it is also understood, as also that thereby the backers of the favourite had £6000, to all intents and purposes, taken out of their pockets. Now this ingenious stratagem for raising the wind is attributed to an individual then and still a member of the Jockey Club. The committee on the gambling bill can at once satisfy themselves whether this be a fact or not of this story—the public agent in it, according to vulgar report, being a member of their own house.

If they do not investigate a fact so very generally received, will they feel that they are doing their duty? will the public so believe? And if they do probe it, and become assured of its truth, will they pass a measure to legalize play or pay betting on horse races, a system by which so grievous an outrage against honour—if not against honesty —could be perpetrated? Let the committee legislate—for so it can not only on the letter, but the spirit of fair play, for so popular a national taste as that of racing.

It is excellent well to examine trainers and betting men and gentlemen as to theories, but let not facts be overlooked. The existing turf system abounds with materials and facilities for chea—— that is to say for chicane. There's backing "lots," and then replenishing them, as with Seahorse in the Doncaster division, and Sister to Grey Momus colt in the Malton "lot." No offence to John Day and Scott, who have nothing to do with it. Then comes your handicap—a modern contrivance—whereby the schemer may make the winner if it so please his caprice, or his interest, a "certainty," as we once heard a tout say. Then what are your anonymous nominations for (an Irish figure of speech, for our English figure of over-reach)? Is it that we may not know whose nose to pull when we come to confess here? And there's the bi-and-di colt, the property of half-fortests, the meaning of which is, that the winner of a race does not receive half his stakes.

There are abominations in the economy of modern racing that cry aloud for reformation. Unless the gambling committee can mend these things, the less they meddle with the business the better. We don't want our national sports to be turned into substitutes for the street's cockpit; they should be cherished as a manly recreation or a manly enterprize—that alone is their legitimate character, their true English application. . . . What's that? A salute is roaring from the battery of the Royal Yacht Squadron-house. We see the flags and streamers are indicting their pleasant sympathy. Lo! sweeping through the white surge of the wind-stirred Solent comes a trim vessel, "her streamers waving in the wind." What is she, and whence does she come? It is the R. Y. S. cutter, the Ganymede, returning from the Straits. Hurrah for Mr. Pigott! the cutter's chivalry at Melton, or a cruise in the Mediterranean, is the true fashion of an English gentleman's recreations. All the gambling committees on earth or ocean could not help us to any so germane to the purpose; nor all the pens that ever writ quotations such as follow:

BETTING AT TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—The absence of most of the leading speculators at Northampton races, had the usual effect at the Corner, business being so flat and unimportant as to call for nothing more than a brief quotation of prices:—

	20 to 1 —— Cotherstone (t)

THURSDAY.—We need not expose the "nakedness of the land" by entering at length into the doings of the dullest of afternoons. Enough be it to state that Pagan retreated to 10 to 1 before Chesterfield morning, but on the last of a few venture, with plenty of friends; and that Jamie Forest and Scalteen were backed at better prices than have been quoted of late. For the Derby, the Ugly Buck and Orlando were cried up to evens, the former, as will be seen, no one would make out, owing quite as many friends as Mr. Crockford's mare Ionian, or the sister to Grey Momus colt. Mainstay and Akbar were shelved; no material alteration in the others

It is in contemplation to establish a police force for the security of that great national emporium of nuttiness of war, Woolwich Royal Dockyard, similar to that in her Majesty's dockyard, under Inspectors Robinson and Howard, of the metropolitan police.

Soon after his trial and conviction at Lewes Assizes, John Lawrence was removed to Horsham Gaol, in front of which he is to be executed on Saturday, the 6th of April. A very large subscription is being raised for the wife and nine orphan children of the late chief officer.

SPRING.—The prevalency of cutaneous visitations at this period of the year inculcates the necessity of preserving the Skin in a pure and healthy state, so that its functions may be duly performed. The high-and luxurious, yet rarely-enjoyed, blessing of a healthy complexion as scarce yet solid and seeming extirpator of all impurities of the skin, is during the period of Spring most pleasantly obtained. This preparation is the GREAT RESTORATIVE, and AN INVIGORATING, is equally celebrated for safety in application, as for unfailing efficacy in removing all impurities and disfigurements, and in promoting a healthy freshness and transparency to the skin and complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled Shopkeepers, who give the title of 'GENUINE' KALYDOR to compounds of their own manufacture, or from other deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and, by their repellant action on cutaneous health. It is therefore necessary to ask for the genuine article—to see that "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR" are on the wrapper.—All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

TWENTY YEARS' LOSS OF HAIR AND WONDERFUL RESTORATION.—"Church street, Weedby, Oct. 19, 1841. Gentlemen,—Of the last supply of OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA, every bottle was sold immediately on receipt, and I have many more inquiries remaining for a further supply, which I hope you will send without the least delay. Orders have poured in more than ever since the powerful effects of the Balm have been so decisively demonstrated in the cases of several respectable persons residing in this neighbourhood, whose hair, among others which have attracted particular attention, is the case of a gentleman who had had little or no hair for twenty years. His head was completely covered in ten days, and ultimately his head shaved, and wore a wig. At my recommendation he tried the balm; and, after using it according to the directions for a short time, his head was supplied, and he has now as fine a head of hair as any person in Weedby.—Yours, &c., JOHN KILVINGTON.—To Messrs Kennaby, Brothers, 16, Westmoreland buildings, Aldersgate-street, London."— OLDRIDGE'S BALM OF COLUMBIA is the only preparation in the first application causes it to curl beautifully, frees it from scurf, and stops it from falling off.—Price 3s. 6d., 6s., and 11s. per bottle.—Ask for Oldridge's Balm of Columbia, 1, Wellington street, Strand.

ROYAL PATENT CARPETING, manufactured without RAP, or weaving.—This CARPETING having now obtained the universal approval of Royalty, the Nobility, Gentry, and the Public, for its elegance, durability, and economy, the PATENT SCHOOLED FLOOR CLOTH COMPANY beg to say that the sole manufacturers, beg to announce that their Patterns for the Spring, in the most novel and elegant designs, are now out and may be had at all the respectable Carpet Warehouses in London. In consequence of the increasing demand for this article, several parties have attempted to introduce to the public goods of a very spurious manufacture to imitate the Patent Carpeting, but, therefore in the interest of the public, it is but fair to the disadvantages of a common drugget. The Royal Carpeting possesses the quality of being perfectly reversible, and, therefore is by far more economical than any article hitherto produced for the same purposes. The Company have also a large assortment of Window Curtains and Table Covers, embossed and printed, in new and elegant patterns, and have all sizes. Tabinets, Venetians, Floorcloths, and numerous other goods of their manufacture. Agents have been appointed for the sale of these goods in all the principal towns of the United Kingdom Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, and Borough-road, London. PARR'S LIFE PILLS NOT ONLY PURIFY THE BLOOD, but also the CHYLE, BILE, and ALL OTHER FLUIDS, from which blood is composed. In all cases of dyspepsia, chills, jaundice, flatulence, heart burn, spasm, and all disorders of the stomach, bowels, and liver, they will effect a cure when all other medicines have failed. Of this we have ample proofs to exhibit to all who wish to investigate them.

The unparalleled reputation which PARR'S PILLS have acquired as a Medical Restorative, is the most unquestionable proof that can be given of their immense importance to the afflicted in almost every class of diseases. The number of letters received from patients recovered through their means is really prodigious, and the complaints they have cured are almost as varied as they are numerous

Their fame has extended to America, India, and all parts of the world, and equally there, as in England, are effecting surprising cures.

STATUE OF SIR CHARLES METCALFE. BY BAILY, R.A.

STATUE OF SIR CHARLES METCALFE.

This noble statue of the popular ex-Governor of Jamaica has just been completed by Mr. Baily: it is of pure white marble, somewhat above life size, and cost £2000; and it will be placed upon a suitable pedestal, in the public square of Spanish Town, towards the close of the present year. It is, altogether, a fine work, and must add to the high reputation of the sculptor.

This statue has been voted by the Hon. House of Assembly in Jamaica, as a testimonial of their estimation of Sir Charles Metcalfe's Government. Some time since, Mr. Baily, having completed the head and face, sent out to Spanish Town a beautiful cast of the same for the approval of the Committee of the House of Assembly, of which the Speaker is Chairman. In one of the Jamaica journals it is stated:—"We understand from those who have again looked our old friend in the face, that it is an admirable likeness. Indeed, it is said that there does not appear to be any suggestion necessary from the Committee to improve it. The cast is intended by Mr. Baily as a present to his honour the Speaker, who, we have no doubt, will be pleased at being presented with so faithful a likeness of his old acquaintance."

S. LOVER, ESQ.

This gentleman is a native of the sister country, where he commenced his career as a miniature-painter, in which line he soon became eminent, even surpassing his precursor Robertson in the strength and fidelity of his portraits. Endowed by nature with a turn for music and poetry, he was not content to remain in his father-land, where merit is appreciated, but not rewarded, and hastened soon to the mart of the world, London! Here his genius as an author quickly developed itself—producing many works, dramatic and narrative, which sufficiently proved him to be a man of original and versatile powers. The lectures which he has given of late under the title of "Irish Evenings" are replete with interesting anecdotes and vocal illustrations, amongst which we must mention the musical recital of some old Irish airs to his own words. Of all the "national" lectures, we must pronounce Mr. Lover's to be the most humorous and entertaining.

DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—M. DUPREZ.

The début of this distinguished tenor was attended by such infelicitous concomitants, that any other man would have been au desespoir on the occasion; but Duprez's claims to admiration are too solidly based to be overturned by any adverse storm which circumstance may bring to assail them; he knows this, and he therefore stood with firmness against it. On each repetition of his Arnold, in "Guillaume Tell," his strength became more and more apparent. He is a lesson to many of our English would-be singers, who possess greater physical powers, a lesson which, though gratuitously given to them, should not be overlooked or despised. Duprez is a foreigner, who, not by accident, but design, is acquainted with our language to such a degree of perfection, as (with a little French accent) to enable his auditory to understand every word — nay syllable, he utters! Moreover, he is a great actor—certainly the greatest lyric actor we have seen since the days of Garcia and Ambrogetti—such a man as we should have expected Kean to have been, had he cultivated his voice for vocal instead of verbal eloquence. Duprez's style is severe; he never presumes to insult his author by interpolations of his own, or to pander to the bad taste of a general public by disguising

A pattern of the rarest virtue, which
The pains and learning of some genius cost!

No; Duprez is a singing-actor, sui generis, and stands alone in the peculiarity of his greatness—viz., one who looks to sentiment more than sound, to dramatic truth more than clap-trap imposition, and who would rather have the cause of his client-composer unsuccessfully advocated by legitimate means, than see it successful, at the outrage of all taste and judgment.

The opera of "The Favorite," our readers will recollect, was produced, last October, at Drury Lane, with Templeton as Ferdinand, and Leffler as Alfonso; in the present caste Duprez is in his original part (expressly written for him), a substitution, or rather restoration, which exhibits the beauty of the character in its proper light. Stretton is in the place of Leffler, which we regret for many reasons: in the first place he cannot sing the music half so well as his predecessor; he pumps his voice very annoyingly; and in the next, we cannot but think that Leffler has been hardly dealt with. It was no crime to be labouring under a severe hoarseness. Miss Romer with Duprez is not the Miss Romer with Templeton; she has caught inspiration from her present vocal coadjutor, and fairly divides the palm with him. Of the present, the original representative of Ferdinand, too much cannot be said in praise. Actor, musician, and vocalist—accomplished alike in all—he certainly vindicates the bold assertion of the play bills, which announce him as "the most eminent tenor in Europe." Rubini may have more delicacy of voice, but there is an insipidity in his manner (we speak comparatively) which almost renders him to be "vox et præterea nihil." Mario has a freshness of organ, which, in itself, is delicious, but he pleases on the stage little more than he would in a concert room. Duprez, on the contrary, is an artiste of such rare compound, in which passion and identity with the part he would personate are the chief ingredients, that he quite carries us away by a sympathy which the others know not how to create or control.

The scene we illustrate is that in which Ferdinand indignantly renounces the King's favour and proves that a noble mind can undergo any privation but its own self-approval. In this scene Duprez was magnificently effective.

But we should fill our whole paper were we to enter into a minute analysis of his perfections: suffice it to say (and we are not alone in our opinion) that in the last scene there never was anything more tragically beautiful than his acting. In his gaze at the melancholy girl who dies in his arms, there is an admixture of conflicting passions —Fear—Hope—Despair, which, without his accessory of voice, would constitute him a great actor—able to assume the most intense character of our Shakspeare. In that momentary ebullition of abandonment, the passage in the duet, "Joy, joy once more fills my heart," (which was encored) he was most passionately energetic; and in justice to Miss Romer we must say that she was as enthusiastic and great as he. Duprez's stay in England will be short, and we advise every vocalist, nay, every actor, to go and take a lesson from him. What Horace said of writing—

Scribendi rectè sapere est et principium et fons, may be applied to singing and acting too—which may be freely translated: "the more you know about your business the better."

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.

All lovers of graceful agility, or, in other words, elegant dancing, will regret to hear that Carlotta Grisi is about to depart from, or has already left our shores. The following tributary lines we believe will express the general loss or lessening of enjoyment which is experienced by her absence.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA GRISI IN LA ESMERALDA.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA GRISI.

"And will she not come again?"—SHAKSPEARE.

Farewell! farewell! Terpsichore's daughter!
Buoyant, and graceful, and free—
Ne'er did more beauty come over the water
Than we have worship'd in thee:
Light be thy heart as thy own reckless bounding,
Ne'er may it sorrow or sigh,
But while the world with thy fame is resounding,
Turn the sweet light of thine eye
Back to that island where many regret thee,
Many who think thee the first—
Who, if they see thee not, ne'er will forget thee,
But keep in their memory nursed
"The form of a Grace with the mind of a Muse,"
A sylphid they lov'd and unwilling to lose!

NEW MUSIC.

The Flutonicon, or Flute Player's Monthly Magazine. G. Gauge and Co., Poultry.

The present number contains airs from Boildieu's opera, "Joan of Arc," tastefully arranged and marked for the instrument.

Melodies for the Million.—New work for all instruments? The Musical Bee. Sherwood and Co., Paternoster-row.

This little "Monthly Hive" or "Collection of the 'Choicest Flowers' of Melody," as it calls itself, contains twenty different items; but whether they will suit all instruments or not, is hard to say. They will be found useful to amateurs and young beginners on the flute, violin, &c.

Song. The Aerial Steam Carriage. Written by J. A. Page, Esq., composed by F. H. L. Pendleton. Smith, Liverpool.

This song is very cleverly written, containing throughout several capital hits. In the last four lines, the author thus expresses his scepticism of the projected scheme:—

"We've seen it described in the papers—and heard
"That it form and in figure it's much like a bird;
"But tho' it has wings, and a fine flowing tail,
"We must think, 'till we see, that it's more like a whale!"

The music is à la John Parry, and very appropriate and effective.

No. 101, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1844. [Sixpence.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

PARLIAMENT having risen for the holidays, there is a short suspension of the interest attached to its proceedings. We take advantage of the interval to pass in brief review the state of "Foreign Affairs," not exclusively as they are connected with the commercial interests of this country, but in some degree as they seem likely to affect the future prospects of the different nations themselves. In the stir and excitement of the many domestic questions that affect ourselves, we are apt to lose sight of the state of affairs abroad, of the difficulties, the struggles, the intrigues, the oppression of the weak, and the domination of the strong, all working on the destinies of mankind at large, all in simultaneous operation, yet often overlooked by us, and not seldom entirely forgotten.

In the last twelvemonths, Spain has been the country whose condition has excited most attention, on the same principle that periods of public calamity make the most prominent appearance in the pages of history. Plagues, battles, revolutions, conflagrations, massacres, all that entails horrors and sufferings on the existing generations of mankind, are dwelt on by the writers of what passes for history with the greatest care. The world is well supplied with records of the careers of Kings and Conquerors;—the history of a people, of the great mass of society, remains untold, because unknown. The rocks that break the smooth course of the stream are more noted than the stream itself which flows on to its ocean unregarded. Thus, of the condition of the Spaniards, taken as a people, we have but imperfect notions; but of the crimes of their rulers, o their imbecility, equalled only by their cruelty, which leads them to mark every success by some deed of butchery—of all this we have full, if not wholly accurate, accounts; and those accounts will be the materials of future history. In reading such instances of the bloodthirsty spirit of revenge, breaking all the bonds of humanity, our indignation is apt to be so strongly excited, that there is a danger of our becoming unjust, and visiting on a whole people the reproaches that are due, perhaps, only to the few in whom the worst failings of the national character have become developed by the license of strength in the midst of anarchy to the pitch of unreasoning ferocity. The greatest curse inflicted on a nation by the long existence of a despotism, is, that it becomes demoralized and degraded. The people are deprived of liberty till they become unfit for it, and, unfortunately, the effects of the yoke, moral and physical, do not disappear when it is, by time and circumstances, broken asunder. Ever since the death of Ferdinand VII., Spain has been the seat of a civil war, ending in a military Regency, that again breaking up into a contest of faction with faction, continued till it became an inextricable mass of confusion, of which all that seemed certain was the brutal ferocity of all parties, when they got the ascendancy. The passions are strong in the children of the South, and human life is not valued where the criminal law gives it scarce the semblance of protection. One act of revenge inevitably leads to another, by way of retaliation—"blood will have blood;" and so the fierce game goes on—the players stake their lives, and submit to their fate when the dice is against them, with remarkable firmness; they suffer but what, had they been the winners, they would have been ready to inflict. In the atrocities of the military executions at Alicant and Pampeluna, we see the terrible fruits of the cruel despotism to which the army was accustomed, both as subject and instrument, in the reign of Ferdinand. It is an utterly unfounded charge to allege that these crimes are the consequence of Revolutionary principles. That "child and champion" of the principle of the "divine right of kings"—the superstitious bigot, Ferdinand, authorised massacres as brutal, and drew his victims within his reach by a treachery even more detestable. The politics of Spain are poisoned by the universal corruption of those engaged in its contests; but one section is, unhappily, not to be preferred in this respect to another.

The affairs of Spain have just arrived at another crisis by the arrival of the Queen-mother at Madrid, to assume the government, for the authority of her child will, of course, be a mere cover for her own. If her influence can restore something like order, bad as the means have been which have reopened her path to the throne, her re-accession will be a boon to Spain. But it is useless for her adherents to try to conceal the fact that she is not popular. Her every footstep towards Madrid has been marked by blood. The stages of her triumph have been celebrated by military executions, and the purchased shouts of those placed to welcome her arrival, have been accompanied by the dread sound of the vollies that hurried whole bands of the vanquished factions into eternity. There has been an attempt to make her entry into the capital a spectacle of festivity and rejoicing, but it seems to have been a failure, while the tinsel tawdriness of the exhibition, coming as it did so close upon such deeds of blood, appears one of the saddest contrasts of the mean with the horrible, ever presented in the course of human affairs. Here is an extract from the account:

> A gilt coach, drawn by six horses, and containing half-a-dozen nymphs in pink gauze, burning incense and other perfumes, now made its appearance. The horses of the Queen now came in view, followed by another vehicle, freighted, like the former, with ladies in gauze dresses, who were occupied in throwing out faded flowers, weeds, and nettles, into the faces of the bystanders. Under a canopy of this sate a female, gaudily decorated, representing Spain, and her judicial, de cted features conveyed to the mind of the stranger an accurate impression of the condition of that unhappy country. Next in the order of arrangement was a second group, with more palm twigs, more rude acclamation. A aide-de-camp mounted on a restive horse, and holding fast by the mane chance was [illegible] chief cause of anger to girls and others. Spadem furiosa, with cas[illegible] the next. A landau, drawn by six horses, contains Queen Isabella [illegible] Maria Christina, with her four children. On the left of her Majesty we [illegible] attitude denoting an affecting solicitude for her children. On a seat before the ex-Regent was placed a pile of clean pocket-handkerchiefs; at her feet was a heap of wet ones—they were saturated with tears. Roses and oranges were thrown by young ladies from the windows of the private dwellings, the greater part of which falling short, were unappropriated by the pop lace.

Was such a scenic effect ever attempted without the walls of the Opera? The pink gauze, the perfumes, the flowers, the dust! girls, the studied attitude of the prima donna, the wet handkerchiefs, and the dry ones; the whole array moving through a population which, the rod of martial law being extended over it dared not express its feelings; all this delusive display contrasts strangely with the three hundred bombs thrown by Roncali into the castle of Moros, and the five-and-twenty men murdered in cold blood at the gate of Alicant. We trust, for the sake of Spain and of humanity, that the second sway of Christina may be marked with more wisdom than her first, and that it may proceed bet er than it seems to have begun.

But Spain has detained us too long; some attention is due to the state of matters in other countries, but our allusion to them must of necessity be brief.

In Italy there are symptoms of discontent, repressed only by the immense military power of Austria, which could be brought to bear on any isolated movement with an effect that would render its success a matter beyond hope or possibility. These discontents do not prevail so much in the Austrian states as in those which are subjected to the political power of the Pope, who, as a temporal ruler, exhibits a lamentable lack of worldly wisdom and political intelligence. As jealous as Austria itself of any advance on the part of the people towards freer institutions, he is not so able in his administration of their affairs, and is far less careful of the phy ical wants of his subjects Metternich is the minister of a despot, and would crush political freedom from a conviction that it is a dangerous gift. He has annihilated the press, prohibited discussion, till he has destroyed the wish to discuss the questions that are forbidden. But, on the other hand, the state he rules taxes the people lightly, provides for their material comfort, sees that no class wants food, and that all have amusements, and if a people must be slaves, it is, perhaps, some alleviation of their state, that they should be well fed ones. But the Roman States, while they are as much under the yoke as those held by Austria, feel the want of that clear-sighted provision for the physical necessities of the inhabitants, which is the redeeming quality of the sway of Metternich: and the consequence is what we see—hatred ill suppressed, and rebellion only prevented by fear.

THE NEW ROYAL EXCHANGE.

By the courtesy of [illegible] we are enabled to present to our readers a [illegible] drawn by the accurate Cooke, under the superintendence of Mr. Tite, as we are about to [illegible] the interior of the building next week. The view has been taken from the [illegible] in front of the portico, and exhibits [illegible] the principal features in relation to those of the Bank of England, the church of St Michael, Cornhill, which are also shown in the engraving.

With the promptitude and punctuality that have attended all the proceedings connected with this noble structure, the mass of Bankbuildings, which conceal the royal or west front, have been removed within a short month, and the portico in all its beauty is now exhibited. It is stated to be by far the largest portico in London, and to be only second to the portico of the Pantheon, at Rome, and the Madeleine, at Paris. It consists in front of eight Corinthian columns, the extreme breadth being 90 feet, and the height to the apex of the pediment 76 feet. At the last meeting of the Joint Gresham Committee the most liberal suggestion was entertained for further decorations in relation to the exposure of the architecture; and it was resolved, that it was [illegible] to the sculptors on the pediment, the interior should be decorated by a [illegible] Queen Victoria; and that inasmuch as the statue of the munificent founder, Sir Thomas Gresham, in the [illegible] is destroyed by fire, a new one should be provided and placed in the niche of the tower over the great eastern entrance. Other suggestions for further decorations were referred to a sub-committee for consideration

Hereafter, we shall illustrate the striking changes which have taken place upon this site during the past century: and, upon the completion of the New Exchange, we shall describe and figure its leading architectural details.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, April 2.

SPAIN.

Christina is once more in Madrid. The inhabitants received her with enthusiasm; her levee was well attended. The theatre she was received with acclamations: in short, in the Spanish capital the Queen Mother is the idol of the day. The same men who drove [illegible] the Minister who ended her with the most [illegible] are now in her train. The only reason capable of saving the country from anarchy and [illegible] is their retired or their love, go to extremes. Christina is now their Providence; and to such an extent do they carry their enthusiasm, that one of the influential papers gravely relates "that when Espartero left Madrid to bombard Barcelona, a raven hovered over his head, from the palace of Buena Vista, as far as the Prado, and then, after having almost knighted him, suddenly disappeared; that even when the two Queens entered Madrid, on the 23rd, a dove entered their carriage, and was carried by Queen Isabella to her palace!!"

Wait awhile. The struggle for power between Christina and Narvaez will soon commence. You may expect intrigue after intrigue, conspiracy following conspiracy, until—and no assured the day is not far distant—Spain will again be the scene of revolt and insurrection. With victory on the side of Narvaez with the Queen Mother or the sanguinary military despot—it is [illegible] it depends on the army, on the money that can be procured to [illegible] services of their country. At present, Espartero is decidedly in favour of Narvaez. His staff—his brilliant staff, as it is termed by the Madrid journals—on the entry of Christina into Madrid, was composed of Generals Schelo, Pezuela, Cortines, Figueras, Alcoyen, Seoane, Christina aides-de-camp, and numerous body of officers of inferior rank; and yet Narvaez is far from being safe—his castle is not impassible!

We are told by the French telegraph, "that the most perfect tranquill ty prevails in all parts of Spain." It is true, that Cartagena surrendered at discretion on the 24th of March, but many private letters I have seen from the Basque Provinces, Galicia, and other parts of Spain, are unanimous in stating that the greatest discontent reigns in every kingdom.

That old would-be-liberal, the Lafayette of Spain, Don Augustin Arguelles.—The Divino Arguelles, as he is called, in the prosperous days of the Cortes of 1823—is no more; he died the middle of last month, and was buried at Madrid, on the 25th ult.; he was followed to the grave by an immense crowd of persons of every class, and there were not wanting those who carried his remains.

The tobacco contract has been accorded to M. Salamanca, for thirty-five millions of reals, about £350,000 more than was made by the Government when it kept the monopoly in its own hands.

M. de Lesseps, the celebrated French Consul-General at Barcelona, has quitted Spain for France. He arrived at Marseilles on the 28th ult.

The Duke de Rivas has been named Ambassador to the Court of Naples.

ITALY.

I have, in several of my last correspondences, kept you well informed as to the real state of affairs in Italy; the accounts now received from that part of Europe, bear out all that I have stated. It appears certain, that a band of forty brigands armed men made an attack upon Cosenza, in Calabria, which, though the chief town of the province, had no other garrison than an officer's guard of fifteen men Whilst the Intendant was getting the National Guards together, the small troop kept the assailants in check, and in the struggle, four soldiers and the commanding officer, who was the son of the famous metaphysician, Baron Galoppi, were killed. The insurgents, who had also lost four men, fled on the coming up of the National Guards. Similar occurrences took place at the same time, in several other places, and amongst them, at San Giovanni, in the same province, when a Justice of Peace was killed. The Government having sent a large body of troops to Cosenza, order was restored. The news produce little effect at Naples, but the consequent arrests excited a great sensation. Amongst the persons taken into custody, are two nephews of General Pepe, an advocate, named Rozelli, who held a public office, a son of Baron Poerio, and many other persons of rank and note

The following is a copy of private correspondence received by one of our morning papers:—"Rome, March 20. The weather is beautiful in the extreme. The Chesterfield hounds meet regularly twice a week The Campagna proves to be a good hunting country; foxes are only too numerous, but the scent is bad, and with a large field very difficult. The Chesterfield hounds will prove themselves an overmatch for any fox: the stopping of the numerous earths is perhaps the most troublesome part of the sport, and will require another season, and a little more attention. It is but justice to Captain Langford, R.N., the master of the hunt, to say, that his polished manners and admirable temper in the field have gained him the respect of all classes Prince Paskewitch and the Honourable Mr. Ker Seymer, the latter a relative of the Hertford, were of the celebrated astronomer. She was visited by the King, the Prince, and Princess. Miss Herschell is a native of Hanover. She discovered two comets, and published several works, for which the Royal Astronomical Society of London awarded her the large golden me.

The official returns of the receipt of the German Customs Union for 1843, are as follows: Gross receipt of customs, duties of export, import, and transit, 25,065,000 thalers; being 2,767,000 more than in 1842.

FRANCE.

On Saturday last the Chamber of Deputies decided, in opposition to the Minister of Finance, who declared that the adoption of the measure would occasion a loss a falling off in the revenue than twelve millions of francs, that M. St. Priest's proposition for a reform in the postage of letters should be taken into consideration on

The semi-Conservative organ Le Presse has the following curious article on the Customs Bill. After declaring that commercial treaties generally have been [illegible] with the exception of that with England, it continues:—"This is particularly the case with the treaty of 1826 with the United States, and that of 1826, with England. The official tables show that in 1842, on a movement of 9,340,000 tons between France and Great Britain, the latter power covered 7,701,000 tons. On the total quantity between France and the United States, the American flag takes 94 per cent., leaving only 6 per cent for France. Such are the fruits of treaties. The real evil would be less striking if the injury to our mercantile shipping were in some degree made up for by advantages in favour of our manufactures. But this is not the case. The last customs tables prove that England receives from us to the amount of 29,000,000 of products, and sends to us an amount of 112,000,000. As to the United States, the disproportion is still stronger. In 1842 they took only 48,000 000 worth from us, and sold for 135,000,000 millions of our markets. If we are not lucky in commercial treaties, it is prudent to abstain from them."

Count de Ravneval, the son of France's best diplomatist, has been named Charge d'Affaires to the court of St. Petersburg, and left yesterday for Russia The count is a young nobleman of first-rate talent; he lately married the beautiful and accomplished daughter of M. Bertin de Vaux, attached in a similar capacity to the person of Louis Philippe. The mother of the present countess is a lady of great personal merit, and a patron of the fine arts

Princess Clementine of Saxe Coburg Gotha, the daughter of his Majesty Louis Philippe, was safely delivered on the 26th of a prince. He has been named by the King, Philippe Ferdinand Mario Auguste Raphael.

The Opposition journal La Commerce was sold yesterday for 317,000 francs.

At the sale of books at the veterinary school of Alfort, the late Courtemont, born in England in 1642, was sold for 3690 francs, ab ut £144

Auber's last opera, "La Sirène," is a decided hit, and may be considered the best composition of this pleasing maestro, after "La Muette de Portici." The opera throughout is melodious, and filled with original melody; in short it is the best opera produced in France for many years. After the representation on Tuesday last the orchestra with a body and gave a serenade to Auber. This is the thirtieth opera written by Auber. I wish I could speak as favourably of Halévy's "Lazzarone," it is a complete failure. Several one act operas are in preparation, but, from common report, they possess no extraordinary merit. Mademoiselle Lola Montes, so celebrated for her exploits with the Prussian and Russian police, debuted as a dancer at the Grand Opera with but little success. She is not to be compared to the sisters Dumilâtre. Madame Stoltz, the prima donna of the Grand Opera, has obtained a legal separation from her husband, M. Lecuyer.

The Italian Opera closed on Saturday, after rather a prosperous season, chiefly owing to [illegible] Don Pasquale," "Maria de Rohan" (performed ten times), "Otello," "Puritani," and the "Barber of Seville." Mademoiselle Bambilla, the favourite of the season, has already entered on her last performances. Mademoiselle Bambilla does not quit Paris for Italy, as reported by those jealous of her appearance in England. This lady has received most pressing invitations from the first families of rank in Italy to [illegible]

Mademoiselle Nesser left last week for Milan. She is replaced by Madame Mascara, a lady possessing a most powerful voice. Ernst, the celebrated violinist, quitted Paris on Saturday for London. I believe he is engaged for the Manchester Festival.

The Emperor of Austria has accorded to musical composers the property of copyright. A piece in five or three acts pays 10 per cent on the net receipt, 6 per cent. on two acts, and 3 per cent. on one act operas. The King of Prussia has, so I am informed, given the same boon to Prussian composers

Report speaks very highly of Malibran's brother, Sir Felix Garcia, named Alexander, a colonel in the Russian army, and lately appointed aide-de-camp to the Emperor.

Vestris-mps and his sister reached Mexico on the 1st of February, preceded by Madame Damoreau and M. Auber.

PORTUGAL.

The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Pacha, Captain G Wilson, arrived on Tuesday from Gibraltar, &c., bringing the Malta and Peninsular Mails

Her dates of departure are as follow: From Gibraltar, March 28; Cadiz, March 24; Lisbon, March 27; Oporto, March, 28; Vigo, March 28.

Ships of War lying at Gibraltar.—Her Majesty's ships Malabar and Scout, and steamer Locust; and the United states corvette Fairfield. At Lisbon.—Her Majesty's ships Albion and Vernon; the French steamer Gomer, and the brig Volage.

Vessel passed off the coast of Portugal, five leagues south of the Berlings, the Montrose, steering to the southward, on the 27th of March.

Speed on board.—Eight knots.

List of Passengers—Mr. E. Desalles, Mr. A. Lacoste, Mr. C. Relerft, Mr. J. Miller, Mr. R. T. Duarte, and Mr. J. Montgomery.

The Great Liverpool steamer, Captain Bell, left the river the same afternoon with about 40 passengers and a quantity of merchandise. She also took out the usual mails. The Royal Mail Packet Company's steam-ship Tay, Capt. Hayden, left on Wednesday for the West India Islands, taking out the mails, 40 passengers, and a large quantity of quicksilver. The Bann steamer left the river on Thursday morning. She has upwards of 200 steerage and 15 cabin passengers, and will touch at Cork Harbour.

The emigrants are principally mechanics, and of decent, respectable appearance. Many of them are protestants; the others They appear very happy, and do not seem to feel leaving the shores of Old England, other than the natural regret of parting from their friends and relatives

CONSTANTINOPLE.

CONSTANTINOPLE, March 17.—On the 14th instant the Porte made an official communication to the English and French embassies, of the resolution to which the Divan had come on the subject of the fulfilment of the religious laws, which resolution was sanctioned by the approval of the Sultan. The Porte has expressed its willingness to enter into the strongest verbal engagement, that it will in future avoid the application of the penalty of apostasy to Moslems They effectively and unequivocally refused to abrogate a decree, received by the whole Mussulman people as one of divine origin. It is stated that this reply not being satisfactory to the ambassadors, was twice sent to the Turks for their reconsidering it, in the hope of being able to discover some mode of dressing up the self same determination in a shape more suitable to the instructions of their Excellencies.

MARCH 18.—The great dispute between the Western Powers and the Porte, is in the fair way of an amicable settlement. A part of the arrangement is, it is stated, to be the reorganization of the Turkish army, under the control of the government. With a new ministry to their taste, there can be no doubt that the ambassadors could accommodate matters without exposing the office. Lorens, and empire, to submission by that act abrogation of the Mussulman law.

The spirit of fanaticism, which seemed to have been extinguished in the time of Mahmoud, is now become fiercer than ever. Almost simultaneously, in different parts of the empire, attempts have been made to force the Greeks to embrace Islamism—at Ghinstendel, at Brousa, at Adrianople, and latterly in Constantinople itself. In every instance the friends of the unfortunate victims of this tyrannical zeal have proceeded to the British ambassador's house for the following are the particulars of an occurrence which took place in Constantinople, and which during the past week created much interest:—An Armenian, a servant in the house of one Bedros, a rich Armenian banker, fulfilment of religious laws. The child having been kicked by one of the boy's horses, and severely wounded, was taken into the baram to receive medical assistance. After some days the father applied to see his son, but was told that no request could now be granted, as the boy, having become a Musulman, no longer owed any duty to Christian parents. The Armenian, overcome with grief at the prospect of being thus robbed of his child, applied to the Armenian patriarch, who proceeded in the case before the council, and claim redress. Feth. Ahmud Pacha, the president, was unfavourable to the violent course which had been adopted by Shekur Bey, on the ground that the boy was not yet old enough to have any opinion on matters of religion. A pacha present, however, declared him to have arrived at the age of discretion, which he proceeded to prove by the following ingenious and conclusive test. Placing the boy before him, he drew a knife and made a feint to stab him. The convert, instead of catching hold of the blade, immediately started back. "God is great, and the pacha, "the boy who is able to understand the virtues of a knife, can also comprehend the truths of Mohammedanism, and therefore must not be abandoned to the Giaour." The unfortunate man, thus robbed of his child by the humane and sagacious verdict of the pacha, prayed the intervention of Sir S. Canning, who seized the opportunity of again addressing a most serious and urgent remonstrance to the Porte

There cannot be a doubt but that this step will procure the immediate restoration of the child thus unlawfully detained by Shekir, although it is to be regretted that the British Ambassador has been thus intentionally placed in the position of protector of the rayahs of the Sultan. It is thought that Austria is about to join with Russia in opposing the policy of England and France. The withdrawal of Prussia in the matter of the letter is highly commendable—the more so when we consider the close relation which exists between that power and Russia, as it shews that with her the dictates of humanity have more influence than the prospects of political advantages which might result from acting in unison with her northern neighbour and ally.

AMERICA.

The New York packet-ship Virginia, Captain Allen, arrived at Liverpool on Monday evening with dates to the 14th inst., her day of sailing from New York.

The President has appointed the Hon. J. C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, to fill the office of Secretary of State, in place of Mr. Upshur, and the appointment has been unanimously confirmed by the Senate.

THE NEW TARIFF BILL.—The Bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means to the House of Representatives on Saturday, makes an important change in the duties of the present tariff. The average duty of the present tariff upon dutiable articles is 35.85 per cent. The new Bill proposes that the maximum duty shall be thirty per cent. until September, 1845, and thereafter twenty-five per cent. The duties to be valued at the port and charges at the place of exportation, and that the duties not fixed by this bill shall remain as under the present tariff.

CANADA.—PUBLIC WORKS.—Montreal papers state that the labours on the public works along the St. Lawrence from Cornwall to the Rapids have been resumed, and that great numbers of workmen are engaged in completing the excavations. The board of public works had in hand a portion of the canal by raising embankments upon the surface, instead of cutting a channel through the soil. The seems at first sight an unwise decision, as artificial embankments of that sort must be generally affected by the severe frosts of the Canadian winters, and will also be liable to injury from the rapidity of the current The entire chain of works in which the Provincial Government has engaged will involve them in a debt of £2,250,000.

MEXICO.—Arrivals at New Orleans bring intelligence that the Mexican Government has approved of the arrangement made by their Minister in London, so that all differences with England will be arranged. Mr. Bankhead, the new British Minister, had not arrived. The February instalment of the indemnity to United States, has been paid. The Vincennes was waiting to bring General Thompson home.

TEXAS.—The steamer Neptune arrived at New Orleans on the 1st inst., from Galveston, bringing Texas papers to the 24th ult. The news is unimportant. The birthday of Washington was celebrated with great spirit at Galveston and at Houston.

There is some "talk" in the papers, but little more.

The people of Texas, before they separated, passed a resolution complimentary to President Houston, the vote standing eight to four. A similar resolution was lost in the House of Representatives, by a vote of twenty to nineteen.

Congress has passed a bill providing that a Commodore Moore shall be tried by a court-martial composed of soldiers officers. The Major-General of the Militia is to preside, and the other officers are to be selected by the Secretary of War and Navy from the Brigadier-General and officers of inferior grade, above the rank of captain. The papers call it in derision an amphibious court, and think it will never convene.

Captain Hays, at the head of a company of mounted rangers, has gone to Bexar, to disperse the marauders in that section.

A Mr. Wyraant, who resides on St. Joseph's Island, lately found two cabin doors of a steamer, that were washed on shore by the waves, and from the resemblance they bear to the cabin doors of the San Antonio, there can be little doubt they are from the wreck of that ill-fated vessel. The San Antonio was seen off Aransas the day before the gale came up in September, 1842, and it is not improbable she went down a few leagues from that harbour.

President Houston has ordered the Treasury to be closed for sixty days, and no Exchequer-bills are to be issued from the department during this period.

The small-pox has made its appearance in Austin county.

The colony in the Cross Timbers is rapidly increasing and extending.

The correspondence between Captains Elliott, British Chargé d'Affaires, and Anson Jones, Secretary of State, on the pressure claims is published in the Houston Democrat. Mr. Jones has shown the want of validity in those claims.

Captain Todd, who is bearer of despatches to our Government at Washington, came passenger in the Neptune.

THE OVERLAND MAIL.

INDIA AND CHINA.

The news of the present month is singularly unimportant, the most remarkable event being the addition of ten men to each company of all the Bengal and Bombay Native Infantry Regiments and the infantry of the Sirmoor Battalion of three companies, each, since the augmentation of a like amount made by Lord Auckland in January, 1842. Letters of the 18th February, from Gwalior, describe everything as being peaceful. Loodiana Akbar of the 22nd speaks of the unhappy spirit still prevailing amongst the troops; the report contained in the Delhi Gazette, of the threatened encroachment of the Sheiks, must be unfounded. There seems no necessity, for the present, for meddling with the affairs of the Punjaub. In Scinde matters begin to assume a more auspicious aspect than heretofore, in so far as the pacification of the country and health of the troops is concerned. The expenditure will be a source of heavy annual outlay to the state is beyond all doubt. This is virtual y admitted by the Governor-General himself, in his intimation that the army is to be increased, and of Sir Charles Napier, who refuses to abandon the idea of maintaining the strength of 15,000 men. Sir Charles Napier is evidently popular in the army as a fighting man; he is brave, kind hearted, and indulgent to those under him. But he is characterised by true Irish levity of a new, and indifference to the loss of human life. Sir Charles Napier, the moment he finds matters not going exactly to his wish, flies at the throats of the Seindians. Last month it was mentioned that he was about to proceed to Kurrachee to Sukkur, with a strong detachment of European and Native Infantry, to see if he could not get somebody to fight somewhere about something. His mortification appears to have been extreme, when assured by the Politicals that really no one was disposed to come into the field to meet him, and that unless he removed his army beyond the mountains, he had no chance of so much as see no enemy.

The Hon. Mr. Anderson, who acted as Governor of Bombay from April, 1841, to June, 1842, has returned to England by the present steamer—he has been for five years senior member of Council, and leaves amidst the unmingled regrets of all who knew him. Mr. Read is, by the vacancy thus occurred, admitted into Council.

SCINDE.—Our last intelligence from Scinde is contained in a letter from Kurrachee of the 21st ult. The occurrences of the week are scarcely sufficiently conspicuous or connected to furnish subject for a narrative. Sir C. Napier appears to have abandoned the project of an expedition to the northward; matters indeed seem to present a prospect of peace for the present beyond Sukkur, that there is really no enemy to encounter, and to go into the desert or amongst the hills in quest of one, is too arduous a feat with the hot weather at hand. H.M.'s 86th is another corps proceeded to Hyderabad on the 1st March (this day, but that is apparently for the purpose of permitting further reliefs. The medical committee, formerly appointed to report on the means of improving the salubrity of the station, have recommended the filling up of the ditches round the town, as a more cheering view of matters than might have been anticipated That the malaria is chiefly occasioned by the inundation appears unquestionable; but much of the sickness recently prevailing is to be attributed to the watering of the fields by canals for the purpose of irrigation, which can without trouble be put a stop to, provided we are willing to purchase health for our men at the expense of the fertility of the soil. Fever is the most prevalent disease, more prevalent than within the Delta, and there our troops have almost equally suffered, however protected. H.M.'s 13th reached camp two months since in the highest condition as to health and discipline of any regiment in the country, but immediately on their arrival, and of the earliest sufferers several have died. Sir R. Sale, whose health stood out all the tens of Cabul and hardships of Jelalabad, has become ill, and will, it is feared, prove one of the numerous victims to the climate. Some idea of the effects of the recent sickness on the constitutions of the men may be gathered from the fact that out of a detachment of forty-five Europeans and one hundred and fifty natives proceeding to the river, thirty-six of the former and eighty-two of the latter died before reaching Ferozepore. Precisely one half of the European artillery left their bones at Sukkur, the survivors being in all likelihood destined never more to return to active service. Her Majesty's 86th, now at Poonah, continues to suffer almost as much as ever in the fatal climate of the Deccan, from the effects of the poison damps of the Indus Though this state of matters is of frequent occurrence, and was on the present occasion wholly unexpected, officers best acquainted with the climate are of opinion that visitations similar to that which has just been experienced may be looked for periodically as recurring at intervals of from five to nine years. Our posts beyond the river—Sukkur, Shikarpore, Lockhana, &c.—will, as each occasions, be placed in the mercy of the hill men, who cherish blood feuds with religious fervour from generation to generation. The Bombay Government are said to have memorialised the Court of Directors for an addition to their army. The cost of the troops now on the Indus amounts to about a million sterling annually, the entire revenues of the Ameers to about half of this—our share of which is less than a quarter of a million The Indian army was, in the later years of Lord Auckland's rule, increased by 50,000 men on account of the operations in Affghanistan and China. It was ordered to be reduced in February, 1843, by about 18,000; so that it is now considerably stronger by 32,000 men than it was before our recent war policy began. It was found strong enough for everything but foreign war, and so it would again were we to keep within our own territories. The 2nd and 4th troops of the 1st brigade of Horse Artillery, the 16th, 54th, and 63rd Regiments of Native Infantry, are still under orders for Scinde, but whether they are actually to proceed there appears to be a matter of doubt. The 54th having become mutinous, and positively refused to proceed to Scinde, their destination was altered, and they were ordered for Benares instead one of the best stations in India. The 54th, now at Ferozepore, were destined to take the place of the 54th, and equally declined to proceed unless on their own terms. Letters from Loodiana of the 17th state, that the troops there had become mutinous at the thoughts of service in Scinde, and occasioned much tribulation at the station; and, finally, the whole of the regiments on their way downwards have been halted on their march towards Subhur, until the matter could receive more mature consideration. Half the Bombay army being occupied on the Indus, and the troops not employed on foreign service being barely sufficient for the duties of the Presidency, the Madras government was applied to. The 47th regiment, under orders for Moulmein, was dispatched for service in Scinde; but it was found advisable to alter these destination; they were landed at Bombay, and misunderstandings of a grave description which broke out amongst them are at present under investigation. The Madras 20th N.I. having been ordered to proceed from Belgaum to Surat in the Bombay Presidency, were accidentally countermarched when two days on their march. The 16th of her Majesty's Native Infantry was put in orders in their place, when a government order directed both to remain where they were. If it is intended to keep Scinde with Bombay troops, an augmentation of from 5000 to 10,000 men must immediately be made in the army of the Western Presidency, at present less than 30 000 strong.

CABUL.—The news from this part of Central Asia affords much matter for speculation. It extends to the 9th January. We find from our letters direct from that place, that the acquisition of Khiva by the Ameer of Bokhara is spoken of as a fait accompli. It appears certain that Sultan Mahomed and his son are actively engaged in secret intrigues with Sultan Mahomed at Lahore, and Peer Mahomed at Peshawur, but do not yet consider themselves in a condition to quit Cabul for the purpose of invading the trans-Indian possessions of the Sikhs, and which it has been for months expected they would do with as little delay as possible. But the imprisonment at large of Sultan Mahomed, the brother of the Dost at Lahore, with all his family, is apparently a stumbling block in their way, which is not easily got over, as it is probable that the moment Dost Mahomed appeared as an enemy on the east of the Khyber, the life of Sultan Mahmood would be sacrificed by the Sikhs in their present state of anarchy.

LAHORE.—Now that the eyes of the public of India have been withdrawn from the late hostile and arrogant conduct of the Gwalior, they are again returned directed to the Punjaub, where dissension and disorder are in the ascendant in every part of the country. The brother Rajahs of Jumboo, Goolab Singh, and Suchet Singh, are plundering the royal treasury, during their absence from the capital, of almost all it contained, and then returning to their mountain fastnesses, have shown no sign of interfering in the Government, but are quietly preparing themselves for the time when the power of Runjeet Singh shall fall to pieces, and they will have the long-coveted opportunity of declaring themselves independent of the throne of Lahore. A victory over Futteh Khan Tawana, in the trans-Indian province of Tank, had been confirmed, and a brother of that chief himself taken prisoner in an att mpt to pass over to Mooltan, whither he was sent to obtain aid from Dewan Sawun Mul. Payments to a large amount had been made to the troops at Peshawur, no doubt to prevent the chiefs from their following the mutinous example of the Ram Gul Battalion, and for the time a lull has taken place, but how long it will last, and what may be its result it is impossible to say. Heera Singh is continuing immense military preparations, tending, it is firmly believed, to resist an aggression on our part, of which he is in daily fear. As signs of coming events, and of the intention of Lord Ellenborough to return to the Upper Provinces, to carry out his plans in regard to the Punjaub, it is stated that the Body Guard will remain at Benares during the approaching hot season, and that the marching establishment of the Governor-General's camp, has, as was the case on his lordship's return to the capital last year, been directed to be kept up in a state of preparation.

MISCELLANEOUS. Considerable mystery attaches to the movements of the Governor-General, who was expected in Calcutta about the 20 h of February—the second anniversary of the day of his arrivent in India, which he was said to be desirous of solemnising at the seat of government. He had left his secretaries behind him, and as no official notification had been made of his departure from the north-west, it was supposed likely that he might speedily return to watch from the hither side the Sutlej the affairs of the Punjaub. The eyes of the good folks at Calcutta have this month, for the first time, been gratified with the arrival and departure of a couple of Suez steamers. The Hindostan left on the 19th, with 103 passengers on board. she took the ground when s ell down the river, but after some delay was g t off again without damage: the Bentinck reached from Suez on the 18th, after a beautiful run of 24 days. She brought with her 41 passengers. Singularly enough the number of letters and newspapers to and fro by this way appears as yet in no way to be diminished by the facilities sent by the Calcutta steamers. A shock of earthquake was experienced at Tavoy, Tenasim on Feb. 12: it seems to have occasioned little or no damage. The Nawab of Bengal has sent home a memorial by the present steamer claiming from the Court of Directors the restoration of an annuity of £15 000 a year guaranteed to the grandfather of his wife, his heirs, and successors, by treaty with the British government in 1800, in lieu of the government and revenues of Surat then made over to us on threat of violence. The suspension of payment took place on the death of the late Nawab, the last of the male line of the royal house—the treaty being understood to include both males and females. We are bound on to us by ties over in silence the loss which our society has sustained in the death of Mr. Sutherland late Secretary to the LAW Commission.

BOMBAY LOCAL. A subscription is now on foot, and is filling up rapidly, for the erection of a monument to the memory of Major Eldred Pottinger. The brass guns in the desert betw at Cutch and Scinde are being broken up in a and piece a model to be delivered to his family, and a duplicate of the monument to be erected by Government at Bombay, in honour of the victory of Meeanee. A subscription has been opened to receive money to assist in the liberation of Colonel Outram and Captain Conolly, now believed to be in Bokhara.

The London mail of the 6th January reached Bombay on Sunday morning, February 11, per Victoria steamer. This was the largest mail which has ever reached Bombay, announcing 15 397 letters and 4 495 packets. The Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Benlinck reached Point de Galis from Aden on the 16th, Madras on the 14th, and Calcutta on the 18th of February, with dates to the 6th of January: but through some unexplained circumstance it came the heavy mails for those places, instead of being sent on direct by her, were as usual forwarded to Bombay! The Bombay express, with the first portion of the overland mail, reached Madras on the 16th, and Calcutta on the 18th. The Bentinck made the distance from Calcutta to Suez, and vice versâ, in the shortest space of time on record. The number of deaths which occurred on the island of Bombay during the month of January was 1100—232 of which were caused from cholera, which disease seems to have settled down into one of the ordinary maladies of the place. Her Majesty's ship Thalia, 42 guns, Captain Charles Hope, got under weigh on Thursday afternoon, the 15th, for New South Wales and the Pacific station; but got on shore on the Pronge shoal off the lighthouse. As it was young flood she was got off in about ten minutes, but Captain Hope thought it advisable to return and take up an outside berth until the ship's bottom was examined. On examination it was found that there was no reason to suppose any damage had been sustained beyond the false keel being rubbed in some places. The vessel proceeded on her voyage on the morning of Sunday the 18th.

CHINA.

The accounts from China are down this month to December 24th, but there is scarcely anything worth noticing. Business in Canton had, however, considerably improved; but in the article of opium both here and at other places, hardly any sale had been effected since the proclamation of the Emperor.

At Shanghae, trade continued dull, owing to some very partial restrictions imposed by the Emperor on the Customs department, a subject which was about to be brought to the attention of Sir H. Pottinger.

The Cora wallis, transport, from England, had safely arrived at Hong Kong with the recruits and officers for the 98th Regiment. Major General D'Aguilar, Commander of the Forces in succession to Lord Saltoun.

The massacre of the Bishops Jinbert, Messrs. Chastan and Maubau, with several Christians, all Roman Catholics, at Corea, is confirmed by the Friend of China. The same paper adds, that in addition to the above, who were all beheaded, one hundred and eighty other Christians were put to death by strangulation.

After the battle of Gwalior it was discovered that two Europeans had deserted to the enemy; they avoided the ignominious death that was alted them, by taking at the guns they were serving

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The house met at five o'clock.

The Mutiny Bill, the Marine Mutiny Bill, and the Annual Indemnity Bill were respectively read a third time, and passed.

The Earl of RIPON stated, in reply to the Earl of Malmesbury, that troops had been sent from New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land to New Zealand to aid in its protection. At the same time the Government felt that great inconvenience attended the moving of troops from one colony to another, and considered that New Zealand, as it had the power by law to levy militia or constabulary, ought to provide for its own security.

The Earl of ABERDEEN laid on the table the supplementary treaty with China, containing the regulations for the conduct of our trade; and, in doing so, remarked that the northern ports of China were now open to British commerce, and, he was happy to say, with every appearance of the most extensive and successful trade: a trade that was carried on with the gre t advantage to the parties [illegible] and to the various settlements in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's line.

The DUKE OF BEAUMONT called attention to the state of our commercial relations with the Sublime Porte for the purpose of showing that our commerce, as regulated under the convention of 1838, had suffered considerably by a subsequent treaty concluded between Turkey and Russia, by which Russian merchants were placed on a much more favourable footing than ours.—The Earl of ABERDEEN replied, that if Russia was really placed on a more advantageous footing than us, we were entitled, by the first article of the treaty, to be put on the same footing; but not one of our consuls recommended us to seek such a favour. In fact, intrance was had been recently sent to the Russian Minister at Constantinople to negotiate a treaty of commerce for Russia accepting the basis of the British treaty of commerce, and the Government here hoped that negotiation would prove brought to a successful issue.

The Ecclesiastical Courts Bill was read a third time and passed, after renewed protestations against the retention of the Diocesan Courts by Lords Denman, Cottenham, and Campbell.

The International Copyright Bill passed through committee.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair shortly before four o'clock.

Captain Harris took the oaths and his seat for the borough of Christchurch.

Mr. CORDEN gave notice, for after Easter, to move for a select committee to inquire into the effect of protective duties upon the corn trade.

Mr. GLADSTONE stated that Government had entered into communications with the different powers having territories on the coast of the Mediterranean, with the object of placing them on shorter time of quarantine, and there was every prospect that those powers would consent to a more limited period.

In answer to Dr. BOWRING, Mr. MANNERS SUTTON stated that the Government had not yet decided whether they should introduce a measure on the subject of turnpikes, confining it to South Wales, or whether they should extend it to the whole principality.

Mr. BOREHWICK proposed till after Easter his motion, which stood for this evening, on the subject of the convocation of the clergy.

Lord ELIOT moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the law relating to the registration of voters for the counties of parliamentary election in Ireland. By this bill it is proposed to introduce the system of registration established in England, with some modifications, giving to the Lord Lieutenant the power of dividing the counties into polling districts, and to appoint in the county barrister shall hold an annual court, granting an appeal from the revising barrister's decision to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and limiting the duration of the po l to one day for towns and to two days for counties. It is likewise proposed to place on the new register those persons who are on the present register, excepting them from lash ty to challenge during the remainder of the term for which the old register would have lasted. With respect to qualifications, the bill proposed to establish the solvent tenant test, requiring that there shall be a clear yearly value over and above all rents and charges of £10. The effect of the application of this test, it was computed by the Government, will be only to decrease by 50 000 the present county constituency. To compensate for this decrease the bill proposes to grant to all occupiers who are rated to the relief f the poor in the sum of £30, the benefit of voting. The effect of this franchise will, it is computed by Government, be to add 55,000 voters to the new registry—thus, after deducting the 25,000 struck off by the solvent tenant test, increasing the county constituency by 30,000. The bill also proposes to the possessors of freeholds or leases for lives renewable for ever, of the clear year's value of £5, the right of voting; and this with the intent of encouraging the creation of a class of peasants, or small independent proprietors, such as now exist at present in Ireland. The bill likewise proposes to dispense with the necessity of actual occupation in cases of freeholds and leaseholds of the clear value of £10. With respect to the qualification of £50, which is the only alteration proposed by the bill to substitute for the numerous rates and taxes which the voter is now obliged to pay, the following, viz., the town rate for lighting, paving, &c., the poor rate, the borough rate, and the grand jury cess.

Lord ELIOT also moved for leave to bring in a bill to alter and amend the Irish Municipal Corporation Act. By this bill it is proposed to extend to Ireland the provisions of the English Municipal Registration Bill, and to give the right of voting to every inhabitant householder who shall have occupied for the space of three years, who during that time hath been rated to the relief of the poor, and who hath paid his rates and taxes. The bill also proposes to limit the rates and taxes necessary for the municipal franchise to those necessary for the right of voting for members of Parliament. Mr. M. O'FERRALL objected to the £50 occupation franchise as one which would be greatly under the influence of the landlords, and thought the new £5 freehold franchise should be extended to 40s freeholders. He approved generally of the principles of the measure, with the exception of the £50 occupancy, and he could regret was that the Government did not carry out their views to a sufficient extent.—Mr. SHAW objected to unwillingness to register at all in Ireland, in consequence of certain unregistered voters, was the cause of the limited number of registered voters in Ireland.—Lord J. RUSSELL [illegible] £50 or a £30 qualification, it would have but little practical influence on the number of voters. Lord J. RUSSEL

THE HOLY WEEK IN ROME.

PALM SUNDAY—PROCESSION IN THE SALA REGIA.

At this moment, thousands of pleasure-hunting tourists are attracted to Rome, to witness the magnificent church ceremonies performed there during "the Holy Week," as the week which closes the fast of Lent is designated by the Roman Catholics. Mrs. Starke refers to these church ceremonies as "the principal amusements during Lent;" and, as a superb dramatic spectacle, they are unparalleled. Accordingly, we have deemed this pageant a seasonable subject for illustration in our pages.

The first day is called Palm Sunday, from the rite then observed in the Catholic church, of blessing and distributing palm or olive branches; or, where the climate does not produce them, branches of other trees, in commemoration of what the Jews did when Jesus entered into Jerusalem. The principal function on that day takes place in the Papal chapel, or "Sixtine," at the Vatican, where the Pope officiates, and blesses the palms, after which the "Passion" is beautifully chaunted; and there is a procession round the Sala Regia, the large and splendid hall, which connects the two Papal chapels, Sistina and Paolina. This imposing scene is represented in our first engraving. It is requisite for foreigners to go at nine in the morning to witness this ceremony. It is not deemed proper, during the Holy Week, to appear in public without wearing mourning; and whenever the Pope officiates, ladies are directed to appear in veils.

During the two following days there is nothing in the public offices of the church peculiarly attractive. On Wednesday, at four in the afternoon, the "Tenebræ" and the "Miserere" are sung by the Pope's choir, in the Sixtine, and likewise in St. Peter's. For the office of "Tenebræ," or darkness, a certain number of candles, placed on a triangular stand, are by degrees extinguished, one by one, that is, after each psalm, until a mystical darkness (it being still day) is produced.

HOLY THURSDAY—THE POPE WASHING THE FEET OF POOR PRIESTS.

Thursday is called by Catholics Holy, or Maundy Thursday, the second name being derived from the Latin word mandatum, or "precept," the first word of the anthem, "A new commandment I give you," which is sung while the feet of certain poor men are washed by the Pope, in the Sistine Chapel; it is performed in white, contrary to the usage of this penitential time. At its close the consecrated species is borne in solemn procession to the Pauline Chapel, where an altar, splendidly lighted up, preserves it till next day. This forms what Catholics call "the Sepulchre," and it is customary to visit with devotion, in the evening, the churches where such altars are prepared. From the Pauline Chapel the Pope proceeds to the great gallery over the porch of St. Peter's, and thence gives his blessing to the people assembled in the square below. Preparation is made for the washing of feet in the right hand portion of the transept of the chapel. This in other places is performed on poor men; but at Rome, by the Pope, upon 13 priests, generally poor, of different nations, who are afterwards by him served at table, in a hall upstairs. For conveniently seeing all these functions, tickets are necessary, which may be easily obtained. The washing of feet is represented in the second illustration.

On Friday the service throughout is lugubrious and sad; the throne and altar are stripped of all ornament, the floor and seats in the chapel are bare—the sacerdotal vestments black. After silent prostration and a broken service, the image of Christ crucified is unveiled with solemnity (having been kept covered for a fortnight before), and issued by all the clergy on their knees, while the "reproaches" are sung to pathetic music, and the service ends with a procession and vespers. In the afternoon, after "Tenebræ," the Pope and his court descend into St. Peter's, to venerate the holy relics kept there.

Saturday, properly speaking, has no office: that which is performed on it belonging to the following night, and being entirely appropriate to Easter. But in the Lateran basilica, orders of every degree are conferred, and Jews or Mahomedans receive baptism and confirmation. In the Pope's chapel, the entire ceremony is very beautiful, consisting of the blessing of new fire, and of the paschal candle; and then of mass.

In conclusion, comes Easter-day; when the Pope signs solemn mass at the high altar of St. Peter's; and at its close, gives his benediction from the portico, to the vast assemblage in the area beneath —many of whom are often pilgrims come from considerable distances. On this occasion, the piazza seldom contains less than 15,000 persons, soldiers inclusive. No sooner does the Pope appear in the outside loggia, than all the troops kneel; and, when he has pronounced the blessing, the drums beat, the cannon of St. Angelo fire, and the bells ring in every direction; while the superb costume of the Pontifical court, the picturesque dresses of the peasantry, and the splendid equipages of the Cardinals, foreign princes, &c., render this scene equally magnificent and impressive. About half an hour after sunset commences the first illumination of the outside of St. Peter's by 4400 lanterns, which have the effect of moonlight; but at seven o'clock, literally in one moment, the whole scene changes; and every part of the church, to the very summit of the cross on the cupola, appears one blaze of fire, produced by pitch, wood shavings, and 764 flambeaux. About eight o'clock commence the fireworks of the Castle of St. Angelo; consisting of the Girandola of 4500 rockets, to represent an eruption of Vesuvius: many changes then take place, and the whole closes with a second Girandola, appearing to convert the very Tiber into flames; and throwing reflected light upon the majestic dome of St. Peter's, which shines brilliantly amid the seeming conflagration! A representation of this splendid scene was attempted, and with considerable success, about two years since, at the Surrey Zoological Gardens.

MARSHAL SOULT.

Ultimus Romanorum.

Last of the Warriors rais'd by him
Whose glory, in the latest hour,
Was left all gloomy—exiled—dim—
Whilst Theu, and others of his pow'r,
Creations of his grandeur, stood
Undarkened by the veil of Time—
A melancholy proof the flood
Of Fame, just like the Nile hath slime
To nourish what it washes o'er,
Yet waste itself, and be no more!
Old "Hero of a hundred fights,"
Thy comrades all are now laid low—
One star is left of all the lights,
Th t rais'd a comet-like glory
Shine on—and let thy lurid beam
Illumine peaceably the years
Thou yet may'st float adown the stream
Of Life, amid this vale of tears!

W.

Jean-de-Dieu Soult, now Duke of Dalmatia, and minister at war to Louis Philippe, was born of humble parents, at St. Amand, in the department of the Tarn, the 29th of March, 1769. At the age of sixteen he entered the service as a private, and, after spending some time in the Royal Regiment of Infantry, became sub-lieutenant of grenadiers.

Under Hoche and Jourdan, he distinguished himself by a bravery always subservient to sound discretion. His talents were strikingly exhibited at the battle of Fleurus. In 1794 he was chief of the staff to General Lefebvre, who headed the advanced guard of the army of the Moselle.

In 1796 he was appointed general of brigade, then joined the army of Italy, and made the campaign of 1799 with distinction, until he was shut up in Genoa, with Massena. From this period commenced the friendship which the conqueror of Rivoli ever after entertained for him. Buonaparte, who only knew Soult by report, one day inquired of Massena, whether he deserved his high reputation. "For judgment and courage," replied the veteran, "he has scarcely a superior." The consequence of this honest praise was, that he was entrusted with the command of the cuirassiers of the consular guard, and thenceforth honoured with the personal esteem of Napoleon.

MARSHAL SOULT.

When the invasion of England was resolved on, Soult was placed over the army encamped from Boulogne to Calais. The discipline which he established was more severe than had ever been known to exist among the French troops: from daybreak to nightfall he was on horseback, inspecting their various evolutions, or superintending on foot their labours in the entrenchments. Many of them complained; and one day even the First Consul expressed an apprehension that they would sink under it. The general replied, "Such as cannot withstand the fatigue which I myself undergo, will remain in the dépôts; but those who do stand it, will be fit to undertake the conquest of the world." Expressions like these could not but be grateful to one who was meditating so vast a design; and, in May, 1804, Soult was presented with a marshal's truncheon.

He was present at the battles of Austerlitz and Eylau; and was afterwards called to a scene where his triumphs were to be short-lived, and defeat was generally to attend his ablest measures.

In 1808 he entered Spain. His first duty was to pursue Sir John Moore, whose retreat he harassed, but whom he dared not openly attack, until the English reached Corunna. Under the walls of that city he furiously assailed Sir John, in the view of preventing the embarkation of the British troops; but, after a sharp action, was completely repulsed.

The Duke of Dalmatia's next step was to invade Portugal. For some time he met with nothing like a combined operation. Oporto was taken, and the fruit of his victory was the capture of immense magazines of powder, and a hundred and ninety-seven pieces of artillery. Thirty English vessels, wind-bound in the river, and loaded with wines and provisions for a month, also fell into his hands. He endeavoured to remedy, as far as it was possible, the deplorable result of the soldiers' fury. Recovering and restoring a part of the plunder, he caused the inhabitants remaining in the town to be treated with respect; and invited, by proclamation, all those who had fled, to return.

But to subdue the country was beyond Soult's power. The very peasantry, ill armed and undisciplined as they were, arrested his progress; and at last the British, under Sir Arthur Wellesley, advanced against him, and with such celerity, that the marshal was surprised at the passage of the Douro. That he should have suffered himself to be taken by surprise, is considered a blot upon his military reputation; but, from the commencement of his retreat, all his operations were marked by talent and decision. He unhesitatingly adopted the only measure by which his army could be rescued from their danger; and by the prompt sacrifice of his artillery and baggage, he succeeded in evading his pursuers.

In 1813, Soult was called from this diversified scene to support the tottering throne of his imperial master in another region. He was present at the battle of Bautzen, and was treated by the Emperor with great confidence. While at Dresden, news arrived of the defeat of the French at Vittoria—a defeat which left the Peninsula at the mercy of Wellington, and brought the war to the foot of the Pyrenees. Confounded at this new reverse, which the Emperor imputed to the inability of Joseph and Jourdan, he looked around for a general capable of repairing so many errors, and the choice fell upon Soult. He enjoined him to go and rally his forces, and defend, inch by inch, the passage of the Pyrenees. Soult would not have hesitated, had not his wife, recently arrived at Dresden, shown some repugnance to return to Spain, "where," said she, "nothing is to be got but blows."

From 1813 to 1816 Soult was employed in supporting the tottering throne of his master, but in vain; he subsequently fought at Fleurus and Waterloo by the side of the Emperor. He remained in abeyance, the whole family of France disliking him, till the revolution placed Louis Philippe on the throne. Under him he has filled the posts of Minister of War, and Ambassador to England, the former of which he still occupies.

To the Duke of Dalmatia war has has not proved an unprofitable game. He possesses valuable estates, and an income sufficiently large to confer splendour on his high rank in the army and peerage. His person is thus described by one who visited, in 1802, his fat-famed gallery of Murillos:—"We were received with a plain frank courtesy by the marshal: a middle-sized, though somewhat corpulent personage of from fifty to sixty years of age, whose dark curling hair rendered somewhat conspicuous the bald patch in the middle of his head, while his sunburnt complexion accorded well with his dark intelligent eye. His black stock, plain dark coat, and loose blue trousers, which, capacious as they were, could not hide his bow-legged form, obviously suggested the soldier rather than the courtier, the marshal rather than the duke; though, if I had encountered such a figure in London, I should rather have guessed him to be an honest East or West India captain."—From the Court and Camp of Buonaparte.

THE CHRIST'S HOSPITAL SCHOLARS AT THE MANSION-HOUSE.

Lieutenant-General Baron de Stjernecrona, Aide-de-Camp of the late King of Sweden, has arrived in town from Stockholm, to present to her Majesty letters of notification of the demise of the King Charles XIV. John; and of the accession of King Oscar I. to the thrones of Sweden and Norway.

Sudden and Serious Illness of Lord Abinger.—On Monday last Lord Abinger was suddenly attacked by paralysis whilst being entertained by the magistracy of the county at Bury St. Edmund, after the business of the day, which he had met and discharged with his usual power and clearness. This melancholy circumstance has caused the greatest sensation. The answers on Tuesday were, that his lordship though sensible was quite unable to articulate.

CHRIST'S HOSPITAL SCHOLARS AT THE MANSION HOUSE.

The engraving represents the scholars of Christ's Hospital, taking their annual luncheon with the Lord Mayor, in the Venetian parlour, at the Mansion House, on Easter Monday. On this occasion, the boys walk thither in procession, and the Lord Mayor (who, by virtue of his office, is the head Governor of the charity), presents to each scholar a shilling; and he is likewise regaled with a bun and a glass of wine. The scene is altogether one of considerable interest; and the demeanour and healthy appearance of the scholars, never fail to impress the spectator with a due sense of the excellent administration of this right royal foundation.

PALM SUNDAY.

In another column of our paper will be found the origin of this ancient church festival. In Catholic times in England, willow branches were used instead of palms; and the ceremony of bearing them on Palm Sunday was retained in England after many other ceremonies were dropped: indeed, it was one of those which Henry VIII., in 1536, declared were not to be contemned or cast away. They were borne till 2 Edward VI.; and the boughs or branches underwent a regular blessing. A twisted tree, or with, was also used as a substitute for palm; and such is the antiquity of the general practice that we find it mentioned in the Domesday Survey. The day was otherwise commemorated, for, in the churchwarden's and chamberlain's accounts of Kingston-upon-Thames, we find "1 Hen. VIII. For Ale upon Palm Sonday on synging of the passion, £0 0s. 1d." Fuller, in his "Church History," touchingly says. "Bearing of Palms on Palm Sunday is in memory of the receiving of Christ into Hierusalem, a little before his death, and that we may have the same desire to receive him into our hearts."

The custom, in a religious sense, is now altogether confined to the Roman Catholic and Greek churches: in the latter, the Russians have a very solemn procession on Palm Sunday.

It is still customary with our boys, in most parts of England, to go out and gather slips with the willow flowers or blossoms at this time: these are selected as representatives of the palm, because they are generally the only plants at this season, easily to be come at, in which the power of vegetation can be discovered.

In the neighbourhood of London, too, "palming" is still a practice on the Sunday before Easter. The weavers of Spitalfields, leaving their murky workshops, customarily ramble into the fields and lowlands of Essex, on this day, to gather "palm," and inhale a better atmosphere. Our artist has depicted a scene of the return of one of these parties. The yellow catkins, or male-flowers, are more highly prized than the white, or female flowers.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1844.

THE two last evenings of the Parliamentary sitting, previous to separating for "the Recess," were very productive; in the Commons, on Monday, Lord Eliot, the Secretary for Ireland, introduced a bill for amending the Irish system of registration. Those who remember the fierce Parliamentary contests on this question during the Whig Administration will be surprised at the quietude of party spirit upon it now, and greater, perhaps, than his surprise will be his wonder that the Tory Government should have embodied in a measure some of the provisions that, through Lord Stanley, it so strongly denounced when in opposition. The bill professes to be an introduction into Ireland of the system that has been in operation in England from the passing of the Reform Bill; it gives the Lord Lieutenant the power of dividing counties into polling districts, and restricts the duration of elections to the same time as that fixed by law in England—two days for counties, and one day for boroughs. These alterations are improvements; but the main objections to the bill will evidently be founded on the different qualifications proposed to be introduced. It will disfranchise a large number of voters; that seems certain; it will give the franchise to many who do not now possess it; but then arises a question whether all, or nearly even large proportion of those entitled to exercise the privilege, will invest themselves with a right which experience has too often proved has been injurious to the owner. More than one Irish representative has declared, that among the tenant class of Ireland there is a very general reluctance to place themselves on the register as voters, as it subjects them to importunities from those who cannot, for worldly reasons, be refused what they demand, and whose demands cannot, from conscientious ones, be complied with. This shrinking from the exercise of the dearest privilege of a citizen of a free state, is one of the worst symptoms of a bad political condition. It shows that the power which wealth gives may be unduly used on the one hand, and a well-founded fear that it will be so used on the other. But this feeling is by no means confined to Ireland; it exists to a great extent among the tenant farmers of England, many of whom evade the difficulty of refusing the landlord's canvass by disenfranchising themselves, though fully qualified. Thus, by wielding those who have the right, and exercise it willingly, on the side which their immediate interest points out to them, and by preventing others from holding it, by the fear of the consequences of having a political conscience, one party obtains an absolute supremacy in the county constituencies, and the small boroughs dependent on them. The antagonist power is only found in the large towns, in the manufacturing districts, or in cities. One object of the proposed bill is to hold out encouragement to the creation of an independent class of small freeholders. But in England this class is disappearing rapidly, and, as a body, its influence is wholly lost, being completely neutralised by the operation of the tenant-at-will clause of the Reform Act. In Ireland, where a freehold, however small, can only be acquired by purchase from the landholders, whose policy it has been for years to destroy small holdings altogether—a policy that has caused almost all the murders and horrors known as "agrarian outrages,"—we fear that no act of the Legislature will be able to create such a class; Ireland asks for "equal laws" with England; but the want is not supplied by giving her laws precisely the same: the same laws, under a different state of society, may work very unequally.

In the Lords, on Tuesday, Lord Campbell brought forward a bill for remedying an anomaly that at present exists in the law relating to those misdemeanours in which a writ of error may be moved in arrest of judgment. It cannot be moved, it seems, till sentence is pronounced; and as this, like most other legal processes, is attended by delay, the sentence may have been undergone before the result of the writ of error can be known. After a man has undergone an imprisonment, it is but a poor satisfaction to him to be told that his sentence was an erroneous one. The bill of Lord Campbell is intended to suspend the operation of the sentence till after the writ of error shall have been disposed of. The pending writ of error, which it is now officially announced will be moved by the traversers in the late State Trials, has drawn attention to the subject

A PRISONER in the Westminster Bridewell has died in that establishment, apparently from the effects of previous illness, as he had been an inmate of the Small Pox Hospital. The occurrence is not of itself an extraordinary one; sickness and death are everywhere, and of late seem to have made their visitations to prisons and penitentiaries with painful frequency. If there was any blame in the present case, it seems to attach more to the managers of the hospital than the authorities of the prison; he left the former establishment, it seems, in a weak and feverish state. The jury was of this opinion also, but took one of the most extraordinary methods of placing it on record that the annals of "Crowner's 'Quest Law" have ever furnished. One of the Jury was for passing a censure on the authorities of the hospital for allowing the man to leave it in such a state; another would give no verdict but in accordance with the opinion of the surgeon of the prison, that the man died from debility occasioned by previous illness. In order to come to a compromise "the foreman proposed the verdict should be 'Sudden death,' and twelve hands being held up for it, it was agreed to. The Coroner: How shall I enter the verdict? The foreman: 'Sudden death.' The Coroner (somewhat surprised): Nothing else' Foreman: No: only 'Sudden death.' The verdict was accordingly recorded."

Jurors seem to be perpetually misapprehending the nature of their duties; they are sworn to investigate the cause of death, not to state the fact of the manner in which that death took place, whether it be suddenly or slowly, which proves nothing, attaches blame to no one, and leaves the matter to be investigated as much in the dark as before the Jury was summoned at all.

We feel called on to state, in reference to this inquest, that the physician and surgeon of the Small-pox Hospital have demed in a letter to the Times, that any person of the same name as the deceased man had been a patient of that establishment.

FRANCE, if we may take the Paris journals as indicators of the public opinion, is as much occupied with the affairs of England as with her own; the defeat of the Ministry on the Factory Bill, and the strange combinations of party to which it has given rise, having afforded ample materials for discussion. The opposition of M. Guizot to the war party continues to excite the anger of the journals which are the organs of that large portion of the French people, and his latest offence is, that he is praised for his firm and temperate policy by the political writers both of France and Germany.

The other states of Europe may be despatched in a few words. Sweden has passed quietly as a royal inheritance to Oscar I., the son of Bernadotte, who was singular in his fortune among the most fortunate of Napoleon's Marshals to be created a throne, he kept it, and he has left it to his son. It is rumoured that an attempt will be made to unite Sweden, Norway, and Denmark as one kingdom. A step towards this has, it is said, been already taken by Oscar assuming the title of King of Norway and Sweden—not, as heretofore, of Sweden and Norway. This is confined to such royal acts as may be published in Norway; but still it is an alteration to which some significance is attached.

THE REVENUE.

The Quarter's Revenue has been made up until Thursday evening, and shows a very considerable increase in all the main branches of revenue. The quarter's account exhibits an increase, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, on the item of revenue, thus testifying a progressive improvement in the commerce and trade of the country, and the condition of the several classes of the population. On the year the revenue exceeds that of the year ending 5th April, 1843, upwards of two and five hundred thousand pounds. On the quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, the accounts, as at present made up, show an increase in the Customs of upwards of £500,000. In the Excise the increase is from £400 000 to £500,000. The property tax remains much the same. There is an increase in the Post Office returns, the stamps, and in every other branch of the public revenue.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Her Majesty and her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent attended Divine Service on Sunday in the Chapel Royal, Buckingham Palace. The Hon and Rev. G. Lewis Courtenay officiated. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester visited her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians at Buckingham Palace in the course of the day. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager attended Divine Service in the Chapel Royal, St. James's. The Archbishop of Canterbury preached the sermon from Psalms xxxii., and verses 5 and 6. Prayers were read by the Rev. D. Wilson, the Lessons by the Rev. Dr. Scott, and the Communion Service by the Rev. Dr. Sleath. The anthem "Who is this" (Arne) was sung by Messrs. Bradbury, Bennett, and Hawkins.

There was a dinner party at Buckingham Palace on Monday evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, the Earl of Aberdeen, Hon. Sir Edward Cust, Mr. George Edward and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, and Sir George Couper. Her Majesty the Queen Dowager, attended by the Dowager Lady Clanwilliam and the Hon Miss Boyle, left her residence, Marlborough House, in a carriage and four, at twenty minutes before three o'clock in the afternoon, for Bushy Park.

Lord Bloomfield, G.C.B. and Commodore Sir Francis A. Collier, Knight, C.B and K.C.H., went off in the barge of the William and Mary yacht to the Princess Alice steam-vessel to welcome his Majesty the King of the Belgians and bring him ashore at Woolwich, which, as we previously stated in a late number, Lord Rivers Captain Francis Seymour, and the Belgian Minister, received his Majesty on landing on the floating pier, and accompanied him across the Wharf and Mary yacht to one of the royal carriages, which he entered, and immediately proceeded by the lower road through Greenwich for Buckingham Palace. An escort of the Royal Horse Artillery was in waiting outside the Dockyard gate to accompany the King of the Belgians, but he left orders they should return to quarters. His Majesty left Ostend at nine A.M., and the Princess Alice made the passage in little more than ten hours.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians and suite, who arrived at Woolwich in the Princess Alice steam-packet, from Ostend, at a quarter before eight o'clock on Tuesday evening, reached Buckingham Palace at ten minutes past nine o'clock, where his Majesty was received by the Queen and the Queen of the Belgians, attended by the ladies and gentlemen in waiting. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited the Queen, and partook of a déjeuné with her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians. Sir Robert Peel had an audience of her Majesty at Buckingham Palace. The royal family were taken airings in the royal carriages.

On Wednesday, her Majesty, the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Royal Family, left town for Windsor Castle The royal party took their departure from Buckingham Palace at ten minutes before three o'clock, in four of the royal carriages and four. In the first carriage were the Queen the King and Queen of the Belgians, and the Countess of Dunmore, Lady in Waiting on her Majesty. The royal family, with the attendants, followed in three other carriages. The royal party were escorted by a party of Light Dragoons from Buckingham Palace to the terminus of the Great Western Railway, at Paddington, and left town by a special train for Windsor Castle. They arrived at the Castle at four o'clock. At five o'clock her Majesty, accompanied by the King and Queen of the Belgians, drove out in the Great Park in an open carriage and four and returned to the Castle shortly after six. Major-General Wemyss attended on horseback. Her Majesty and the King and Queen of the Belgians were joined in every drive. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, attended by Lady Anna Maria Dawson, arrived at Frogmore House at twenty minutes past five o'clock same afternoon in a travelling carriage and four.

On Saturday last the remains of the late Countess of Uxbridge were interred in the family vault attached to the Cathedral of the ancient city of Lichfield, The deceased lady was fourth daughter of the late Sir Charles Bagot, and has left eight small children to bewail the loss of an affectionate parent.

A numerous meeting of members of the House of Commons took place on Monday afternoon, at the official residence of Sir Robert Peel, in Downing-street. There were upwards of fifty members present.

The Attorney-General for Ireland had an interview with Sir Robert Peel on Monday.

A Privy Council was held on Tuesday at the Foreign Office. The Ministers present were Sir Robert Peel, the Duke of Wellington, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Wharncliffe, the Duke of Buccleuch, Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Stanley, Sir J. Graham, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Earl of Haddington, Earl of Ripon, Mr. Gladstone, Sir H. Hardinge, and Sir E. Knatchbull. The Council sat two hours.

RESIGNATION OF LORD STUART DE ROTHESAY.—We are enabled to state on competent authority, that Lord Stuart de Rothesay, her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburgh, sent in the resignation of his post to the Earl of Aberdeen several weeks since, which being laid before her Majesty, she was graciously pleased to accept. A steamer will be placed at his disposal early in the month of May, so that his lordship may be expected home at the latter end of that month or the beginning of June. Although only sixty-five years of age, his lordship has been some forty-eight years in the diplomatic service of his country, during the whole of which he was actively employed in various parts of the world, exceeding the late Governments. The Hon. Mr. Bloomfield, in consequence of Lord Stuart's retirement, is nominated Minister Plenipotentiary at the court of St. Petersburgh, where he has so long resided in the capacity of Chargé d'Affaires. During the Secretaryship of Lord Aberdeen the functions of which office, as Secretary of the embassy, he has fulfilled with distinguished ability. It is not intended to replace Lord Stuart by any diplomatist of the rank of ambassador, as the accompanying representative of Russia at this court, Baron Brunnow, holds only the same diplomatic rank as the Hon. Mr. Bloomfield is now invested with.

The Earl of Haddington, the First Lord of the Admiralty, was on Saturday last elected Master and Elder Brother of the Trinity House, in the vacancy caused by the death of Viscount Sidmouth. As customary, after the election, the Members of the Corporation dined together at the Trinity House, Great Tower-hill, the Deputy-Master, Captain Sir John H. Pelly, Bart., presiding in the absence of the Duke of Wellington.

The Duke of Wellington left Apsley House on Wednesday, for Strathfieldsaye, Hants. The noble and gallant Duke proposes to remain there until Saturday next. The Marquis and Marchioness of Douro and Lord Charles Wellesley join the noble Duke, and a distinguished circle of visitors will assemble there for the holidays.

The Archbishop of Canterbury commences his public dinners at Lambeth Palace immediately after the Easter recess.

Viscount Melbourne left town on Wednesday for Brocket Hall, Herts. Lord and Lady Beauvale, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, departed on Thursday for Brocket, and the Hon. William Cowper, Hon. Mrs. Lamb, and other visitors are expected to pass the holidays with the noble Viscount.

Sir Robert and Lady Peel intend to receive a select party of friends at Drayton Manor during the parliamentary recess.

His Excellency the Belgian Minister left town on Wednesday afternoon for Windsor Castle, on a visit to her Majesty.

LORD ABINGER.—The accounts received in town on Thursday morning from Bury St. Edmund's, are regret to say, not favourable. The noble and learned lord is remaining in the same alarming state. His lordship appears at times as if conscious of what was passing in the room, but he is unable to speak. Mr. Travis's Copper remains at Bury, we understand that he does not give the slightest hopes of the learned judge's ultimate recovery. The enquiries in Spring Gardens were very numerous.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—On Tuesday a court was held for the despatch of business. The Lord Mayor presented a petition from Mr. David Williams Wire, solicitor, stating that he had been admitted a solicitor of the High Court of Chancery, after paying the stipulated fee at the office of the Inferior Courts of the Mayor and Aldermen of the City of London, commonly called the Mayor's Court. He was fully aware that the practice of that court had been exclusively confined to four gentlemen, and that they had obtained a vested interest in the monopoly, having either purchased or obtained these places by the gift of the corporation. But, notwithstanding such practice, and notwithstanding its previous legality, he submitted that the act of the last session (6th and 7th Victoria, cap. 73) completely destroyed any chartered or vested rights, and threw open the court to all practitioners admitted by the superior courts. Alderman T. Wood and Alderman Brown moved and seconded a proposition to refer the matter to a committee, and to advise with the law officers of the corporation thereon. The motion was unanimously agreed to.—Subsequently a similar petition was presented from Mr. Hartley, of New Bridge-street, solicitor; and it was stated that several more petitions upon the subject would be likely to follow, it being the determination of the profession to open the court. Sir P. Laurie called the attention of the court to a statement which had been referred to by Mr. Wells, the late common councilman of the ward of Farringdon. It appeared from t newspapers that Mr. Wells had waited upon the Lord Mayor, and represented that he had been subjected in some newspaper of conduct adopted towards Mr. Barnard Gregory, in the gaol of Newgate, of the most unjustifiable description. Mr. Wells's complaint threw a vast deal of odium upon the magistracy of London and the sheriffs, and it was evident that there existed not the least ground of complaint. The whole of the information upon which Mr. Wells grounded his charge was most grossly false, and the untrue accusation consisted of a monstrous series of misrepresentations.—Sir C. S. Hunter said that, if the court noticed newspaper paragraphs, they would soon have constant employment chalked out for them.—Alderman Farebrother objected to the mention of the matter at all, and said that the existence of it in that court would answer the purpose of Mr. Wells, by giving his name the respectability of having been used in it. (Laughter.) The accusation of cruelty was beyond anything absurd. —The Lord Mayor said he believed there was not the slightest foundation for the statement to which reference had been made, and that the whole was a tissue of the most ridiculous exaggeration.—Sheriff Musgrove declared that the only thing he felt in the remarks for which there was the least foundation, was the assertion that Mr. Gregory's health was suffering—of that fact there was not the slightest doubt. It was palpable that Mr Gregory's health was rapidly declining.—Here the conversation ended.—After the discussion of a little local business, the court adjourned.

COUNTY COURTS BILL.—On Wednesday a meeting of the inhabitants and electors of the Tower Hamlets was held at the Court-house, Commercial-street, Whitechapel, for the purpose of adopting measures with reference to the grievances attached to the Court of Requests for the recovery of small debts in that district. The chair was taken by the Sheriff, Rose, who explained at some length the nature of the meeting. From the statement of several speakers, it appeared that under a recent act there is no provision made for the arrest of persons against whom decrees may be obtained in the Court of Requests, and, consequently, many persons possessing no goods or chattels are in the habit of evading arrest. The chairman added, that persons arrested by the sheriffs of the City of London, and other counties, had on several occasions been refused admittance, on the ground of the non-connection of the prison with the borough. Letters were read from Sir W. Clay, Colonel Fox, Mr. Wilson, secretary to Mr. Hume, &c., expressing their regret at legislative measure was about to be brought forward during the present session. After several resolutions in accordance with the proposed bill, the meeting separated STEAM-BOATS AND STEAM-ENGINES.—On Tuesday, at the Auction Mart, two steam-boats, the Prince Albert and the iron steam-boat the Locomotive, were sold by auction, under the direction of the assignees of Mr. John Milner, a bankrupt, and with the concurrence of the mortgagee. The Locomotive, which was stated to have cost £2000, and was 41 tons register, was sold for £630. This vessel has been in the habit of running between London and Richmond. The Prince Albert cost in building £2000. It is of 99 tons burthen, and built with two engines of 50-horse power each, and a saloon of 36 feet in length, elegantly fitted up. These engines, individuals in 1835 feet, and it draws 4 feet 9 inches water. It never, however, ran.

ST. STEPHEN'S WALBROOK.—On Wednesday the parishioners met in public vestry, pursuant to adjournment, to nominate overseers for the year ensuing, to elect a vestry clerk in the room of Mr. J. M. Pearce, resigned, and for the transaction of other business. The Rev. Dr. Croly, the rector, took the chair at twelve o'clock, and opened the proceedings by stating that he had received a communication from Mr. Edmeston, co-churchwarden with Ald. Gobbs, addressed to the "Select Vestry," which had been held last morning. It ran as follows: "Gentlemen, I beg to acquaint you that I decline again serving the office of churchwarden or overseer of the above parish, and I protest against being again elected to the one, or nominated to the other office." —(Hear, and cheers.) Mr. Rock entered into a statement with regard to the churchwardens and officers of the parish and said they were unfit persons to be re-elected on the approaching parochial elections at Easter. Mr. Alderman Gibbs and Mr. Eddison, their present Churchwardens, had been so for exactly twenty years up to that day, and during all this time, they (the parishioners) had been quite in the dark as to what was the extent or nature of their revenue—(hear, hear,—until at length they had obtained a clue to it from an answer to a bill in Chancery, filed by the Attorney-General, and in which Alderman Gibbs on affidavit swore he had received £700 per annum, to the account of the revenue of St. Stephen, Walbrook. (Hear.) The only clue, on the other hand, which the parish had to their out-goings was that of a book which had been circulated by Mr. Alderman Gibbs, and by which he endeavoured to show that the parish were in debt to him in £1,800. It was proposed by Mr. Fright, seconded by Mr. Unwin, and carried unanimously, that Mr. Henry Rock and Mr. John Williams be appointed overseers for the year ensuing, to receive further discussion, in which Mr. Cunliffe, Mr. Flight, and Mr. Brandram engaged, a resolution was passed, adjourning the vestry until the Easter week.

ROYAL THAMES YACHT CLUB.—The commencing trip for the season of the members of this club took place on Thursday last. There was a very considerable attendance of members, who certainly enjoyed the amusement much. The day was remarkably fine, and every thing passed off satisfactorily. The yachts undore hoisted his flag at Greenwich. The appearance of all the yachts was exceedingly brilliant, and such as to justify the expectation of a most promising season.

ASYLUM FOR FEMALE ORPHANS.—Thursday last the quarterly general court of the subscribers to this charity was held at the board-room of the Asylum, Westminster-road, Lambeth. The usual business being gone through, the meeting was dissolved. Several appeals on behalf of this charity have been made in the several churches of the metropolis; and reporters are always excluded from the meetings for transacting the business of the Asylum. Those who receive alms should draw an exact analogy from the generous, as no charities, with the exception of the Philanthropic Society and Indigent Blind Society, both in the same locality, come a similar cavil.

DEATH OF THORWALDSEN, THE CELEBRATED SCULPTOR.—Copenhagen, March 26. The celebrated Thorwaldsen died suddenly the day before yesterday. He was taken ill in the theatre, carried out, and died immediately. He was 74 years old.

DREADFUL MURDER, AND ATTEMPTED SUICIDE

On Saturday evening the neighbourhood of Marylebone was thrown into great excitement by the perpetration of a murder by a man named William Crouch, upon the person of Frances, his wife, and the subsequent attempted suicide of the murderer. The scene of the horrible occurrence is Little Marylebone-street, leading out of Great Mary-bone-street near Edward-street.

The murdered woman, who is about twenty-six or twenty-seven, had been married to Crouch, who is about twenty-five, in May, 1843, and had a child about nine months old. Since their marriage, Crouch has led rather a wild life, making as a horse-keeper, occasionally, but never being in constant employ, which his wife was a prudent and industrious woman, maintaining him for a part of the time by her labour, and the assistance of the parish. From her mother, who is living as lady's maid in Wilton-place. For some time they were living together at No 7, Little Chesterfield-street, but the child took ill and as her was very bad, and her mother declined any longer to assist her, she converted a part from her husband, which step she adopted about a fortnight since, when the landlord in Little Chesterfield street was given up. the landlord to quarter £1 rent, which was due. Mrs. Crouch, from this time, at the house of a person named Hembery, corn dealer 22, Great Marylebone-street, to whom she was well known, having during the day took her infant in the care of a female named Line the wife of a journeyman tailor, living at the house of Mr. Dawes, Line, Mary, below-street, at whose house the murder was committed. Crouch was remanded to Little Chesterfield street, in the room of another lodger, whose his wife now, the husband they were parted, almost daily to see the child to him. that he might take it. Saturday in rising she went to over at the house of Mr. Bush, Wesan-embankment in the same vicinity, leaving the child, as usual, with Mrs. Line. On leaving her work, shortly after six, she went to Mrs. Line's for the purpose of suckling the child, and while doing so, began to mend a pair of stockings for her husband Mrs. Line, about a quarter of Mrs. Crouch had entered the room, which is on the attic, left it, to clean the stairs, leaving to the room with Mrs. Crouch her own child, about six years of age. While so engaged, the husband, William Crouch came up stairs, and was met by Mrs. Line to pass him, and go into the room. He had not been there, however, above a minute, before Mrs. Line was alarmed by the loud cries of her child, and on hurrying in, and entering the room, she saw Mrs. Crouch falling off her chair, with her face covered with blood, and her husband standing by a chest of drawers, wiping a razor with a piece of rag. On seeing Mrs. Line, the man never paused past her, and ran down stairs into the street; but the immediately followed him, and on running an outcry, he was stopped, after running about 200 yards, and given into the custody of Bennett, 18 D, by whom he was taken back to the house. On their return to the apartments a horrid spectacle presented itself to the unfortunate woman being found on the floor in a state of insensibility, her head against a tub turned, having in her up her unconscious offspring, whose clothes were completely saturated with her blood which had flowed from a frightful gash across her throat. The child was immediately given into the care of a female in the house Mrs. Line, a surgeon, arrived in a few minutes, and, on examining Mrs Crouch's throat, found the jugular vein to be quite severed, the instrument with which it was done being completely severed the windpipe, with the whole of the anterior portion of the neck, leaving only the cervical vertebræ.

In the meantime the murderer was conveyed by a cab to the station house in Mary-le-bone-lane, followed by a large concourse of persons, where, on his arrival, he was immediately searched, when the razor, which was stained with blood, was found in his trowsers pocket. While at the station house he made several bold his chin down in his neckerchief, and on Inspector Brown telling him to hold up his head, as he could not see what he was about, he replied that he had not a good mind to cut his throat from ear to ear. He was then removed to the station house, where he was searched, when a quantity of silver and copper coin was found in his pocket. Mr. Clark, a surgeon, was sent for, who, on examination, found a wound about three inches and a half in length, on the left side of the throat, a little below the ear, and nearly to the windpipe. Mr. Clark, having great difficulty in dressing the wound, it was thought that he had completely severed the windpipe, with the whole of the anterior portion of the neck, leaving only the cervical vertebræ.

In the meantime the murdered woman was conveyed

NORTHAMPTONSHIRE GRAND MILITARY STEEPLE-CHASE.

THE GEORGE, PREVIOUS TO THE RACE.

NORTHAMPTON RACES.

In the fulfilment of our promise made last week, we here present a continuation of our Pytchley Hunt Sketches—the Northampton Grand Military Steeple Chase—now one of the most exciting and important events in the whole yearly round of equestrian contests. For some years past, these races, owing to want of patronage, have been on the decline, but several spirited noblemen and gentlemen connected with the county, having determined to revive the meeting with all its wonted spirit and attraction, means were adopted to do so with effect—and the result was a most unusual and unexpected measure of success. Amongst the most distinguished of these patrons stands the Earl of Cardigan, one of the Stewards of the Chase—a nobleman who, apart from all private imputations and black-bottle concoctions, is acknowledged to be a fine chivalrous lion-hearted fellow, whose purse and arm are equally ready in the service of his friend and country. In our desire to give a due meed of celebrity to this remarkable sporting event, we subjoin a portrait of his Lordship, with, it will be seen, a few of the most salient points in the chase, chosen by our artist on the spot, during one of the most exciting contests on record. During the morning, the town of Northampton presented a most bustling and animated appearance—the front of the George Inn being occupied as a betting ring, and, of course, the great centre of attraction to all gaudsmen and sporting characters. The trains north and south kept hourly adding to the multitude, until, at half past one o'clock, when the procession, consisting of a long cavalcade of carriages, rigs, and conveyances of all sorts, moved forward towards the ground, it was estimated that there were upwards of twenty thousand persons present.

The following list contains but a small portion of the fashionables who were present:—The Marquis of Exeter, Lady Southampton, Lord Lilford, the Earl of Cardigan, Lord St. John, Lord Maidstone, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Lord Bateman and party, Sir Robert Gunning, Sir Francis Goodricke, Sir John Hanbury, Sir W. Russell, Sir Peckham and Lady Micklethwait, Sir Watkin Pell, Hon Geo. C. Murray, Hon. Capt. Spencer, Col., the Hon. Mrs. and Miss Holy Hutchinson, Mr. Heuvenie and party, Mrs. Grosvenor, Mr Geo. Payne, Mr. and Mrs. Isted, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Stopford, Rev. Geo. Stopford, Mr Kingston, Mr. Paris, Mr. Mason, Rev. W. Stockdale and the Misses Stockdale, Mr. Clark Hilyard, Mr. and Miss Woodford, Mr. Lyon, Mrs. Langham, Mr. and Mrs. Kendal Wood, Miss Fisher, Mr. Dundas and sisters, Rev. Mr. Hughes, Mr. Chr. Hughes, Mr. Wm. Smyth, Capt. Gregory, Mr. Robert Isham, Mr. and Miss Gough, Mr. R. Sandbrand, Mr. Fuller, Mr. Bailey, Mr. H. Hillyard, Captain Fuhenham, Mr. Langham Christie and party, Mr. J. C. Mansel, Captain Sutton, Mr. W. A. Orlebar, Miss Hancock, Mr. Taylor and family (Harrington), Mr. Geo. Hanbury, Mr. W. Payne, Mr. Dryden and family, Mr. and the Misses Dayrell, Mr. and Mrs. Tryon, Mr. and Miss Farrar, Mr., Mrs., and Miss Mansel; Miss Hanburys, Rev. Loraine Smith and family, Mr. H. Nothercoat, Captain Turner, Mr. and Mrs. George Lucas and Miss Lucas, Mr. W. Christie, Mr. Grigg, Mr. Baldwin, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Cocuvius Gunning, Mr. Hungerford, Mr Cartwright, Colonel Dixon, Mr. Since and the Misses Since, Colonel Peat, Miss Fardell, Capt. Goodenough, Mrs. and Miss E. Dashwood, Mrs. and Miss M. Logan, Mr. Lionel Ames and Mr. Henry Ames, Mr. Spencer Lyteiton, Mr. W. G. Duncan, Mr. F. G. Chapman, Mr A. B. Leigh, Mr. Maunsell, jun.; Mr. Sutton, Capt Boyle, Mr. Griffith Smith, Mr James, Mr. Conolly, Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr Broadhurst, Mr. Drake Mr. Warburton, Mr. H. Littledale, Mr. W Higgins, Mr. and the two Misses Hussey, Mr. R. Knightley, Captain Hamilton, Mr. W. Whitworth, Mr. and Mrs. Farrer (Brayfield), Colonel Yale (48th Regt.), Captain Little and the two Mr. Littles, Capt. Blake, Miss Wake, Miss Palmer, Capt. Gambier, Mr. Stiwell and party, Mr. Pask, Mr. Bryan, Rev. W. Bullin, Capt. Thomson, Capt. Holvocke, Capt Cater, Capt Russell, R.N , Mr and Mrs. Scott, Mr. Card, Mr. F. Wilson, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Reid, Mr. and Mrs. R. Bevan, Capt. Jenkinson, Capt. Taylor, Capt Peyton, Major Fowkes, Mr. Sutton Western, Lieut. Willesford (64th Regt.), Lieut. Ratcliffe (R. Artillery), Lieut. Portal (83rd Regt.), Mr. Lawrell, Mr. Clark, Mr. Melville, &c., &c.

The first act of the day, after arriving at Wootton, was to view the line of country; the start taking place in Mr. Higgins's dairy ground, down the hill to a stiff thick-set hedge, leaving Wootton on the right. Then over a piece of heavy grass land, to a rasping bullfincher, with a ditch on each side, and a considerable fall on the opposite one. From this point it verged a little to the left, leading to the great obstacle of the course (the brook) which was rather an ugly one, about five yards in breadth, the banks on each side being in a very unsound state. From hence over another piece of grass land, leaving the Quinton road on the right, across Mr. Smith's grass field, and leaving Wootton brook and a hay rick (on which a flag was placed) on the left. After passing over Quinton field and two or three stiff fences, they came to a field half ploughed, half grass, and bearing a little to the right towards Mr. L. Christie's house at Preston; the extreme flag was placed in Preston park field. Leaving Mr. C.'s house, they turned to the right over Mr. Tiles's farm, where some stiff fences presented themselves; thence to the left, over Mr. Cave's great ground, round the point where the flag was placed, and returning over the same ground to the brook; thence over the two remaining fences home. We should likewise have mentioned a tremendous jump over a thick-set hedge, and a double flight of hurdles standing near the last flag.

Shortly before three o'clock the riders were all mounted, and in gay and party-coloured suits, described in the card of amusements, took their preliminary gallops forwards and backwards at the commencement of the appointed course, which was admirably kept, attracting by the gracefulness of their motions the admiring regards of the fair sex, whose smiles of recognition tended not a little to inspire them for their approaching struggle. In the fields beyond crowds of horsemen were observable, while at the more dangerous leaps hundreds of the unwashed artisans of the town stationed themselves to enjoy the perils to which some few were exposed, and to laugh at abilutions which, in sober seriousness, might have been very usefully applied to themselves. All being in readiness, and the impatient phalanx having formed line between the starting flags, at the given signal they went off in excellent order, and, dashing down the hill in an oblique direction, took the first leap in good style, with the exception of two or three mistakes hereafter described. The eyes of the multitude followed the wide-spreading evolutions of the competitors, the eccentricities of whose movements were guided by the exercise of their respective judgments, until they reached the turning flag, and in the run home the excitement became greater, each looking anxiously for the position of his or her favourite.

THE SOLDIER IN THE BROOK.

5 to 1 was taken about Waterwitch and Boxkeeper, 8 to 1 about Humbug, 9 to 1 Brenda, 10 to 1 Coatham, 13 to 1 Mallard, and 14 to 1 about Tea Fighter. As the hour for starting approached, Boxkeeper increased rapidly in favour, and at the finish of the betting he cannot be quoted higher than 7 to 2, Waterwitch closing at 6 to 1, Humbug 6 to 1, Coatham 7 to 1, and Tea Fighter and Brenda at 10 to 1 each.

DEAD HEAT.

In running up the hill Humbug seemed to have it all his own way, but at the last rush gave way to Captain Francis's Brenda, who, as it will be seen, after having been ridden with consummate judgment, became the winner.

TAKING THE BROOK.

So much for the grand result; and a few words more respecting the "untoward events," and we shall bring our notice of this race, which we have taken no ordinary pains to describe as correctly as possible, to a conclusion. La Gitana, as we have stated, commenced the "chapter of accidents" with a regular purler at the brook, ditto Impostor, who "out it" forthwith. Rival could not be prevailed upon to take the fence after the brook. Tea Fighter was not content with two falls, for after his downfall at the double he fell at the fence, where Mallard got floored the first time going out. Knight Templar was going pretty well about fifth or sixth, but we heard was completely shut out by the mob at the brook, so that he was compelled to take it standing, and his hind legs slipped in. There were several other casualties, we believe, not described, but were and to whom we had not opportunities to discover.

MATCH BETWEEN PETER SIMPLE AND EMPEROR.

The match between these horses, for 100 sovs a side, 11st 7lb each, came off over the same four miles run over in the preceding race:—

Mr. W. Elkins's g g Peter Simple	(T. Goddard)	1
Lord Maidstone's Emperor	(Oliver)	2

Peter Simple made the running, with the Emperor waiting upon him, clearing all their fences in first-rate order, until arriving at the double in returning. At this both fell; and Emperor sneaking away from his rider, left Peter, who continued to the end at a good pace, to go in alone.

THIRD RACE.—LIGHT WEIGHTS.

A Sweepstakes of 5 sovs each, p.p., for horses the property of, and to be ridden by officers on full pay of the army; 11st each; the winner to be sold for 100 sovs, if demanded; four miles; 40 subs.

Thirteen put in an appearance out of the 37 entered for this race, which was run over the same line of country selected for the heavy weights.

A noble field of thirteen started for this race, and, as in the first affair, the riders were attired in very gorgeous jackets and caps. On the office being given, they all trotted off, and, after proceeding a few lengths, Warwick shot out with the lead. At the jump, before arriving at the brook, Warwick, Cuirassier, and Conspirator took it in close together, that the former, on landing, came in contact with Cuirassier, and the latter being knocked against Conspirator, their legs got entangled, and both came down heavily. Warwick escaped falling, and went on. It was feared one or both of the riders had received some injury; but, happily, such was not the case, and they shortly remounted. All their endeavours, however, to get their horses over the water proved unavailing, and they were compelled, no doubt very reluctantly, to remain in the small meadow, and witness the others pursue their course, without being able to follow them. Cock Robin, Tod Rider, and Pickwick landed on the other side of the brook, cleverly in advance; and the rest also got well over in rapid succession, excepting Jessy, who, owing to her fall, was last; and her rider took the brook so much to the right, that the line of spectators had to scramble out of the way, to give the mare something like a clear course. The pace was good, and several succeeding fences were taken in close company by the leading horses, Tod Rider, at the seventh jump, being in advance, followed by the Mare, viz., Pickwick, Patron, and, we believe, Cock Robin. Sweet Biscuit, Warwick, The Soldier, Gangrene, and Marengo came next, and all were pretty fairly together. Pickwick afterwards singled himself out, and made strong running, fly-weed by Warwick Passenger over the Patron, Cock Robin, 20 and all round as the flag fell at last a little more than a length. On wending their way towards home, Pickwick had a considerable lead four fences from the brook Warwick continuing second, but here the pace was much slower. Five or six in the race came above in excellent order closed upon each other and some of them seemed to be going well. There improved their pace and there was nothing like the straggling or tails there were in the first race. Pickwick and Pussy came to the brook, and took it admirably nearly together, rather in advance of Warwick, who also cleared it in a workmanlike manner. Patron, Cock Robin, Ted Rider Gamerena, and Marengo followed. Ted Rider settling his head again; but he managed to get on the right rank in a few seconds; and his rider, Who was near being contrived by no ordinary exert on to keep in his saddle. The S ilder, who ran last at it, but in a skeer, and it was feared that Captain Markham was under his horse, and a rush was made to the edge of the brook, by a numerable spectators to ascertain the fact. Fortunately the captain car to leave to extricate himself, and although much grieved up to his armpits, got safely on land; but some time elapsed before the animal could be got out of his difficulties, being falling into the water on his side, at times when it was in a bed he was likely to gain the bank. The race progressed without any alteration in the front, to the last filed but one, when Warwick, who before starting had been looked upon as the safest horse in the race, went in, and was first over the fence into the winning field. Pickwick, instead of rising to it, fell over, and Pussy, who had been following his stable companion, jumping on it, was nearly down letting Patron in, and losing a very respectable chance of being first at the winning flags. Meanwhile the grey (Warwick) kept a good lead, and won easily by a dozen lengths. Patron came in second, about the like distance, and a similar same separated the latter from Cock Robin. Ted Rider was next by in, Gamerena sixth, and Marengo seventh. Mr. Smile on Sweet Biscuit fell at the brook his eighth one

On re urning to the town upwards of 100 of the nobility and officers dined at the ord nary at the George Hotel, which was indeed a most brilliant and sump tuous affair. The chair was taken by Lord Forester, and the vice-chair by Major Lawrenson. The dinner, dessert, and wines, were of the most costly kind, and great praise was given to the Messrs Hunt's, for the splendid manner in which they got up the unexpected festivity. Patron, in which the noble gentlemen of the neighbourhood and the manner in which they had been treated in Northamp ton, that they would give the preference to that country. It would also be particularly agreeable to him to have the opportunity of affording so much amusement to his friends and neighbours in his own county. (Renewed cheering.) The second race would be for a sweepstakes of five sovs each, with His 7lb each, the owner and riders as in the last. The manner in which for 100 sovs, if so demanded in the usual way

The following toasts were also proposed and responded to:—"The Pytchley Hounds and Fox Hunting." "The Master of the Nort Warwicks re Hounds." "Captain Thompson and the Stewards for the next military steeple chase."

It was here announced by the chairman that the names of three gentlemen had been received as an nounced to next year's hunt steeple chase and the names for the Right weight!

The chairman, after proposing a success to the Grand Military Steeple Chases for 1845," vacated the chair, and left the room warmly cheered by the company.

CROXTON PARK RACES.

Stewards—The Earl of Wilton, Lord Forester, and the Marquis of Granby.
John Day, Secretary; John Orton, of York, Judge.

In the great improvements which have of late marked almost every race course in the kingdom, however small or mean in feast, Croxton has at length begun to partake. A couple of stands and a weighing house have been built for the occasion, and covered with canvass, if contrasted with what has been at Croxton, instead of what is at most other places, the improvement must be admitted to be great and acceptable. The new course was another source of the present meeting, and is considered a very great improvement; its main objection is, that the start for most of the races now takes place at the back of the course, and out of the view of the spectators. This course was completed for the first day, the distance generally being much less numerous than on the day previous. Notwithstanding this drawback, there never was a greater difficulty in procuring conveyances from the railway stations to within sight of the course, and the visitors never were had hold of with genuine thankfulness. The weather was remarkably bland and cheerful, and the attendance of all classes very numerous.

The Duke of Rutland was prevented by indisposition from attending, but among the company present were the Marquis of Granby, Lady Adelaia Manners, the Duke and Duchess of Beaufort, the Duke and Duchess of Montrose the Earl and Countess of Chesterfield, the Earl and Countess of Wilton, Lord Seymour, Hon. Captain Forester, Lord Forester, Lord Rancliffe, Sir W. Wynn, Hon. Colonel and Mrs. Anson, Col. Wyndham, the Misses Case, and most of the gentlemen who have been staying at Wilton during the hunting season, together with the members of the Croxton-park Club, and many other persons of rank and distinction.

THE ROYAL GEORGE.—A few days since died at Morden College, Blackheath, Mr. Webb, one of the last, if not the only surviving officer ... held rank on board the unfortunate vessel of Admiral Sir Philip Durham at Spithead. At the time of this unfortunate casualty the late Mr Webb, who was a midshipman, had a narrow escape from the fate which awaited hundreds of his companions. He was one of the boat's crew who had permission to go ashore under the command of a lieutenant. The boat had rowed off some distance when a brother midshipman requested that he might return, as he had forgotten ... desk. The lieutenant refused to allow the boat to return, as the ... was on board, but stopping longer than the ... the boat ... and scarcely got out of the reach of the overplow, caused by the sinking of the ship. ROYAL NAVAL SCHOOL.—The annual meeting ... of the members of this club, for the transaction of the annual business, was held at the British Hotel, Cockspur-street. Shortly before nine o'clock the chair was taken by the Captain Superintendent, Sir Harry ... Bart. The business of the last meeting having been read and confirmed, several gentlemen were appointed to act as the sailing committee for the ensuing season. The auditor's report stated the receipts of the club for the past year, including subscriptions, entrance fees, to be £597 12s. 9d. Deduct ng the total expenditure, including the sums paid for prizes, suits, &c., a balance remained in the hands of the treasurer of £179 17s. 5d. A list of the yachts entered was then read, amounting to 60 in number. Amongst the owners are the names of the Marquis of Anglesea, Earl Fitzhardinge, Lord Wharncliffe, Lord Alfred Paget, M.P., Lord de Ros, Sir William Russell, Bt., Sir Thomas Troubridge, the Hon. H. Upton, the Hon. Augustus Berkeley, T. Milner Gibson, Esq., M.P., Captain Erle, Captain Armstrong, Hulme Radcliffe, Esq., &c., &c. The first match of the season will take place down the river on the 23rd inst., when the gallant admiral has challenged Mr. Captain Eden and off the Caledonia, 120, in April, 1841, on his brother-in-law, the late Sir Graham Moore, striking his flag on board that ship as a volunteer. After the race the usual dinner will take place at Greenwich.

There is no order issued for inspection or enrolment of the veteran service pensioners in this district, under Captain Hamilton, as yet.

On Monday last the 2nd Regiment was inspected ... at Newry barracks, from the head quarters in Dublin, recently by a party of the 27th under Ensign Herring.

A detachment of the 24th Regiment has arrived at Drogheda, as paymaster of the pensioners about to be raised in that district.

JACK CADE.

An allusion made to the principles of Jack Cade, by the Right Hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department, having roused the fame of that celebrated character from a slumber of nearly four centuries, we this week present our readers with an engraving of the cave at Rackheath, in which, according to tradition, Mr. Cade, as he is called in the House of Commons, confined his prisoners; and we also subjoin a quaint and descriptive account of his proceedings from the unexpurgated edition of "Holingshed's Chronicle of England" (1586.) The Graham of Netherby could scarcely have anticipated that a passing mention of Cade's name could have directed public attention so forcibly to this bold and ruthless Reformer of ancient times, but the words of great public characters are things, and the result of this allusion to Cade, has been to set some of our contemporaries upon ingenious conjectures, as to what Jack's principles were. We think it better to afford our assistance tantas componere lites, by extracting an account of the principal passages in his eventful career.

"Soone after anothere disquiete befelle here. Those that favoured the Duke of Yorke, and wished the crowne upo e his brede (for inasmuche as their judicede he had more ruithe unto it than I e that were it) procurede a commotion in Kente in this manere. A certeine yonge man of goodlie stature and ryhte pregnante of wit, was inclined to take upon him the name of John Mortimer, although his name was John Cade (an Irishe-man, as Polychronicon saith,) and not for a soothe policie, thinkinge by this surname that those who favorede the House of the Earle of Marche, would be assistante unto hime, and soe indeede it came to passe, as in such cases there is no breedere of a broile but he shall finde adherenty enow no less fayorede to furnishe his pernicious enterprise by their foolehardinesse than himselfe has the grete of his devise, thoughte in fine, as it is the unlucke lot of such tumults, their attempte was withstoode, and theire offense dulie rearedede, as in process of the storie shall appeare more at large, accordinge to the wise man's sentense—

Sepe in magistrum sceleta redeunt sua.

This capteine, assemblinge a greate companie of tall personages, resolede them that the enterprise whiche he tooke in hande was bothe honorable to God and profitable to the kinge, as well as profitable to the whole realme, for if either by force or policie there could get the kinge or queene into theire handes he wolde cause them to be honorable used, and take suche order for the punishemente and redresse of the misdemeanours of theire bad counsetores, that hereafter subsidies sholde thereafter bee demanded, nor once agayne cause anie impositions, or taxes bee spokene of. The Kentishe people, provede at these persuasions, in goode order of battel, thoughte not in greate numbers, and came withe theire capteine into the plaine of Blackheathe, between Eltham and Greenwich, and there kept the fielde more than a monthe, filling the country about, to whome the resorte of Londoners that thinke was verie favorable; and the sadde capteine sent for suche citizens of Londone as it pleased him to commande to repair unto him, and letteris of safe conduct as followes:—

THE safeguarde and signe manuelle of the Capteine of Kent sent to Chamis Cock, Draper of London, by the Capteine of the great assemblie in Kent.

By this oure writeinge ensealed, we grant and will permit trulie, that Thomas Cock of London, Draper, shall come in good suretie and in safeguarde to our presence, without anie hurte of his persone, and so abolde from us againe at his pleasure, with all other persones assigned at his denomination with him comeinge in likewise.

THE commande of the Capteine of Kent to Thomas Cock saith, for your instrotion, first ye shall charge all Lumbards and strangers, being merchants, Genowais, Cenetians, and Florentines, and others, this day to drawe them togethere to ordaine for us, the Capteine, twelbe harnesses complet of the best fashion, four-and-twenty brigandines, twelbe battle-axes, twelbe glaives, six horses with saddle and bridle, completely harnessed, and a thousand markes of readie monie, and if this demande be not observed and done, we shall have the heads of as manie as we can get of them.

But to the intente the cause of this glorious capteines comeinge hither mighte be shadowde under good meaninge, he sent to the kinge an humble supplicatione, offeringe that his comeinge was not against his grace, but his counsellors, as were lovers of themselves, oppressors of the poor, commoners, flatterers to the king, and enemies to his honour; surkers of his purse and robbers of his subjects, parciall to their friends and extreme to their enemies, through bribes corrupted, and for indifference having nothinge.

The chronicler here recounts the numerous grievances which Cade complained of. It is given in the form of a remonstrance, but the last clause, which we subjoin, gives the principal charge of injustice which Saksnearn has so happily introduced.

"Item, desireth the said captaine and commons that all extortioners used daily amonge the common people in gatte be lade downe, that is to saie, the greenwaxe, the whiche is falsely used to the great and destruccione of the kinges true commons of Kent, also the Kings Benche, the which is too greef-ful to the shire of Kent, without provision of our sovereigne lorde the kinge and his true counsel, and since in takeinge wheate and other greine, beefe, muttone, and all other victails which is impertenente without provisione of our sovereigne lorde and counsel. They wille no longer beare it."

These bilies, when the counsele had wele perusede, they did not onelie disallowe and condemne them, and the authores as proude and presumptuous, but also persuaded the kinge rather to suppresse these rebels by force thane by faire promises; whereupon the kinge removed from Westminster into Greenwiche, frome whence he wolde have sente certain lords with a power to have distressede the Kentishe men; but the men saide to these lords they wolde not fighte against them that laboured to amende the common weale; wherefore the lords were driven to leave their purpose. Ande because the Kentishe men cried owte against the Lord Saie, the Kinge's treasurer, he, as they beelaime, he was by the kinge committede to the Towere of Londone. There went the kinge to Londone, and within two cares afterwards wente against the Kentishe menne with fifteene thousande menne well prepared for warre, but the saide Kentishe menne fled the nighte before his comminge into the woode countrie near Senocke, whereupon the kinge returned againe to Londode.

The queen, that had rule, beinge of his retraite advertisede, sent Sir Humphrey Stafforde, knight, and William his brother, with manie othere gentlemene, to followe the Kentishe men, thinkinge they had fledde, but they were deceivede, for at the first skirmishe bothe the Staffordes were sleine, and all their companie discomfitede. The kinge's armie comminge to Blackheathe, hearinge of this, begane to murmure amongste themselves.

Jack Cade, upon victorie againste the Staffordes, apparelled himselfe in Sir Humphries impendidor, clad full of gilt nailes, and so in some glorie returned againe towardes London, diverse idel and vigarant persons out of Sussex, Surrey, and other places stille increasinge his numbere. Thus this glorioune captaine, giurdede withe a multitude of rusticall people, came againe to the plaine of Blackheathe, and there amonge encampede himselfe, to whome were sent from the kinge the Archbishope of Canterburie and Humfrie Duke of Buckinghame to common withe hime of his griefes and requests.

These Lordes founde hime sober in talke, wise in reasoninge, arrogante in haste, and stiffe in opinione, as who that by no meanes woulde graunte to dissolve his armie excepte the kinge in persone wolde come to hime and assente to the thinges he wolde require. The kinge hearinge the demandes of this villanouse rebel and doubtinge his owne meniale servantes which sparede not to speake that Cade's cause was profitable to the commonwealthe, departed in all haste to the Castle of Killingworthe in Warwickshire.

The Kentishe captaine beinge advertised of this, came firste intoe Southwarke, and there lodged at the White Harte, prohibitinge to alle his retinue murder, rape, and robberie, by which color of wellmeninge, he the more allured to him the hearties of the common people

After thate he entred London, cut the ropes of the drawbridge, and stroke his swoorde on Londone stone, saieinge, "Now is Mortimer lord of this citie;" and after a glorieuse election made of the maior, touchinge the cause of his tiuthere comminge, he departede againe into Southwarke; and upone the thirde daie of July he causede Sir Jas. Fines, Lord Saie, and Treasurer of Englonde, to be brought to the Guildede, ande there to be Arraignede; whoe beinge before the Kinges justices, put to answere, desire the to be tried by his peeres, for the longere delaie of his life, the capteine, perceivinge this dilatorie plea, by force toke hime frome the office, and brought hime to the standerde in Cheape, ande there before his confessione endede causede his heade to be stricken offe, and pitchede it upon a highe pole, which was openlie borne before hime through the streets.

Aude not contente therewith, he went to Mile-end, and there apprehended Sir Jas. Cromer, theine the Sheriffe of Kent, and son-inlaw to Lord Saie, causing him alsoe, without confessione or excuse heade, to be unheaded, which beinge done, he sente the heades of these two heads this bloodie wretch entred the citie againe, and, as it were in spight, caused theme in everie street to kisse togethere, to the great destestione of all the beholderes.

After this execrable murder he shewed manifeste robberie in manie houses within the citie, and special.ie in the house of Philip Malpas, Alderman of London, and diverse others, over and besides ransominge and fininge of diverse merchantes for the sweete of their lives and goodes. He also put to executione, in Southwarke, diverse persionnes, some for breakinge his ordinance, and others of his former acquaintance, lest they shoulde bewraie his base lineage, beinge of his old acquaintance, and disparage hime for takinge the name of Mortimere.

The maior and other magistrates of London, perceiving themselve neither to be a ire of goodes nor of life well warranted, determinede to repelle and keepe oute of their citie such a mischevous guiste, and to be the better able to do so, they made the Lord Scales, and that renowmede captaine, Matthew Gough, privie to their intended enterprise, beseechinge them of their helpe and fiitherance therein. The Lord Scales promised him his aide with a number of the artilerie in the Towere, and Matthew Gough was by him appointed to assist the maior and Londners in all that he might, and so he and others captaines undereole to the defeasse of the cite tooke upone them to the inclelte to be p.ie of Southe, and would not suffer the Kentishe men to approache Bridge, for fear of sudden invasion, but caused all the bridge gates to be kepte, ran in the greate haste to open that passage, where betweene both parties was a fierce and cruell fighte.

Matthew Gough, perceiving the rebels to stande to theire tackling, more than he could have thought they would have done, advised his company to withdrawe and pretende a counterfeite flighte, whereupon the rebels, supposing the victorie to have been theirs, followed the chase, and so entred the citie, but the Londners, which were in ambushe, issued forthe, and so provide for the same, put to the sworde the greatest parte of them that were entred. Great ruth it was to beholde the miserable state wherein some, desireinge to eschew the fier, died upone their enemies weapon; women, with childrenne in their armes, leaped for feare into the water, in a deadlie care how to save themselves betweene fire, and water, and swoorde, were in their hoe lises choaked and smothereede. Yet the captaines, not sparing, forthe on the bridge all nighte vailantlie, but in conclusione, the rebels got the drawbridge, and drowned manie, and slew John Litton, alderman, and Robert Heisand, a hardie citizen, with manie o heres, beside Mathew Gough, a man of great wit, and much experience in feates of chivalrie, the which in continuall wars had spent his time in the service of the kinge and his father.

This sare conflicte indured la.dou.btfiil wise on the bridge till nine of the clocke in the morninge: for some time the Londners were beaten backe to Saincte Magnes corner, and suddenlie againe repulsed Southwarke till the rise apparelde, that they mighte see where the place of jeopardie rested, and soe to provide for the same, b.it to s little availde. For the rebels withe theire multitude drove backe the citizens from the steps at the bridge foote to the drawbridge, and besides gave to set fire in diverse bumses. Great ruth it was to behoide the miserable state wherein some, desireinge to eschew the fier, died upone their enemies weapon; womene, with childrenne in their armes, leaped for feare into the water, in a deadlie care how to save themselves betweene fire, and water, and swoorde, were in their hoe lises choked and smothereede. Yet the captaines, not sparing, forthe on the bridge all nighte vailantlie, but in conclusione, the rebels gotte should rather be said, a dispensation from all, and in itself something immeasurably better than all, with Mr. Pecksniff. A man who was able to look down upon Mr. Pecksniff could not be looked up at by that gentleman with too great an amount of deference, or from a position of too much humility. So always it is with great spirits.

The following Pecksniffian rhapsody would have moved one of the astrologers of old:—

"Behold the wonders of the firmament, Mrs. Lupin! How glorious is this scene! When I look up at those burning orbs, I think that each of them is winking to the other to take notice of the vanity of men's pursuits. My fellowmen!" cried Mr. Pecksniff, shaking his head in pity, "you are much mistaken; my corny relatives, you are much deceived! The stars are perfectly contented (I suppose so) in their several spheres. Why are not you? Oh! do not strive and struggle to enrich yourselves, or to get the better of each other, my deluded friends, but look up there with me!"

Mrs. Lupin shook her head, and heaved a sigh. It was very affecting.

"Look up there, with me!" repeated Mr. Pecksniff, stretching out his hand; "with me, an humble individual, who is also an Insect like yourselves. Can silver, gold, or precious stones, sparkle like those constellations? I think not. Then do not thirst for silver, gold, or precious stones; but look up there, with me!"

This number is full of salient points, and is throughout capital.

The Illuminated Magazine, No. XII., concludes a volume so cleverly as to promise well for its successor. In the editor's "Chronicles of Clovernook," the "Gratis," the "Lane of Velvet Path," and "The Tragedy of the Till," maintain the reputation of the series for highly-wrought satire, and the power of laying bare uncharitable self. Miss Toulmin has contributed a tale of the day—"The Orphan Milliners," which may effect much good in awakening sympathy to a class of sufferers, whose wrongs have been but lightly estimated in the social scale. "The Levy Papers," it may be requisite to inform some readers, is a chronicle of bill-discounting attorneys, sheriffs'-officers, &c. "A Night wi' the Industrious Fleas," two Irish Legends, and "The Poor Girl and the Angels," are among the remaining contents. Our specimens of the illustrations are from a tale of a tournament, near the Springs of St. Chad, between Ware and Hertford; but the story itself is too long for quotation. Our next engraving illustrates one of Mrs. Postans' sketches of Parisian Life.

THE PARISIAN DANDY.

The Parisian dandy of to-day, as we see him lounging on a chair at Tortoni's, has an aspect, striking, remarkable, we may add grotesque. His long flowing hair, and beard à la Vandyke, his wide flat-brimmed hat, and large bowed cravat, give to his head an air almost of the antique; but this again is contradicted by a surcoat, or paletot, of the most singular form, lemon kid gloves, an amber headed cane, and the little bunch of violets, that purchased for a sous, of the pretty Norman peasant, with the gay kerchefed head-dress at the corner, he now bears daintily between his fingers.

The Parisian dandy, effeminate in appearance, and devoted to frivolity, affects a love of all manly exercises, with an attachment to dogs and horses, races and hunting parties. These he discusses, while attired in a blue cashmere dressing gown, lined with orange silk, a Persian cap, surmounting his perfumed locks, a cigar peeping from his moustache, and a cup of coffee by his side. The last picture of Alfred de Dreux is on the wall, and on the table a very odd collection, composed of the Charivari, and a bunch of violets; boxing gloves and bonbons; Bürgmuller's last waltz, and George Sand's new novel; with an essay on government, by the Abbé Lamennais, and a design for the embroidering of a cashmere waistcoat, by our dandy himself.

Sometimes the Parisian dandy, indifferent to Jules Janin, and all the critics of all the journals, unhesitatingly commits his literary labours to the suffrage of society, and society is very lenient. Men smile, and call him a "bon enfant;" and pretty women, in consideration of his charming moustache and delicious "bonnet rouge," from beneath which the ideas have flowed, (if there are any,) immediately deposit their five franc pieces at the nearest library, and sensing on the straw-coloured volume that promises so much, devote themselves wholly to it, for the sake of its delightful author.

It is questionable whether the literary dandy gains much by his pen—probably not; perhaps the brilliancy of his style, and the flowers of his rhetoric, do little more than provide varnish for his boots, and violets for his table; but this is not the point, he burns a genius, and believes his works immortal; he imagines his tomb heaped with laurel wreathes, and fair girls in pink bonnets and cashmere shawls sprinkling rose-buds around the poet's grave! It may be that his funds forbid all thoughts of a cutlette at the Café de Paris, or a quiet supper at the Rocher de Cancale; no matter, he smokes his cigar at four sous, sips his eau sucré, and is supremely blest.

The Parisian dandy does not confine his caprices to the effects of his costume, nor to the strange combination of his taste, in manners, habits, or equipages; he loves to carry them even into his apartment in the Rue Rivoli, or the Rue de la Paix, and there surround himself with all times, all styles.

The Parisian dandy sometimes affects the interests of a sportsman, not so much for the honest love of sport, but because it is well favoured by the princes of the blood. He occasionally joins the Paris Jockey Club, and cultivates, as he says, an amateur taste for Whist, plum-pudding, and "bifstreck à l'Anglaise;" although, in fact, the first and last have long been naturalized as foreigners in France. The dandy here talks of horses and odds, as grac fully as he converses the evening before with Madame la Comtesse, on poetry and perfumes; for zealous in no thing he has the air of an enthusiast in all.

The true dandy is careless of expense, indifferent to his means, extravagant in his luxuries; but his intimate examines tradesmen's bills, talks of what he does not possess, and looks often at the total of his cash book. He dines, not at the Café de Paris, nor at the Rocher de Cancale, nor at Verrey's, but at a two franc restaurant's in an unfrequented neighbourhood, and then he lounges on a chair at Tortoni's, smoking his cigar even to its conclusion. He talks of society he never mixes in, relates personal anecdotes of friends he knows only by name, and passes every leisure moment in his apartment on the fifth floor, in arranging and renewing, by every possible aid, his somewhat faded and threadbare attire. Miserable man! whom vanity thus cheats out of the few comforts that fortune would allow him; who talks of balls and dinners when famine hovers near him—of equipages and hors a while ready to drop from fatigue—and of the heat of the opera and the glare of a bal masqué, while remembering that his desolate chamber cannot boast of either fire or candle! And yet so will men live, cheating themselves of comforts, as well as deceiving others; disquieting themselves for a vain shadow.

At forty, be he false or true, the Parisian dandy commences his old age—and instead of his yearly accounts being filled with charges for champagne, articles of luxury, and bouquets of rare exotics, a considerable sum here and there appears in favour of Désirabode, the Parisian Cartwright, and other artists enjoying a high character for repairing time's destroying influences. Supported by the high art of the capital, greater perhaps in artifice than any in the world (whether applied to eyebrows or to manner), the dandy of forty strolls forth on the asphalte of the Boulevards, still proud of the enamel of his teeth, the delicacy of his complexion, and the graceful wave of his abundant tresses.

This number, as we have already intimated, is brimful of entertainment; and, like its predecessor, it contains one of Leech's attractive coloured etchings.

ALFRED BUNN, ESQ.

This active entrepreneur took his benefit at Drury Lane Theatre on Thursday week, when a house literally crowded to the ceiling bore ample testimony to the merits of the beneficiaire.

To be a manager, and a successful one, in these days, argues some extraordinary ability on the part of him who fills that arduous situation. Energy of unabating power, judgment of the most delicate perception, and a peculiar tact which feels the pulse of the fluctuating public's will, are all most necessary or essential to his position. He is a caterer who provides for a numerous party, and nobody should blame the cook because "His worst of dishes chance to please the most."

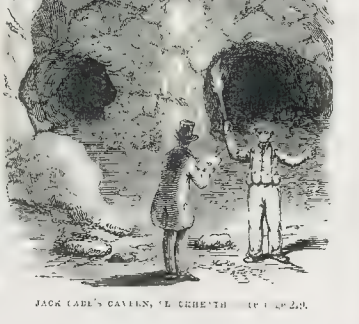
But Bunn never served up a bad dish. He has got up some good operas and ballets in a style of unprecedented magnificence, and moreover is an encourager of modern art wherever he can find it. Bunn has had more managerial experience perhaps than any other person: he has had the metropolitan theatres, some provincial ones, and the Dublin also under his controul, in the direction of which he displayed a thorough knowledge of a dramatic tactician.

We cannot speak very descriptively, or even accurately, of the origin of Alfred Bunn, Esq., for according to his auto-biography, "Those who open its pages for the purpose of ascertaining if their writer had any ordinary or extraordinary father or mother, uncle or aunt, brother or sister, relative or friend, will decededly be disappointed." Mr. Bunn, by his own statement, is now forty-seven years old. In the year 1823, Elliston gave him his first appointment, as stage-manager of Drury Lane Theatre. In the month of April, or of May, 1833, Mr. B. became a lessee of both the patent theatres, and issued an address which pleased the public, and annoyed the professional Thespians.

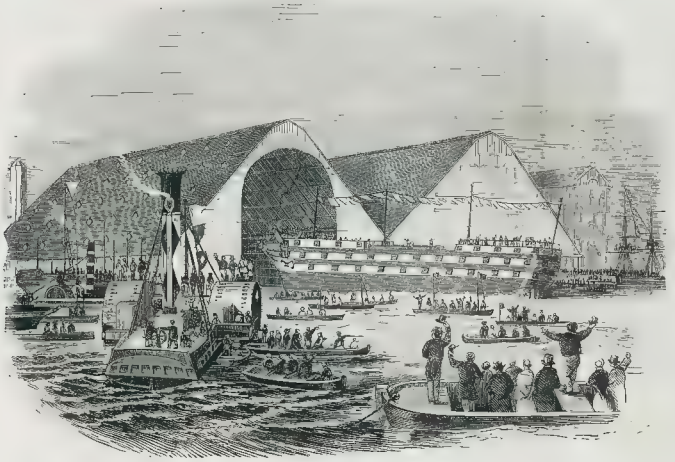
In the interim between '33 and '37, Macready had become lessee of Covent-garden, and published an address preparatory to the opening of his season, which was bitterly replied to by the lessee of Drury; for he can write, and sharply too! It is a pity that his style is not a little more amiable. In the three volumes which he has published under the title of "The Stage," had there been less vinegar and more honey, the amusing anecdotes would have flowed on much more pleasantly. He is now manager of Drury-lane Theatre, where frequently he has produced some féeries of his own construction with decided success; and, latterly, Mr. Bunn has contributed some comic rhymes of merit to "Bentley's Miscellany."

Some worshippers of John Kemble's days cry out, "Why does he not produce the legitimate drama which enchanted us in our youth?" Mr. Bunn's answer is simply this: "Because, gentlemen, in the first place, I have no actors to present you with, and in the next, the head of Taste is (as the Jonathans would say) rather considerably turned: heels light as they are or may be, will weigh down any intellect when put into the scale of present public favour." Go on, and prosper, Mr. Bunn, continuing to give us new operas and ballets, now and then letting us have a "taste of our own quality," by bringing out the work of a native composer; for, depend upon it, with all our love for the foreigners, we have yet remaining a little national pride. Be to musicians what Mæcenas was to poets, and we shall not want Purcells or Mozarts, whose merits, combined with your own, may produce you a benefit every night of the season!

The annexed portrait is from an admirably drawn lithograph, by Lane.



JACK CADE'S CAVERN, 'E CRIES 'TH[illegible]



LAUNCH OF THE "BOSCAWEN," AT WOOLWICH.

LAUNCH OF THE BOSCAWEN OF 70 GUNS AT WOOLWICH.

Oh! 'tis a glorious sight to see
A gallant ship first time set free,
Just like an ocean-bird, to have
Its form within the surging wave!
But is't not pity, too, to think
How soon her daring prow may sink,
And add to that dread list which tells
Of deaths that had no friend's farewells?
Forbid it Fate! our benison
Be ever round this stately one,
And guard her well. But why should we Express a wish so timid,—
To safety and alike to Fame
A passport is Boscawen's name! W.

Wednesday was one of those periodical fêtes days at Woolwich, when the good old town appears to the staid and sober portion of its inhabitants turned upside down, and the houses inside out. The busy note of preparation for the launch had been sounded for some days previously, and the plodding inhabitants of the metropolis, forgetting the cares and anxieties of business in the excitement of the launch of a ship of the line, and the glories of a brilliant summer sky, turned out in thousands, and from an early hour the Blackwall and Greenwich Railways, the various steam-boat companies, and all the other ordinary and extraordinary conveyances towards Woolwich reaped an abundant harvest, from the immense multitudes who continued to arrive from all quarters up to the time the launch took place.

Within the dockyard ranges of seats, rising gradually in the form of an amphitheatre, had been erected around the ship, and those set apart for the public functionaries and their friends were decorated with flags of all nations, and when filled with elegantly dressed females and officers in naval and military uniforms, had an extremely brilliant effect. Off the dockyard, the merchant vessels, Government steamers, and craft of all description were gaily dressed out with flags, their decks and rigging being crowded with spectators; and the spirit-stirring strains of the military bands of the Royal Artillery and Marines, mingled with the hearty cheers of the assembled multitudes, greeted the majestic vessel as she gracefully glided into the water. The launch was fixed to take place at half-past one o'clock, and at half-past twelve the workmen commenced knocking away the shores and blocks, but an unexpected overflow of the tide at a few minutes before one o'clock, "took the vessel," to use the phrase of one of the artisans, "out of their hands," and carried her off the slips over four of the blocks which they had not time to knock away. The only inconvenience resulting from this was that a great portion of the public who were assembled outside the gates, and some of the more aristocratic portion of the visitors, were too late to witness this national spectacle. The ceremony of christening the ship was performed by the Countess of Haddington; and among the distinguished visitors, we noticed the Danish Ambassador, and family; Sir C. Forbes, and a large party of friends; the whole of the naval and military authorities stationed at Woolwich; the Earl of Tyrconnel, Lord Adolphus Fitzclarence, Sir Charles Forbes, Sir S. Herbert, and other persons of rank. The ship floated gallantly out on the river, and will forthwith drop down to Sheerness, when her masts will be stepped, and her rigging completed. There was a large party on board the Boscawen when she went off the slips; and one jolly tar sat astride of the figure-head of the old admiral, waving his hat and cheering most lustily as she left the dock.

This fine vessel (named after our intrepid admiral,, was originally intended to be a 74-gun ship, but was altered, under the superintendence of Sir Robert Seppings, to an 80-gun ship, and reduced at last to a 70-gun ship by Sir W. Symonds, who added seven feet to her breadth. This alteration makes her too short for beauty as a model, and gives her somewhat of a stunted outline. The following are her dimensions:—

	Ft.	In.
Length of the gun-deck	180	0
Length of keel for tonnage	149	9½
Breadth extreme	54	0
Breadth for tonnage	53	0
Breadth moulded	53	0
Depth in hold	24	0

THE HORSE-WATCHER.

This may not be a very intelligible title to many of our readers, but we will hasten to inform them what is meant by it, in the best way we can. Horse-racing was established in this country in the reign of James I., under, nearly all, the rules and bye-laws which at present regulate the turf. We cannot say, that the sport was conducted then upon more honourable principles than at present: on this point we should like to be silent, but we cannot help thinking that the first plunge into the vortex of all gambling—horse-racing—was anything but a purifying bath for the morals. Time was when there was honest betting on the supposed merits of the respective horses; now, the said betting is influenced by secret information derived from a set of fellows who are technically called touters—bush-skulkers, or horse-watchers, whose subornedduty is to conceal themselves, as well as they can, near the training ground, and observe the condition and performance of the horses entered to run, as they take their gallops every morning previous to the contest with their enlisted rivals. These men, who are all stable-yard bred, can, from their hiding-place, scientifically discover a perfection or disqualification in a racer, and report, accordingly as they are paid, to either side of the interested parties who have large sums depending upon the issue of the course, and who make up their "books" in conformity with the amount of information thus dishonourably obtained. This system of espionage is not always successful, and we are glad of it—for betting, which at the best is a bad thing, is never worse than when, by artifice and design, it presumes upon the positive incredulity of the unwary.

The rearing season having just commenced, the tricks of the Horse-Watcher cannot be too prominently placed before the public.

THE HORSE-WATCHER.

RETRIBUTION.

BY THE

BARONESS DE CALABRELLA.

MR. NUGENT had not been long in London, when he received a note from his bankers, to beg he would not draw on them to any large amount until fresh dividends were received, as his account was already some hundreds overdrawn. Mr. Nugent received this letter as he was putting on his gloves to join a party at Mrs. Hamilton's, from whence they were all to proceed on a water excursion. "There must be some great error," he exclaimed; "there must be thousands in their hands! What can they mean? The £20,000 for the sale of my Oxfordshire estate has been paid in.' But while these reflections were passing in his mind, he put the letter into his bureau, and hurried off to one, whose ready smile banished for that day all recollection of the letter and its contents. The next morning he proceeded to his bankers, and was thunderstruck to find them persisting in their report that he had no money in their hands. "But the £20,000," said he; if even my yearly income is exceeded (which I cannot comprehend), you have still the £20 000, which is to pay off the mortgage my poor father left unredeemed."

The elder partner in the house, to whom Mr. Nugent addressed himself, saw instantly that something must be wrong, and with great kindness of manner, said—"Endeavour to recollect the payments you have made, Mr Nugent, for it is my painful duty again to repeat that some hundreds beyond your income, and the £20 000, have been drawn out in your name.'

There was an earnestness in this speech which made Mr. Nugent feel that he had by some means been robbed; and in an agitated tone he desired to see the orders on which these sums had been paid. The orders were produced, and a hair handed him, that he might examine them at his ease. Mr. Nugent's memory was so retentive on all matters of business or money transactions, that he could in an instant remember each order he had written; but among those he knew to be in his own handwriting were mixed many, for very large sums, which he felt certain were forgeries. He put them apart, and then said, "Here are forgeries to the extent of £32,500.'

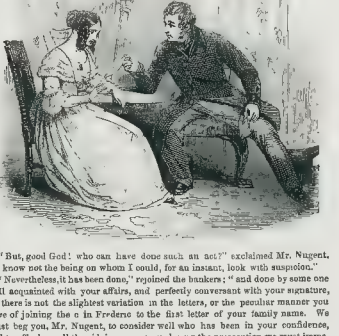
"Forgeries!" exclaimed the partners. "On whom do your suspicions fall, Mr. Nugent?'

"I can no more imagine," replied he, "than you who paid them without discovering them to be so.'

"This is a serious affair,' observed the elder partner, "and the more painful, as it must have been committed by some one in your confidence, by some one who was aware of the unusual amount in our hands."

"It is a circumstance which cannot, I should think, be known to many," remarked Mr. Nugent, "for the sale of my estate was negotiated privately by my agent, and he was aware that it was merely placed here till the term of notice was complete for paying off my father's mortgage."

"It will be necessary to send immediately to your agent," replied the bankers, "and we will also consult our professional man. Immediate steps must, of course, be taken; the last order, you perceive, has been presented within the last week, and we must hope detection will not be difficult. How fortunate," added he, 'that you should have drawn for £1000 a few days since, or the iniquity might have remained concealed, and the culprit had time to escape."



"But, good God! who can have done such an act?" exclaimed Mr. Nugent. "I know not the being on whom I could, for an instant, look with suspicion."

"Nevertheless, it has been done," rejoined the bankers: "and done by some one well acquainted with your affairs, and perfectly conversant with your signature, for there is not the slightest variation in the letters, or the peculiar manner you have of joining the o in Frederic to the first letter of your family name. We must beg you, Mr. Nugent, to consider well who has been in your confidence, and to afford us all the aid in your power during the prosecution we must immediately institute."

A much longer conversation ensued, and it was decided that the parties should again meet at the earliest hour their professional agents could attend.

On leaving his bankers, Mr. Nugent came suddenly on Horace Vernon, and, on the impulse of the moment, he exclaimed, as he took him by the arm, "Vernon, you are just the person I am delighted to meet; a very unpleasant affair has just been discovered, and your clear head and legal knowledge may assist me in unravelling the mystery which attends it."

"I need not say," replied Vernon, "how happy I shall be to give any aid in my power. But what is the nature of this discovery?"

"Forgery, said Mr. Nugent, "forgery to an enormous amount."

"Forgery!" echoed Vernon. "Good God, how extraordinary! Are all I regard to be the victims of this awful sin? Excuse my agitation, Mr. Nugent; you are not my first friend who has been ruined by this detestable act.'

"Ruined! No, thank God, not quite so bad as that," interrupted Mr. Nugent; "but compose yourself, Vernon, while I relate the facts I did not know," he continued, as he affectionately pressed the arm he held, "that I was touching on a point so painful to your feelings."

"Painful indeed," returned Vernon, "and reviving sad recollections; but the pang is past; and now tell me, Mr. Nugent, all the particulars, that I may judge how I can serve you.'

Mr. Nugent related every thing which had transpired at the bankers'. Vernon shook his head, saying, "it is a bad business; and I am sorry to say, suspicion would seem to point to a quarter whence no such act could have emanated; but you must perceive, my dear sir, that, as no one but Mr. Thornton was aware of the unusual amount at your bankers'' ——

"Stop, Vernon," cried Mr. Nugent, "do not profane Thornton's name by coupling it with this act. It is as morally impossible that he should have any knowledge of this business, as that you or I should have been guilty of it."

Vernon resumed "I did not mean to infer that he was so; but might not some villain in his office have become acquainted with the state of your account?"

Mr. Nugent remained silent and they soon reached Mrs. Hamilton's, at whose door Vernon took his leave, saying, "Command my services, if you think they can be of any use in this nefarious transaction.'

"I will let you know the result of my conference at the bankers', where I am to be at five o'clock this afternoon, when I expect to meet their solicitor and Mr. Thornton; meanwhile, Vernon, do not mention the circumstance to any one.'

"You may rely on my silence," returned his companion, as, shaking him by the hand, he bad him adieu.

It had been Mr. Nugent's first intention to acquaint Mrs. Hamilton with this fatal discovery; but, while talking with Vernon, he had decided on not making her uneasy until he had gained some probable clue to the delinquent. Of her sympathy, under his or any other misfortune, he felt certain; but he loved to see her smile, to see her cheerful, and, in fact, had not the heart to cause her any sorrow.

Mr. Nugent possessed one of those kind and noble dispositions which find pleasure in forestalling the wishes of others, and therefore Mrs. Hamilton had never been forced to ask for the gratification of any wish; and even at this moment, when his position was considerably embarrassed by the discovery he had made, he could not resist saying to her, on the departure of a person to whom she had been expressing her wish to possess some exquisitely wrought toilet ornaments, which were for sale—"Stella, shall we go together and look at these things, or will you trust to my taste in their selection?" And as usual did she answer,

"Oh, you must not buy them; they are beautiful—they are unique, but you must not spend your money on me—your children would dislike me still more."

Mrs. Hamilton was sufficiently acquainted with Mr. Nugent's mind to be aware that the instrument would be sufficient monitory to him to do what she secretly wished. She knew that to name his children's dislike would make him run out, by any mad-genee, to atone for what he considered their injustice towards her.

The ornaments were purchased, and sent to Mrs. Hamilton ere he returned to keep his appointment with the banker. He found the two professional men waiting his arrival, and, long and, to Mr. Nugent, a most unsatisfactory, closet in their place. It appeared desirable to produce the cheque book Mr. Nugent was in the habit of using, and this had unfortunately been left by him in the country. It was then suggested that he should, without loss of time, direct his servant (Mr. Thornton) proposed to accompany him, that they might continue their deliberations on this painful occurrence

"If we start directly," said Mr. Thornton, "we shall be in time for the mail train; but, calling on the way, we have not a moment to lose."

"I will only write a line," observed Mr Nugent

"Impossible, my dear sir," returned his solicitor, "we have barely time to reach the station."

Mr Nugent, however unwillingly, felt forced to resign himself to the advice and opinion of those around; but the tire of "What will Stella think? How alarmed she will be at my not returning, as I promised to do!" occupied almost as prominent a place in his mind as the fire of hell.

While Mrs. Hamilton was regarding with admiration her newly-acquired trifles ornaments, Horace Vernon was announced. His manner of entering was so abrupt, his countenance so pale and agitated, that Mrs Hamilton became alarmed; but, in answer to her inquiries, he said, "You will laugh at me, Stella, but I have been so sadly impressed by a dream, that I cannot shake off the uneasiness it has created, and I am come to continue you to place the realization of a part at least beyond the power of fate. I will not harrow your soul by a description of the horrors I have had to endure for the last few hours; suffice it to say, that out-door, the pocket-book I placed in your bureau. Nothing else will remove the fears conjured up by my dream, of the frightful consequences to yourself. Do not hesitate, Stella, I am half mad when I think of this event." There was an earnestness, and also a tenderness in his manner, which powerfully affected Mrs. Hamilton; she sought to sooth his agitation by every expression of tenderness but persuasion to leave the house until it was out the possession of his pocket-book, she hastened to place it in his hands, several of his saying the dream which had created such a proof of his regard, the unabated cessation of which she had been mourning. "I will take it with me to my dinner," said he, "and will return to pass the evening with you. Your tenderness will, I trust, sooth my half-scared senses

"Alas, Horace" replied Mrs Hamilton. "I fear that may not be; for Mr Nugent has already received my permission to do so, still you know how will only"——

He interrupted her by saying "Oh no account would I have you make any change; early to-morrow you may expect me Farewell till then, Stella." And Horace Vernon was half way down stairs before she could return his parting salutation.

"It is very odd," thought she, "that a mind like his could be so distressed by such a phantom as a dream" But the revival of attachment appeared to have produced the double reward of making him forget the jealousy which had formerly startled by a loud ring at her door "Pshaw" she remarked perceptibly, "how easy he has overcome his dreams aware that it was not Mr Nugent's step on the stairs, and, on the door being opened, the servant announced Mr Spencer, a gentleman from Mr Nugent's Mrs Hamilton half arose as she said, "Has anything happened to prevent Mr. Nugent's coming himself?

"Yes, madam, replied Mr. Spencer, as he drew a chair and, unasked, seated himself near her. "A very unpleasant affair has detained Mr. Nugent, and I am compelled by the gravity of the case to take measures which may, I fear, be unpleasant to you. You are, I am to d, well acquainted with Mr. Nugent Pray do you feel yourself sufficiently conversant with his handwriting to be able to identify it on oath Mrs. Hamilton turned deadly pale but, after a momentary pause, during which Mr. Spencer's eyes were fixed on her, she said, 'Believing myself to be the cause of Mr Nugent's detention, assure me this is not, I am I shall be better able to talk of matters I indeed know little about, though I confess my ignorance on all such matters."

Mr Spencer took from his pocket-book one of the forged orders, and, holding it close to her, said, "Will you swear to the best of your knowledge and belief that this is Mr. Nugent's handwriting" Mrs. Hamilton appeared to examine the writing attentively, and then, without reading a word, replied, "I should say, to the best of my knowledge or belief, it is his handwriting; but why do you ask with an offended air," why am I questioned on this matter? By what right or such only a you trouble me on a subject which can concern me?"

"Pardon me, madam, if I venture to say it is one which does most materially concern you. A very extensive forgery has been committed on Messrs C— and D——, Mr Nugent's bankers, who have, I regret to say, declared they will have instructed me to secure your person, and by virtue of this search-warrant examine your papers."

"What can you mean" exclaimed Mrs. Hamilton, struggling to conceal her agitation. "Who has presumed to authorise this indignity? What have I to do, or how can I be made responsible for a forgery (if there has been one) of Mr. Nugent's name? Do you mean to insinuate that your employers suspect me of any knowledge of it?"

"Upon my honour, madam," coolly replied the man of business.

"Then, sir," exclaimed she, "you and your employers shall be made to repent his insolent outrage. Where on earth is Mr. Nugent, that he does not come for me to protect me from such indignity?

"Mr. Nugent, madam, has left town, and the business rests in the hand of Messrs. C—— and D——, who, though compelled by some certain facts, joined to very strong evidence, to make this accusation, have instructed me to render the proceedings as little offensive to you as possible.

"And is it by forcing your way into my presence, under false pretences, that you fulfil those instructions?"

"Nay, madam, you have no right to complain of any undue severity I have simply detained you here while the officers have been searching other parts of the house, and now, with your leave, I will call them to examine yonder bureau

Mr. Spencer opened the door, when two men entered, and, without heeding Mrs Hamilton s threats of punishment, or cries of indignation, proceeded in the search, for which they had been summoned. In the secretaire in her dressing room a large sum in gold was found, but neither bank notes nor any memoranda which could give colour to the suspicion on which the bankers had proceeded.

"What next am I to be subjected to?" she inquired.

"Simply, madam, to the surveillance of these gentlemen, who will remain in possession

"Then I am your prisoner?" said she

"I fear, madam, that is the fact," replied Mr. Spencer. "This restriction must be enforced over to-morrow (Sunday), as the offices will be shut; but on Monday you will be examined on oath, and, if you are as strong as you state in your own innocence, nothing is supposed, and you will only have to be so able to make this so evident, that no further proceedings will be taken Is there any one you would wish to consult?

"I wish to see Mr Young immediately" Mr Spencer replied

"I have already passed on, said Mr. Spencer, that he left town; but had you not better send for your solicitor?" Mrs Hamilton appeared much shocked at Mr. Nugent's having left town without seeing her; but she wrote a note to her solicitor, and late at night he came to her.

To him she protested her innocence as strongly as she had done to Mr. Spencer; and, on his expressing his belief in it, she requested to know what she must be aware that the services in the power of any professional man to render her must in a great degree depend on her perfect candour and confidence, she asked, with the flush of anger on her cheek, how he dared insinuate that she had any confidence to make beyond the assertion of her innocence of the charge so unjustly and barbarously brought against her. "I have written," added she, "to Mr. Nugent, and I wish my letter to be treated as his immediately. It is to request him not as to my innocence, for that is I know unnecessary; but of my sympathy in what has befallen him, and my desire to submit to all which he should think necessary to detect the culprit. Will you undertake," continued she, "to have this letter delivered into his own hands before to-morrow night?"

"I will go instantly, and endeavour to hear where he is, and, if I succeed, return immediately for the letter; meanwhile I will direct a confidential clerk to call himself in readiness to start with it."

Mrs. Hamilton remained in her study till her solicitor returned, when she eagerly inquired his success

"I have an express at the door ready to take your letter to Mr Nugent, who is gone with his solicitor to Lincolnshire, to see the Bishop."

Mrs. Hamilton presented him with the letter, saying, "you will direct your messenger to proceed without one instant's delay; bid him deliver it himself into Mr. Nugent's hands, and, without waiting for any answer, return hither to render me an account of his embassy

EASTER ANTICIPATIONS.

Didst thou not fall out with a tailor for wearing his new doublet before Easter? Romeo and Juliet.

The great holyday of Christendom is Easter—consecrated as it is, to the memory of the most momentous event in the history of the world the most reverenced by civilised man. As the memorial of "glad tidings," it has been from its earliest records a season of festivity and sport. As far back as the reign of Edward IV., we read that at Easter there was wont to be played public matches at hand-ball, in which the winners were rewarded with fancy cakes, accompanied by Selden, to commemorate the custom observed by the Jews, of eating bitter herbs during the Passover.

In many parts of England the distribution of church ales prevails at this festival: and in the Scilly Isles there is a very comical practice still kept up at Easter, called "goose dancing," performed in this wise. The lasses dress themselves in men's habits, and dance to music, for a certain number of hours' houses. All kinds of jollity go forward, and unlimited liberty of speech is permitted, to the extent of revealing all the social secrets of the islands. "By the present law," says the author, from whom we derive our information, "there is a spirit of wit and drollery kept up among the people." Were the habit introduced into the larger islands of Great Britain, there is reason to believe, in addition to the promotion of fun it would considerably augment the business of the bone-setters. Above all pastimes, however, Easter, both in times of yore and in modern days, has ever been rife in manly sports and exercises. In the middle ages horse-racing was peculiar to the Easter and Whitsuntide holidays; and it was during an anniversary of the former, in the reign of Henry VIII., that, accord ng to Randle Holme, the present gold cup, the property of the corporation of the city, was originated at Chester, on a common, adjacent to the walls of the city, called the Roodhee. Having thus established our precedents, we proceed to suggest such modern instances as may be best adopted by those who seek wholesome and seemly recreation for the coming week

We write for the metropolitans; the rural people lead such royal lives all the year round—of exercise, we mean. The "festive two thousand that the world was made for" are independent of guides to relaxation. We write for the middle classes—would to God it were not a mockery to say for all our fellow labourers in the vast workshop—labouring as we do, too, with how many of them dream of no leisure beyond the assurance of daily bread. To begin with the Cockney who aspires to his spurs the Epping Hunt is no more! woe is Diana. But there is a rail to Slough, and the rural business of that day is carried on at the Windsor Inns. It is a pleasant ride from the station, and will probably be in appetite when he reaches the meet. The royal huntsman spreads his hospitable board after the season. He will ask his friends to breakfast—he will be very glad he may get it. For those pleasure seekers that elect to follow the Thames towards its source, there are Windsor, Hampton Court, Richmond, and the Star and Garter at Putney, each of them a haven of rest to which Fishers is celebrated above bridge. Many will prefer going further a-field. To these the various railways offer facilities did now unknown. Your Oriental may go to the New Forest, and the rural Londoner may commune with the deer at Hatfield; the South Western rail will take him to "Southton" and back for a guinea! We will not become familiar with the Brighton chalk pier, with Shakespeare's Cliff, with Olympic Newmarket, when he can do so at a less expense than stay at home?

Thus may it be done by the agency of steam coaches; by steam vessels equal nearly to anything short of a voyage to the Cape of Good-hope—none but the brave deserve the fair"—that is to say it requires good nerves to enjoy that particular pleasure. To our degeneracy while toiling and sweating (we ask pardon the phrase in Hindoo) in our manufactories, in our numerous throngs, all dust and dirt, ment and no room, we have ventured to think, that the greatest of a pastime is now called a penance—it would be held a grievous infliction that Greenwich Fair. But there is still the wooden legs, and flags, and naval pictures, and such like battle pieces as noble picture for British courage and pride.—Go to the—puzzled hall, and unless you come out of it athirst for glory gasping with desire for fame—we cannot know your prayer for bale point of swipes should we meet you in Alger's "Crown and Anchor" Some daring p rsons will descend to Gravesend—haply to Herne Bay; the desperate to Margate. We hope their company may meet reward. In vain should we volunteer counsel to those who seek gratification within the circle of London and Westminster, where all will be a pageant from morn till morn again. The parks, the parks, the exhibitions and the institutions, the galleries, the saloons, and the theatres, from the Italian Opera, in the Haymarket, to the native at Rouz's and White Conduit Gardens. "Joy; joy for ever joy" "Christmas," says the proverb, "comes but once a year." Easter ought to occur every quarter, for it falls to the lot of many and who knows but one May might visit us more often than she does, if there were more frequently Easter sermons and vocals to welcome her advent! Whitsuntide is but a lukewarm neat: Easter has long been the sacrament of holidays: 'tis the season for bright cloths, glad hearts, and best bobs and tuckers. Now let the world wag as it will, Easter Day—our holiday clothes: you may not now "fall out with a tailor for wearing his best doublet."

TATTERSALL'S.

MONDAY.—Saving that Alice Hawthorn and Vakrel were supported in three or four quarters at improved prices there was nothing fresh in the betting on this day's racing, but it was a very busy morning, and the afternoon was almost wholly reserved in the Derby, for which several horses were backed with great spirit We may especially mention Rattan and The Ugly Buck, par excellence the "movement" stage; for to have taken 10 to 1 against a horse that each supposed to be the genuine), pubble favour being so equally divided that a sovereign for an even five hundred would have turned the scale. Orlando, Bay Momus (the sister to Grey Momus, who ran second last year to Coronation), Tarn, and Fortitude, and Mr Forth's lots, were also in general request, in most instances at better prices for the layers than we have quoted of late. Nothing fresh on the Oaks, and not a bet laid on the 2000 Guinea Stakes.

THURSDAY.—The formidable display of favourites for the Chester would without explanation, lead to an erroneous impression as to the actual amount of business transacted. True it is that all were backed, but the investments, in three cases out of five, were so ridiculously small, that we do not return the prices without some sufflings of conscience. The chief outlay was on Freedom, Bramble and Roscius, each of whom was supported, au sprrito, by the "infinitunals." The prices, generally, tally with those previously quoted. The Derby betting again left the two favourites nicely balanced, that we dare not venture to say which, if either, had the call. The grand feature in the speculations on this race was the absence of Mr. Ongley's King of the Gipsies to 25 to 1, taken to a large sum, solely on the strength of a trial on Monday with Rebecca rick, and it will require frequent and liberal investments to keep him up. If we add that Mr. Ford's horses were in great force and that Running Rein was at a discount, we shall have completed our notice of the movements of an averagely busy Thursday.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

SHERIFF'S COURT.—THURSDAY.

BREACH OF PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.—LACY V. FENWICK.

Considerable interest was created, from its being known that the case of "Lacy v. Fenwick," for a breach of promise of marriage, would be tried. The court was crowded by fashionably-dressed persons of either sex. Mr. Thesiger, Queen's Counsel, with Mr. Peacock, for the plaintiff; and Mr. Sergeant Shee, with Mr. Russell, for the defendant; entered immediately after the jury, and were some minutes in earnest consultation. The plaintiff, Miss Charlotte Lacy, is, it appears, a young lady possessing considerable personal attractions, and daughter of Colonel Lacy, of the Royal Artillery, Woolwich, and the defendant, William John Fenwick, is a gentleman of fortune residing at Hayling Park, Croydon. The pleadings stated that on the 31st of January, 1838, the defendant promised to marry the plaintiff, and failed to perform his promise up to the 31st of December, 1843, when he was requested to fulfil it, and refused to do so. The damages were laid in the declaration at £20000, and the defendant, having suffered judgment to go by default, the present jury were specially impanelled, under a writ of inquiry, to assess the damages which the plaintiff was entitled to recover of the defendant. After the jury were sworn, Mr. Thesiger rose, and, addressing himself first to the gentlemen of the jury, he was happy to relieve them from further attendance, as his friend Mr. Sergeant Shee and himself had agreed between themselves to take a verdict for the plaintiff for £1000. This announcement gave evident disappointment to the fashionables in attendance, who, doubtlessly, anticipated some disclosures of an interesting character.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.—THURSDAY.

Before S r C. WILLIAMS

IN RE CHARLES MATHEWS, THE COMEDIAN.

Mr. Charles James Matthews, the comedian, appeared before the Court on Thursday, for the purpose of undergoing his final examination.—Mr. Lewis said that, pending the proceedings, Mr. Mathews had saved for his creditors £2000, but to enable him to earn that money, it had been necessary that he (Mr. Lewis) should advance of that £2000 to go to Liverpool, and for the purchase of the necessary dresses.—Sir C. Williams: Those dresses will be useful in future, I suppose.—Mr Mathews: Oh, certainly, Sir Charles; they are all in perfect order.—Mr. Lewis continued to say he had advanced this money on a pledge that he should be repaid, and he now applied for the sanction of the Court for its repayment out of the amount of the earnings which day to his account at the Bank of England.—Sir C. Williams could not comply with this request, not having the power, but had the greatest confidence that the creditors would do everything that was reasonable.—After some further conversation and arrangements as to the commencement of the periodical payments by Mr. Mathews, the final order was signed for his protection from all further proceedings. It was ultimately arranged that the payments should be quarterly or half-yearly, and date from 13th April.

IRISH MUSICAL EVENINGS.—Mr. Lover had his third evening on Wednesday, which went off with great éclat; and notwithstanding Passion week, when there is dialectical which to appear at any public entertainments, he contrived to coax many of the fashionables out of their shells by the genial warmth of his truly Irish entertainment. It is a strange blending of sentiment and fun—now reaching at symphonies, and the next moment producing laughter; and then comes the sweet song deliciously sung by Miss Dickson or Miss Cubitt, or given with a author's own peculiar manner of poetical reading or arch expression, which does not require to know him a month to be at home with Mr. Lover expression in everything, and it is evident that the self-possession he has acquired since his first appearance enabled him to do himself more justice than hitherto. A beautiful ballad of the "Pilgrim from Harper" was encored, but the honour as modestly declined; afterwards, however, even an Irishman's modesty could not get over the thundering encore which his "Widow Machree" obtained, and then he promised us that the former should not exceed two hours. The rooms were heavily fashionably attended, amongst others by Lord and Lady Rossmore, the Hon. Colonel and Mrs. Leicester Stanhope, Lady Mcdonnell, Mrs. Hiers Bunbury, Mr and Mrs Emmet, Mrs. Milnes Gibson, Mr. Prescott, Mr. Chapman, M.P., Mr. M. J. O'Connell, M.P., and hosts of musical, literary, and artistical notabilities

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE.—Since our last report the receipts of English wheat up to this market have been only on a moderate scale, nevertheless, they have been fully equal to the demand. The best parcels have usually supported the previous value, but the value of other kinds has given way, and we have to deal with decidedly cheaper wheat, as to the new and indeed corn, as it has been during that the rates have remained more or less unaltered, during which time but a small quantity of foreign wheat and malting sorts have met a downward tendency. The malt trade has been very dull at barely same many prices as of all other grain, including flour, having undergone no alteration. Friday being a holiday no market was held.

Essex and Kent, red wheat 56s to 60s, white 58s to 62s, Norfolk and Suffolk, red 56s to 58s, white 58s to 62s, grinding barley, 24s to 26s; malting ditto, 28s to 30s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 50s to 52s; ditto ground, 54s to 56s; Scotch and Ware, 60s to 63s. Chevalier, 64s; Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 2s to 23s; potato ditto, 23s to 25s; Dutch and Cork ditto, 18s to 20s; ditto white, 19s to 21s; brown beans, new, 28s to 30s; ditto, old, 34s to 38s; grey peas, 30s to 32s; maple, 32s to 34s; white ditto, 34s to 36s; boilers, 36s to 38s, per quarter. Town-made flour, 54s to 55s; Suffolk ditto, 46s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 48s to 49s, per 28 lbs. Seconds, ditto, 42s; Essex, ditto, 44s; ditto, fine, 46s; ditto, fine, 48s. Irish—Stirling 19s to 21s, new, 20s to 22s; ditto feed, 18s to 19s, new, 20s to 21s, per quarter. Flour American 34s to 35s; Baltic, 31s to 32s per barrel.

The Money Market.—During the whole of the week ending the period of the year, a very limited amount of business has been transacted in all kinds of stocks, at prices barely equal to those of last week.

The following are the present rates:—Linseed, English, sowing, 60s to 66s, Baltic crushing 50s to 52; Mediterranean and Odessa, 47s to 49s; hempseed, 28s to 30s per quarter; coriander 30s to 36s per cwt.; brown mustard seed, 12s to 18s; white ditto, 16s to 24s; tares, 4s to 6s per bushel. English rapeseed, new, £28 to £26 per last of 10 quarters; Garlic, Sicily, £24 to £25; Black Sea and Baltic, £20; rapeseed cakes, £6 5s to £6 10s per ton; canary, 38s to 40s per quarter.

Considerable prices of wheaten bread in the metropolis are from 7½d to 8½d; of household ditto 7d to 8d loaf.

Since our last week there has been an improved demand for most kinds of tea, and prices have advanced a trifle. At auction, on Monday, 798 packages of Assam were disposed of at full prices; and of the Pekoe so long as 1½d, as 8s per lb. No sample have been paid for more than 1s 3d, while the generality of the public sales show a 4d fluctuation.

Coffee.—Holders of Ceylon are demanding higher rates owing to which very little is doing. Good ordinary Cheribon is 52s per cwt. Low plantation was 45s per cwt. In other kinds of coffee a fair business is done at late currencies

Cocoa.—The supply of West India is very small, and the demand is steady, at full prices

Rice.—The sales are very slow, yet we have no alteration to note in its value

LA POLKA.—M. JULLIEN has the honour to announce that he has just published "The Polka," price 2s., postage free, splendidly illustrated by Brandard, with a short description of the figure by E. Cunlon; the music composed on national motives by Jullien, Strauss, Labitzky, Lanner, and others. Jullien's Polka having been sold to the public under so many assumed forms, he has published the Polka Dorée at his own office, 2, Mad-street-west, Regent-street, in order to secure the public against the gross bills of operating incorrect copies he has attached his signature to each; none can therefore be relied on, which have not his autograph. Correct copies of the Polka to be had at all the respectable Music shops in the Kingdom. Also, the ENGLISH QUADRILLE, received with immense applause, at the Author's Concerts, Theatre Royal Covent-garden. LA VALSE A DEUX TEMPS now in course of the Nobility's assemblies, the BOUQUET ROYAL VALSE and IRISH ECHOES COMIC QUADRILLE.

Insured without the Average Clause at 1s. 6d. per cent., no duty.

COMMON INSURANCE
Private Houses and Shops, not Hazardous, 1s. 6d. per cent. Hazardous, 2s. 6d. per cent Double hazardous, subject to special agreement. Fire Insurances may be effected for a longer term than one year, at reduced rates, by payment in advance.
The premiums for Insurance of Farms are upon an equally moderate scale of charges.
Endowments of all kinds for future or existing children. The usual commission to solicitors. Prospectuses, Maps of the buildings to be insured, and Proposa s for Insurance, &c., be forwarded to, their Agents in their respective districts, or to the Office in London. Agents are appoin ed in the Principal Towns in the Kingdom.

HAIL STORM DEPARTMENT.
In soli.cting the attention of Farmers and others who may be interested in protecting themselves from losses by Hail-storms, the Directors of this Office trust it will be borne in mind that the "Farmers' Fire and Life Insurance Office" was the first in this country to introduce a plan of protection against a calamity, which the events of last year have proved to be no less enormous in its effects than the dangers are frequent. It therefore think that they have a claim upon the grateful feelings of the British farmers, and they feel that they may rely with confidence upon their support.
The Rates of Premium charged are Sixpence per Acre for Wheat, Barley and Peas; and Fourpence per Acre for Oats, Beans, Turnips, and Potatoes No average clause, so that the sufferer will be certain of receiving the full amount of his loss, to be settled as in the case of loss by fire, and should any dispute arise, to be referred to arbitration.
Glass in Hot-houses, Greenhouses, or private Houses, 20s. per cent., subject to certain reg lations.
The surplus profits, after paying an annual dividend of 4l per cent to the shareholders, and providing for a reserve fund, will be divided every third year between the shareholders and the insured
All losses, whether partial or total, will be paid in full.
Prospectuses having been issued by an office about to be established at Norwich, professing to insure ag inst the losses by Hail-storm at the rate of 1s. per acre, that the Directors of this office fee, themselves called upon to address some remarks to the agricultural body thereon. The Royal Farmers' and General Fire and Life Insurance Office obtained powers, in its specia. Act of Parliament, 3 and 4 Vic., cap. 9. passed in the year 1840, to effect insurances against Hail Storms. There being no expense upon the subject to guide them, as regards the risk, they commenced business at the rate of 6d. per acre, and the whole business of the Hail-Storm Insurance was carried on wholly separate and distinct from the Fire and Life Insurance, which has existed 13-42 and has been found to be sound in the other business. The experience gained during that period has proved to the Directors that those insurances may be safely effected, and to speed charges a scale must end in Hail-Storm Insurance, as it has in thousands of other cases. The disappointment to all parties concerned. The same precaution is necessary in insurance against loss by Hail Storms as in other cases, by an office in a respectable, safe, and influential position. No impostant is this point, that it has attracted the attention of the Legislature, and a report of a "Select Committee of the House of Commons on Joint Stock Companies" has just been published, the recommendations in which will speedily become law, and which should have the serious attention of all insurers. Pursuant to the recommendations in that report, every new company must be registered "Provisionally" before the public announcement of the company, and absolutely registered on the full formation thereof." The more important matters to be required are—the amount of the capital, capital of the company, and the proportion paid up the total number of shares, and the amount of each share, the name, occupation, and add ress of the Directors, with the shares held by each Until provisionally registered no allotment of shares is legal, and unless provisionally registered no calls can be made to pay losses These are excellent precau ions to protect the parties insured, and have all been complied with by the Royal Farmers' and General Fire and Life Insurance Office from its first establishment. According to the special Act of Parliament and Deed of Settlement, the names, addresses, and occupations of the Trustees Directors, and Shareholders are all registered in the Enrolment Office In the list of shareholders will be found names commencing with the Peerage downwards, embracing landed proprietors and the most influential agriculturists in the large number of the other persons and professions, the total number being 1 ,

The capital (£500,000) is divided into 5,000 shares, a small number under two thousand shares, reserved, for the purpose of appointing County Directors.

Each proprietor of a share pays a deposit of £2 per share.

The Directors of this Institution are aware that, to interfere with any other Office but, as the Norwich Hail-storm Insurance Office has announced rates lower even than those charged by the Farmers' Office last year, they do not feel that they are going too far in calling public attention to the comparative positions of both Offices

ROYAL FARMERS' AND GENERAL FIRE, LIFE, GENERAL HAIL-STORM INSURANCE AND HAIL-STORM INSURANCE INSTITUTION. (NOT WITH NORWICH UNION INSURANCE OFFICE).

Power given by an Act of Parliament by which parties insured may sue the Company, in the name of the Managing Director, Secretary, or any one of the Directors.

EXTRACTS FROM RESOLUTIONS OF THE SELECT COMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS, ON JOINT STOCK COMPANIES"

That in order to prevent the establishment of fraudulent Companies, and to protect the interests of the subscribers and of the public, it is expedient that all Joint Stock Companies (other than Railway companies) hereafter formed, whether future or already formed, be registered in a office to be appointed for that purpose

That the registration of future Companies be made—(1) Provisionally, before the publication or issuing of the Prospectus; and (2) Absolutely, by and (3) Annually, or competently, on the full formation there

That on such provisional registration, such future Companies do register the principal particulars the following, such as—

The name and nature or purpose of the Company
Its place of business, and every branch office or agency appointed or contemplated
The names and addresses of the promoters and also, as the case may be, the names and addresses of the provisional committee, directors, officers, and of the subscribers
And any prospectus or circular issued, or to be issued.
And from time to time such further information, any addition to or change in such particulars
That on the absolute or complete registration, such future Companies (except Companies incorporated by Act of Parliament or by charter, otherwise than under the Letters Patent Act) do register the principal particulars thereof, such as
A copy of every prospectus or circular addressed to the public
A copy of the Deed of Settlement, Subscription Contract, or other such instrument.
The business or purpose of the Company, and its place of business
The amount of its nominal capital, and the proportion paid up
The total number of shares, and the amount of each share
The names, addresses, and occupations of its members, with the shares held by each
The names of directors trustees, persons auditors and all other officers of the Company, with their occupations and addresses, and a written consent of acceptance of office by each

And such other like particulars as may, upon consideration, appear to be requisite.
That for enforcing such registration, it is expedient to provide that any future Company not registered, shall not be lawful.
That in order to prevent jobbing in shares of non-registered Companies and those Companies in an immature state, no allotment of shares have any legal effect till the Company be provisionally registered, and all sales or transfers of shares void and that till the Company be completely registered
That if any such Company be duly constituted, them, on its being registered provisionally it be entitled to the following powers and privileges.—

To use a common name,
To open accounts with bankers,
To receive deposits, and
To perform such other acts only as are necessary for the establishment of the Company;
But not to make calls;
Nor to declare dividends;
Nor to purchase or hold lands;
Nor to enter into contracts (except such as are necessary in its provisional state);
Nor to sue or be sued as a Company
And that on its absolute or complete registration, it be entitled to the following powers and privileges.—

To use a common name, but that together with the word "Registered," or other words denoting the particular character of the Company or future patent under which the Company is constituted or is or may be registered,
To enter into contracts,
To open accounts with bankers,
To receive deposits, and
To perform such other acts only as are necessary for the establishment of the Company, and in every such case the date of the registration, and also,
To perform all acts necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of such Company, which it may be empowered to do by the articles,
To purchase and hold lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with reference to the purposes of the Company, under such restrictions as shall be deemed necessary; and also,
To enter into contracts for the execution of its works, and for the supply of its stores, or for any other necessary purpose, and also,
To sue and be sued in its common name, and also,
To issue certificates of shares, with the date of complete registration and the particular character of its Company marked there n, and also,
To receive certain moneys from the subscribers or others in respect of the amount of any shares not paid up, and in respect of any claims of the Company, and also
To declare dividends of the profits of the concern, if profits there be.
That existing Companies, not incorporated by Act of Parliament or Charter, register such particulars thereof as the following:—
The name and purpose of the Company
The names and addresses of its directors and officers;
The place of its business, and every branch office or agency;
The number and amount of the shares of the Company.
The names and addresses of the Officers appointed to sue or be sued on behalf of the Company, and a copy of every Act of Parliament or Charter patent under which the Company is constituted or is or may be regulated,
And that all future Joint Stock Companies make such returns as may be required.
That for enforcing such registration, it is expedient to provide that any such Company not registered shall cease to be lawful after a time to be appointed in that behalf, provision being made for making it known to the public.
That with regard to existing Companies incorporated by Act of Parliament or by Charter every such Company shall register—
The name and purpose of the Company
The place of its business, and every branch office or agency;
And a copy of every Act of Parliament or Charter under which the Company is constituted or is or may be regulated.

That the Committee recommend that her Majesty's Government do cause Bills to be prepared for carrying into effect the above Resolutions, with such subsidiary provisions whether relating to any of the Companies or to any of the provisions of the subject not therein specifically treated, as may be requisite for that purpose.

The Scottish Union Insurance Company may be most favourably contrasted with any Institution. Unquestionable Security is assured by the subscribed Capital of Five Millions sterling—divide , at its origin in 1824, amongst Five Thousand Proprietors.
At the First Division of Profits, which took place on the 1st August, 1841, after averaging Fourteen per Cent., or Two per Cent. per Annum on the Sum Assured, was added to the Policies. A few extracts from the Company's Books at once prove the practical effects resulting from the plan peculiar to this Company.

UNDER the especial patronage of HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA. his Royal Highness Prince Albert, her Majesty the Queen Dowager, Queen Adelaide, Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians, Her Majesty the Duchess of Kent, Duchess of Cambridge, and all the Nobility; ARNOLD'S IMPERIAL CREAM, for strengthening, preserving and promoting the GROWTH of HAIR. It read cates the dandruff, prevents the hair from falling off, and in a short time produces a beautiful growth of a single most remarkable.—Prepared only by the Inventor, THOMAS ARNOLD, Hair Cutter and Perfumer in Ordinary to the Queen, 2, Princes-street, Hanover-square, where it may be had, price 3s. 6d. per bottle, and at the Depôt, 20 High Street, Kensington, who cease and Retail, in Pots price 3s. 6d. each with a Brush on the Hair inclosed, and by most Perfumers, Hair Dressers, and Medicine vendors.

F. ARNOLD'S ROYAL FAVOURITE.—This most beautiful Perfume, which is so justly admired by all the Nobility and Gentry, has the additional recommendation that it preserves the Linen in a pure and healthy state, so that its functions may be duly performed. The high and universal celebrity which ROWLAND'S KALYDOR continues to maintain as an active yet mild and soothing exhilarator of all impurities of the skin, is daily the period of by its most pleasingly evinced. This preparation, eminently BALSAMIC, RESTORATIVE, and INVIGORATING, is equally celebrated for its speedy efficacy removing all impurities and discolorations, and in promoting a healthy freshness and transparency to the skin and complexion. Its universally great demand excites the cupidity of unprincipled Shopkeepers, who gave the title of "GENUINE" KALYDOR to compounds of their own manufacture, of the most deleterious character, containing mineral astringents utterly ruinous to the complexion, and, by their repellant action as dangering health. It is therefore imperative on purchasers to see that the words "ROWLAND'S KALYDOR," are on the wrapper.—All others are FRAUDULENT COUNTERFEITS!!!

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

No. 102, Vol. IV.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844. [Sixpence.

NATIONAL FAITH AND NATIONAL FINANCE.

AN occurrence, which is so rare in itself, and so important in its consequences, that it almost makes an epoch in the history of the nation, has just taken place in the midst of us. It has excited some, but not all the attention it deserves; but it will have its full effect on foreign nations. We generally find that those dwelling in the closest vicinity of the wonders of nature or the glories of art, are of all others the most indifferent to them; and with respect to great moral and social phenomena, individuals are often so distracted by the cares of life, or engrossed by its pleasures, that they do not perceive them in all their bearings.

The occurrence we allude to is one recorded among the news of the week, and of which the Stock Exchange has been the theatre. On Tuesday last the Three per Cent. Stock was, to use the technical language of the money market, "quoted at par," that is, one hundred sovereigns in gold were given for the transfer of a hundred pound stock, in the books of the Bank, to any individual purchaser. It is only a very few years short of a century since a similar circumstance occurred. It is remarkable then for its rarity, but far more remarkable for the state of things it indicates. In the first place it proves the existence of vast masses of wealth —of capital unemployed—over and above the still greater amounts that have rushed into and filled up every possible field of more profitable investment: in the next place, it proves how unlimited is the confidence, how boundless the security of the public in the good faith of the Government of England, which, of whatever parties or men they may be composed, have always made it their scrupulous care, that in all emergencies "Faith must be kept with the public creditor." In the firm position we hold in the confidence of the world, verily we have our reward.

It must be remembered that the purchaser of any portion of stock becomes a shareholder in a vast fund, which though, as far as its yearly interest is concerned, it may be considered a "great fact," yet as respects its capital is undoubtedly a great abstraction. That capital is gone, lost, spent; vanished from the eye and touch, as entirely as the snows of the last century. We owe it, though our fathers and grandfathers spent the great bulk of it. In what way they spent it, whether wisely or foolishly, it would be now useless to enquire. Some of it purchased the glories of Blenheim—so early did it begin; and some of it bought only the disasters, dishonours, and sufferings of the campaign in Affghanistan, and the retreat from Cabul, to so recent a period does it come down. What events have filled the interval! The wars of the first Georges, the war that lost us the Colonies of America, the war with the French Republic, the war with the French Directory, with the Consulate, with the Emperor, the long and terrible series of struggles, battles, and campaigns, that began at Jemappe and ended only at Waterloo. It was in the period of which these dates are the beginning and the termination, that the greater part of our debt was contracted. To supply the waste of that quarter of a century the resources of England were anticipated and burdened for all succeeding generations. The gold of the people was transmuted into armies and fleets—brave as men and stout as vessels;—the armies were consumed in conflict, and the fleets were wasted by battle and tempest; but regiments could be recruited, and ships rebuilt, by those who were lords of the powerful spell that could create both. And thus it went on with a reckless profusion, that when we now look back on it, having its glories and triumphs brought to our minds only as abstractions, but feeling its burdens in the daily pressure of taxation, and the increasing difficulty of living, we wonder what could have been the guiding principle of the statesmen of the day, and what the sort of wisdom that then governed the world! For the question of the child to the old soldier, in Southey's beautiful ballad, frequently recurs to us—"what good came of it at last?" And in both cases the answer that is no reply to the question, is equally applicable.

But regret for the causes that created the debt, and a lament for the burdens it entails, does but increase our admiration of the strong principle of honour, and the unwearying exertions which have marked all the dealings of the English people with respect to it. There it stands against us, a mighty obligation; and so assured are all that the obligation will be sacredly regarded, that, even at the low rate of three per cent. interest, the competition of capital to be invested in it is so great, as to raise a hundred pounds of stock to an equality of value with the real and solid tangibility of the precious metals. We do not think this present high value of this stock in the market will continue for any length of time.

As new fields of enterprise are discovered, or as the existing sphere of trade and commerce is enlarged, capital will be withdrawn from the Funds to be applied in these new directions. But as the rise has been gradual, the fall will be gradual also, and only a most extraordinary concurrence of events will reduce it to the low level to which it has, at various periods, been reduced. Capital flows to this country for investment from every nation of the world. The Americans have cheated others to such an extent that they have lost all faith in themselves, and they have arrived at the last degradation that falls on a confederation of sharpers—they are afraid to trust each other. Large sums of money are sent over here from the States, for investment, because, small as the interest may be, the principal is at least secure. The South American republics and the Empire of Mexico are by none so mistrusted as by those who are in some degree rulers in them, and from thence also arrive monies for the same purpose. Santa Anna and General Rosas are both stated to be large holders of English stock. In disturbed periods in Europe the same thing happens, so that the high price of the Funds cannot be taken as altogether a test of the wealth of this country, for what is thus remitted may, of course, in the same way be recalled. But, on the whole, it is a great tribute to the commercial greatness and national honesty of Great Britain, that she is thus regarded. America has made the payment or nonpayment of public debts a party question, and the Repudiators have the majority.

The consequence is, that for any great national undertaking, the Republic will be powerless; she could not negotiate a loan in any capital of the world; the Rothschilds of the Earth utterly "repudiate" her, they "like not the security." Honesty is frequently to be preserved only by great self sacrifice, and much exertion; but it brings a reward that is well worth the struggle. The past can be appealed to, as a support through the difficulties of the future, even should those difficulties arise. But, with a better knowledge of what constitutes real national greatness, we trust the errors of the past will be avoided; we shall then find that our best field for conquests lies over the tenantless but fertile lands of our Colonies, and that the wisest mode of bettering our position is not so much an interference with the policy of other nations, as the amendment of our own.

With such resources at our command—with such wealth within ourselves—what might not a great statesman accomplish, for the education of the people, for the lessening of toil and the increasing of food, for the improvement of our towns, for the health of the people, for all that ensures life, and, after that, for all that adorns it—for literature, for music, for painting—for the arts in all their beautiful varieties.

Feeling how much could be done, and seeing how little is done for all these, the grief at the waste of our resources must be great in proportion to the magnitude of those resources themselves. We hear of millions consumed in a campaign among the wilds of the Indian continent, and sigh over the miserable grant of a few thousands for the teaching of the people; we read of millions more sunk among the swamps of the Indus, and grieve to see the tardily undertaken improvements of the capital, in streets, parks, and squares, dragging along in unsightly incompleteness, from year to year, as if the Exchequer was bankrupt.

Let us hope, with the "Funds at par," and the coffers of the state overflowing, that in both respects there may be a speedy amendment.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

The building wherein the business of the Stock Exchange is transacted, is situated in Capel-court, on the east side of Bartholomew-lane, on the site of the mansion of Sir William Capel, Lord Mayor in 1504. The first stone was laid on May 18th, 1801, and contains an inscription, which states for the information of remote posterity, that the National Debt was then upwards of five hundred millions. This building, which is the present Stock Exchange, was opened in March, 1802. The entrance to Capel-court is nearly opposite the door at the east end of the Bank, leading to the room in that building called the Rotunda.

The following details we have abridged from Mr. Knight's popular "London:"—

No one is allowed to transact business at the Stock Exchange unless he is a member. If a stranger unluckily wanders into the place, he is quickly hustled out. There are about three hundred and fifty firms of stock-brokers and jobbers whose places of business are situated in the streets, courts, an alleys, within five minutes walk of the Stock Exchange. To these we must add thirty or forty bullion, bill, and discount brokers. All the more respectable of these monied dealers are members of the Stock Exchange, and the total number of members is at present about six hundred and fifty. The admission takes place by ballot, and the committee of the Stock Exchange, which consists of twenty-four members, is elected in the same manner. Every new member of the "House," as it is call ed, must be introduced by three respectable members, each of whom enters into security in £300 for two years. At the end of two years, when the respectability of the party is supposed to be fairly ascertained and known, the liability of the sureties ceases; but, as each member of the house is re elected every year, if in the course of the preceding twelvemonth there is anything discreditable in his conduct, he is not re-elected. If a member becomes a defaulter, he ceases to be a member; though, after enquiry, he may be re-admitted on paying a certain composition; but he must be re-admitted, if at all, by vote of the committee. When a member becomes unable to pay his creditors, there are certain official assignees who receive all the money due to him and divide it amongst his creditors. No man can be re-admitted unless he pay 6s. 8d. in the pound, from resources of his own, over and above what has been collected from his debtors. As soon as the practices of the Stock Exchange are contrary to law, and cannot be enforced in the courts, the members are only to be held to them by a sense of honour, and such restraints in the way of exposure and degradation as the governing committee may be authorised to apply by the general body of members. Cases of dishonourable or disgraceful conduct are punished by expulsion. The names of defaulters are posted on the "black board," and, in the language of the Stock Exchange, they are then technically called "lame ducks." In short, the committee have the power of effectually destroying the credit of a member whose transactions are of a dishonourable nature. They investigate the conduct of members whenever called upon by other parties, and give their award according to the evidence.

The two leading classes of men who have dealings on the Stock Exchange, are the jobbers and the brokers, though the business peculiar to each is not unfrequently transacted by one person. Some members deal for the most part in English stocks, others in foreign, and many confine their attention principally to shares in mines, railways, canals, joint-stock banks, and other public companies; some call themselves discounters, bullion and money-dealers, and transact business always ready either to borrow or lend, we have become, as it were, a channel directly or indirectly for a great portion of the loans between Lombard-street and the Stock Exchange; and the magnitude of our money-dealings will be at once understood when I state that we have both had and made loans to upwards of £200 000 at a time with one house; that the payments and receipts through our banking a counts on each side amounted to eighteen or twenty millions per annum, but our loan transactions far exceed that sum, and extend to the vast amount of from thirty to forty millions a year. Our loans for the year ending October, 1841, exceeded thirty millions on an average of three millions a month, or £100,000 a day; and generally, upon four or five days in every month, the loans have amounted to 150, 2, 3, 4, 5, and even £700,000 in a single day."

THE HIGH PRICES OF THE FUNDS.—It appears that for the first time for nearly a century the Three per Cents. Consols are at par, or £100 money for £100 stock, which they reached on Monday last. The last time they were at £100 was in 1749, the year after the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle; at which period the amount of the public debt was rather more than £78 000 000. The highest price the Three per Cents ever rose to was in 1757, prior to the year 1797-8, in consequence of the great success of the French armies on the Continent, and of the mutiny at the Nore, and of the rebellion in Ireland, together with the failure of the attempt to negotiate with the French directory, the price of which became less than it was before or has been since that time. In May, and again in June, 1797, the Three per Cents Reduced were as low as 46¾. In the September of that year the Three per Cents Consols fell to 47¾, being the lowest price to which they have ever fallen. Dr. Hamilton, in his valuable work on the national debt, states that they were also at that price in January, 1798. The Three per Cent. Consols have not been under 68 since the latter part of the year 1820, when they were 67¾. The highest price the Four per Cents ever attained was 107¾, in August, 1791; and the lowest price was 59½, in January, 1798. The highest price the Five per Cents ever attained was in August, 1791, when they were 123¾; and the lowest price was in August, 1798, when they were only 69¾.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, April 8.

SPAIN.

The present state of affairs in Spain is so truly depicted in the following correspondence from Madrid, dated the 2nd, addressed to one of our evening papers, that I cannot do better than give it at full length:—"Notwithstanding the contradictions of the Ministerial journals," says the writer, "and the new favour conferred on the present Cabinet, I can assure you that we shall have a modification, if not an entire change of Ministry, after Easter. A law on the press is being prepared, and will be published in a few days, for the raising of the state of siege, for nothing is so much dreaded as the re-appearance of the opposition journals. Opinions are much divided in the council on the different questions of the day, particularly as regards the censorship of the press. Some of the Ministers are desirous of submitting the question to the Cortes; others, acting under the influence of General Narvaez, wish to bring the decree immediately into operation. The amnesty project also meets with great difficulties, for the opposition of Messrs. Madoz and Cortina, who would thereby be set at liberty, is much dreaded. Place no reliance in the apparent calm which reigns at this moment; the state of things is very grave, and I am not in the position which has always led to political excesses—that is, a want of confidence in the Government. Some uneasiness is felt as regards the Mecatraxo, and General Roneali has been ordered to repair to that place in disguise. The war there will last longer than the blockades of Alicant and Carthagena, as the chief part of the partizans who assemble in bands, and fire from behind the hedges and the gorges of mountains. Six battalions of infantry have received orders to march in that direction."

Queen Christina is cajoling the clergy: she daily visits the churches, and is in constant intercourse with her confessor. Don Carlos, notwithstanding the time occupied in devotional exercises, she keeps an eye to the main chance. She has of her first acts on entering the capital was to demand that the sums due to her and her two daughters, by the will of Ferdinand VII., should be immediately paid. The Ministers, alarmed, made evasive replies; but Christina insisting, they consented, in the hope of gaining time, to name a commission, to report on the amount due.

The Ministers are not behind hand in generosity, for acting under the advice of her council, they have conferred on M. Carrasco, the Minister of Finance, the dignity of a Count; on Gonsalez Bravo, the Grand Cross of Charles III.; on the Marquis of Peralta, Minister of the Interior, the Grand Cross of Isabella the Catholic; on that innocent warrior, General Masarredo, Minister of War, the rank of Lieutenant-General; on Donoso Cortes, the appointment of private secretary to the Queen, with a salary of 80,000 reals! The modesty of Narvaez would not permit him to accept any favour for the present. He authorises us to give, not receive!!

I know no one act which more clearly shows the real feelings of the inhabitants of Madrid than the fears of the present Ministers to place arms in the hands of the National Guards. Not content with having disbanded this useful body of men, they have now determined on organising what they call a Civic Guard, composed of men taken from the army, and erected to mutiny in the force is to be 130 companies of infantry, and 20 squadrons of cavalry. Where the money is to come from to maintain so large a military police has not yet been taken into consideration.

The Emperor of Morocco seems determined to pick a quarrel with Spain, and takes every opportunity of showing his animosity to that kingdom. On the 20th of March a felucca, with a crew of only three men, left the port of Algeziras, for the purpose of fishing on the coast of Barbary. On the 21st, when near the coast, off Cape Negrete, a musket shot was fired from a fort, and one of the crew was killed by it. It is said, but I much doubt it, that Narvaez and Bravo have determined on chastising the Emperor. Bravo wishes Narvaez to take the command of the expedition against the Barbarian, but he is too rusé, and will not quit Madrid.

In the beginning of last month a formidable conspiracy was discovered in the Havannah. The blacks had made preparations for murdering all the whites, and taking possession of the island. Numerous arrests have been made; among the number are several Frenchmen, respectable planters in the environs of Matanzas. These arrests were made on the depositions of a free black, who had been a slave to one of the Frenchmen, who, in order to divert suspicions that rested upon himself, denounced his former masters.

I have extracted the following from the Verdad of the 3rd, a Barcelona paper:—"On the 2nd, the police arrested a Frenchman named Victor Dulmares, who, with a Sardinian passport, and under the designation of Miguel Bastienes, had been committing all sorts of crimes in Barcelona and its environs. There were found upon him 18 passports, 16 of which were in blank. He is said to be one of the persons implicated in some of the attempts to assassinate the King of the French, and who escaped from France."

The Heraldo reports, in news from Portugal, that on the 27th of March the Royalist troops crossed their fire against Almeida, and that the greatest confusion reigned in the fort.

ITALY

The news received to-day is very contradictory. By some we are told that the presence of an imposing force of Austrian troops in Lombardy had so discouraged the insurgents, that the chiefs had fled from Italy; others, and I must confess from good authority, gave as certain that the insurrection daily gains ground, and that the greatest discontent reigns throughout the Papal States. The people are exasperated at the treatment experienced by many persons of rank and greatly believed by their fellow citizens, particularly at the imprisoning in the fortress of St. Elme of Messrs. Roselli, De Augustine, Charles Poerio, Salvatore, the brothers Assanti, nephews of General Pepe; Ayrita and Pierri, Italian officers of the navy and artillery; and Messrs. Ganiou, Francesco, and Marcel, rich landed proprietors.

A letter from Rome of the 31th of March says, that the assurance which a great power, friendly to the court of Rome, has given it at London and Paris, that it will not suffer any revolutionary manifestations in the Roman states, has produced a favorable impression, and been decidedly effective in Romana. The heads of the insurrection are silent.

The Archduchess of Parma has, by a decree, re-established the order of Jesuits in her states, and authorised the opening of a Jesuit convent at Parma. She has also decreed that they are to be charged with the duty of secondary instruction.

GERMANY.

It would appear that Prussia is desirous of gradually acquiring a maritime force proportioned to her wants, from the fact that in the treaty entered into with Russia relative to the communications by steam between St. Petersburgh and Stettin, there is a clause that the long steamers may, at the will of their respective Governments, be armed as vessels of war.

The Austrian Government is making great preparations for pouring an immense force into Lombardy. The unsettled affairs of Italy seriously occupies the attention of Prince Metternich. The imports of Austria into France during 1842, amounted to 4 484,710 francs, being a diminution as compared with 1841, of 1,055,562 francs. The articles of import are principally cattle, hides, and colouring matters. The imports from France into Austria, in 1842 amounted to 11,167,201 francs, being something over six millions more than in 1841. This increase principally affects coffee, the cotton, silk tissues, madder, colouring matters, indigo, thistles for carding, woollen stuffs, cotton tissues, and muriate of copper.

The fortifications of Rastadt are proceeding actively. In three years the town will be transformed into a fortified place, and 3300 troops are to be garrisoned there even in time of peace.

There is no truth in the report that the treaty of extradition, in the case of deserters, has been renewed between Russia and Prussia.

The Augsburgh Gazette says, that the Albanian troops in Thessaly, Macedonia, and Bulgaria, commit the most revolting excesses against the Christians; these atrocities are caused by the fanatical hatred of those soldiers against all those who do not profess their religion. The same journal ment ons, that the Emperor of Russia will visit the baths of Bohemia during the month of May, and from thence proceed to Vienna.

A letter from Trebizond, dated March 10th, addressed to a mercantile house of Vienna, contains the following melancholy intelligence:—"The town of Resht, in the province of Ghilan, has been the theatre of a terrible fire, which consumed the bazaars, and several large Khans filled with goods. Resht is one of the largest manufacturing towns in Persia, and all the silks of superior quality which are sent to Europe come from it. The whole loss is estimated at a million of toumans (about £480,000.) Resht is situated in a forest, and contains 2000 houses. It is five miles from the Caspian Sea."

FRANCE.

We are very dull, not only in political movements, but news of every description: the only thing worth recording is the following despatch, published last night by the Government:—"Baron de Bourqueney to the French Consul-general, March the 24th, to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, that the Reis-Effendi, Rifaat Pacha, had just placed in the hands of the two first interpreters of the Ministers of France and England the following official note, dated March 21:—'His Highness the Sultan is irrevocably resolved to maintain the friendly relations, and strengthen the bonds of perfect sympathy which unite him with the great powers. The Sultan has given positive orders for the future to prevent, by effective means, any Christian abjuring Islamism from being put to death.'"

The Royal Family will leave Paris early this year for Neuilly. Preparations are already making for quitting the Tuileries.

Count Mortier, the Ambassador to the court of Sardinia, has left Paris for Turin.

I am sorry to state that the eldest daughter of M. Guizot, a most accomplished and beautiful girl, only sixteen years of age, is dangerously ill; indeed great apprehensions are entertained for her life, caused by a severe cold, which has settled on her chest.

The Gazette de France of Saturday last, has the following on the condemnations which it received on that day:—"The confiscations which were abolished by the Charter, Ferdinand VII. has restored in future to prevent, by effective means, any Christian abjuring Islamism from being put to death."

to the van usually employed in carrying prisoners to and from the gaol to the Shire-hall. On the arrival of the van at the gaol, the turnkey went up on the door of the van to let out the prisoners, when they suddenly made a sudden spring from the steps. The governor (Mr. Orridge), who was standing by at the time to receive the prisoners, noticing the circumstance, quickly attempted to grasp his collar, but the sudden motion of the convict prevented his so doing, and he, suddenly eluding his grasp, ran off rapidly in the direction of Haberden grounds. Several of the turnkeys attempted to follow him, but the darkness of the night, together with the speed of the convict, prevented their coming up with him. Large rewards have been offered for the convict's apprehension.

HORSHAM.—The sentence of execution passed upon John Lawrence, at the late Lewes Assize, for the murder of Mr. Solomon, the chief officer of Brighton, was on Saturday last carried into effect at the usual place of execution, on the top of the county gaol. From the character of the offence, and the circumstances under which it was committed, there was not the slightest chance of any remission of the sentence; and from the time of his conviction, the wretched culprit evidently prepared for the fate which awaited him, and appeared anxious to make all the atonement in his power by a sincere repentance. Very few persons, comparatively, were present. It is now nine years since there has been an execution in this county; and it is remarkable that the last man who was executed, for four daring burglaries, was brought to justice mainly through the exertions of Mr. Solomon, the murdered officer.

MANCHESTER.—EASTER GRAND MUSICAL FESTIVAL.—On Monday evening last the first of the two performances announced took place in the great Free Trade Hall. Much interest, for some time past, has been excited concerning these musical festivals. The principal vocalists were Madame Caradori Allan, Miss Sabilla Novello, and Miss Maria Hawes, and Messrs. Hobbs, Machin, and Phillips, and the instrumental performers were Herr H. W. Ernst, Mr. C. A. Seymour, Mr. W. Lindley, and Mr. Howell. The performances consisted of the first and second parts of Haydn's Oratorio "The Creation," with a selection of sacred music. Sir H. R. Bishop was the conductor. The band and chorus consisted of about three hundred performers. The spacious and splendid hall was well filled, and the performance gave great satisfaction.

NEWCASTLE-UPON-TYNE.—The colliers in this vicinity, whose period of service expired on the 6th instant, have struck. A large meeting took place on Monday at the Black Fell, near Gateshead. It is said that about two thousand men belonging to one of the collieries are about to proceed to work, protected by a detachment of the 97th Regiment.

SHEFFIELD.—INFERNAL MACHINE.—About half-past one on last Saturday morning some murderous rascal threw a tin case loaded with gunpowder into the bedroom window of Mr. George Gillott, file grinder, residing at 197, Granville-street, Park, Sheffield. Mr. and Mrs. Gillott, and an infant, were at the time in bed; but on jumping out Mr. Gillott saw the fuse burning, and very wisely got his wife and child down stairs as quickly as possible. They had scarcely, however, crossed the lower room towards the door, when the explosion took place, shaking down part of the ceiling of the bedroom, and breaking every pane in the window, with a part of the sash also. So great was the shock that it shook the wall of a house next door, caused by Mr. James Barker. We regret to say that occurrences of this kind are not unfrequent in Sheffield.

TRURO.—Mrs. Hartley and her son, who were lately the unfortunate subjects of an inquiry under a writ of lunacy, passed through Truro on last Saturday afternoon, on their way to their seat, near Camborne. They travelled in two carriages and four, that in which Mrs. Hartley rode having, in addition to the arms, a royal crown, with the star and badge of the garter, emblazoned on the panels.

IRELAND.

MR. O'CONNELL'S VISIT TO CORK.

Mr. O'Connell arrived at Cork on Saturday evening, accompanied by his son John, Mr. Steele, Mr. Barrett, Dr. Gray, the Rev. Mr. Tierney (his co-conspirators), and Mr. Smith O'Brien.

The principal streets were thronged with people anxious to catch a glimpse of the man from their hopes are centred. About three o'clock on Sunday the Chamber of Commerce was assembled with the leading Liberals of the city and most of the strangers in town, it having been understood that Mr. O'Connell was to be present about that hour. The scene on his entrance was indescribable. It must have cheered the heart of the traitor to have received a welcome so warm, a homage so reverential. During the whole evening the Chamber was the object of attraction, while the streets were paraded by the best bands of the city. The Repealers of Waterford cheered, and the Repealers of Cork, here, to bring up their contingent to the great provincial muster. The scene at the quay of Waterford was animating in an extraordinary degree. Thousands of the Repealers of Waterford city filled the quay, to behold the emancipation of more than 300 gentlemen, including the corporation. Every ship upon the broad bosom of the river was decorated with flags and streamers, many bearing the magic word "repeal," while the masts and yards were manned by hundreds of the nautical fraternity, who were eager to have the best view of the stirring scene. The vessel steamed at half-past five o'clock, amidst deafening shouts. The whole coast, from Waterford to Cork, was illuminated by countless bonfires, blazing splendidly in the still night. In Cove, the bands were on the beach; and the bands of Passage were stationed on the St. George's Quay, to receive the Waterford Repealers.—On Monday a public meeting was held in the County Court-house, the Mayor in the chair, for the purpose of adopting resolutions condemnatory of Lord Ebrington's Registration Bill. Mr. O'Connell made a speech of extraordinary power in desunciations of the bill of the Irish Chief Secretary, and this speech forms the most obdurate resolution of perseverance, under all possible circumstances, in his efforts for the restoration of the domestic Parliament of Ireland.

THE DINNER.

This entertainment, for which such active preparations had been made for weeks, came off on Monday evening, in the Lancastrian School-room. The tables were placed along the centre of the room, and these were crossed at the head by one large table, at which the chairman and guests were seated. A gallery was erected, which was filled with ladies. Above the head of the chair were the words—"Justice to Ireland." Tables were arranged for 800 persons, and it was said that more than that number had been taken.

At six o'clock the Mayor appeared, and in a few minutes Mr. O'Connell arrived, and was received with loud cheers, and waving of handkerchiefs from the ladies in the gallery. He was accompanied by W. Smith O'Brien, M.P., Mr. O'Brien having taken his seat at the upper table, there sat on his right, David O'Connell, M.P.; Dan Callaghan, M.P., the Mayor of Kilkenny; Sir David Roche, Bt., Limerick; Caleb Powell, M.P., the Mayor of Limerick; the Mayor of Clonmel; the Mayor of Waterford; Alderman Geary, Limerick; Mr. Hogan, ex-Mayor, Limerick; Thomas Lyons, ex-Mayor, Cork; John O'Connell, Esq., Grena; Alderman Byrne, Clonmel; Rev. Archdeacon Laffan, county Tipperary. On his left sat the Mayor of Cork; John O'Connell, M.P., Kilkenny; the Mayor of Limerick; Maurice O'Connell, M.P., Tralee; Nicholas Meagher, M.P., Tipperary; Thomas Steele, Head Pacificator; T. B. Reader, M.P., county Cork; Rev. Mr. Tierney, Conibret; Dr. Gray, Dublin; Mr. J. O'Connell, M.P., county Kerry; Richard Barrett, Dublin; James Kelly, A.M., T.C.D., Amina House, Castle Connell; Sir Benjamin Morris, Waterford, &c.

Letters of apology were read by the Rev. Mr. O'Sullivan from Dr. Slattery, Titular Archbishop of Cashel; Dr. M'Hale, Titular Archbishop of Tuam; Dr. Higgins, Titular Bishop of Ardagh; Dr. Kennedy, Titular Bishop of Kildare; from Mr. Timothy O Brien, the Mayor of Dublin; from Francis Stack Murphy, M.P. for Cork; Charles Gavan Duffy, Thomas Mathew Ray.

The cloth being removed, and the usual loyal toasts drunk,

The Chairman, after a suitable preface, proposed the health of Mr. O'Connell. (Loud cheers followed for several minutes, during which a small gilt figure of a boy was let down from the ceiling, having in his hand a green scroll, on which was painted in letters of gold, "Ireland expects that every man will do his duty." It would be impossible to describe the effect which this had on the audience, and which was received by loud clapping of hands, waving of handkerchiefs, &c.)

Mr. O Connell then rose, and was received with rapturous and lengthened cheering. When he procured a hearing he said, I come not here to gratify mere pleasurable feelings. I have higher sensations of mind than to receive the praise and regard of individuals with their hundred thousand kindnesses. but I have a higher, a nobler motive to induce me. I am advanced in life—the prison may terminate my existence. (Loud cries of "No.") I do not say so in pitiful fear. (Cheers.) (No, no.) I came here to proclaim to the province of Munster, and from this I will send my voice to the utmost limits of the northern and to the eastern and western provinces—I came here to read you a lecture. I am here to instruct you in your duty—I came here to tell you, and universal Ireland, that it would be the basest thing the world ought to think that I would go into prison. (No, no.) I am as sure as that any man hears me here that I will go into prison. (Several cries of "I will.") I must for others command. How is any man foolish enough to imagine that I will not? There are three ways of avoiding the prison.—First, would you recommend me to make an abject submission? (Cries of "No, no.") Now we are agreed perfectly on that. The second would be the result of a writ of error. I confess I know so much of the lodges that, though my conviction as an old lawyer, putting self out of the question, I have the clearest possible case, I never believe any one who prophesies the result of a law suit. (Laughter.) Still, though there ought to be a fair chance, there is not at all. Cries of "Oh.") The third way of avoiding it would be by the government abandoning the present prosecution, and holding us by recognizance, to come up at some indefinite period. (Cheers.) Will the government do that? They will not. They cannot. They won't relaxe. They cannot relinquish, for this manifest reason—they have not the manliness to shrink from it. They would consider a relaxation as a confirmation of themselves—as giving up to Lord John Russell that the trial was unfair. The more they did wrong the more determined they are to persevere. No one could imagine, even a mere dunimier, that amongst the present administration Lord Stanley would relinquish a conviction against me and against Ireland, and I will say, without being in the least a bigot, any Catholic in Ireland, or that Sir James Graham could relinquish it, who I already placed in the awkward predicament of being ready to fight me because I wouldn't fight, and he would not fight O Gorman Mahon because he would fight; or Sir Robert Peel, from whom I extracted Catholic Emancipation; or poor old Wellington, who could not be brave in the House of Lords, whose everything was so peremptory. (Laughing.) Then take it for certain that the sentence will be executed, and take this for a consolation, that they may imprison me—that they may confine my person, but they will not deprive me of a single pleasurable sensation. There is no horror in confinement for a man who was working for forty years for Ireland. I want to proclaim everywhere the absolute necessity for peace and tranquility, for you could not gratify your enemies more than to hear of a disturbance in any part of Ireland. (Cheers.) Peace and tranquility all over Ireland is the way to confound and confuse them. (Cheering.) I have another demand to make on the people, viz., taking a doubly active part for the repeal. (Loud shouts.) I pronounce him no Irishman who does not avow himself a pealer. (Great cheering.) I hope no friend of mine will keep company with any man who is not a repealer. (Loud cheers.) Don't be ashamed of wearing a badge—call it a procession button, if you please, but wear it; let it be worn voluntarily, not as belonging to an association, and then you will know who is for or against the prosecution

Mr. O Connell then proceeded in his customary manner to point out the natural advantages of Ireland, and concluded by begging of them not to run the risk of allowing their countrymen to commit crime, but avoid everything criminal, and if they wanted to give him consolation in their dungeons they would be all repealers (Tremendous cheers.)

Mr. R. B. Reade, Q.C., Mr. Jeremy Winston Barron, Mr. John O'Connell, Rev. Mr. Tierney, Mr. Steele, Dr. Gray, the Mayors of Cork. Limerick, Kilkenny, Clonmel, and the chairman afterwards addressed the company, and the meeting separated.

On Thursday Mr. O'Connell performed the ceremony of laying the first stone of anew Roman Catholic chapel in James's-street, Dublin. A glass bottle, containing one of each of the present coins of the realm, together with the following scroll, was laid in a hollow in the under stone made for that purpose:—"Parish of St. James, Dublin. The first stone of this church, dedicated to the Apostle Saint James, was laid on the fourth day of April, in the year of our Lord, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Forty-four, in the Pontificate of Gregory the Sixteenth, and the seventh year of Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, by Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P., with permission of Daniel Murray, Archbishop of Dublin, attended by the clergy, parishioners, the Lord Mayor, and a vast number of the citizens. George Canavan, P.P." The ceremony concluded by the ceremonial of blessing the place, and the chanting of the appropriate hymns, &c.

The Right Hon. H. T. Lowry Corry, one of the Lords of the Admiralty, with the Hon. Sydney Herbert, Secretary of the Admiralty, and Captain Beaufort, surveyor and engineer of works, arrived at Cove, in her Majesty's war-steamer the Black Eagle, on Thursday. Accompanied by Admiral Bowles they visited Haulbowline in the course of the morning, inspected the works, &c., and expressed their admiration of the state in which they found this magnificent pile of building.

The Northern Whig states that a company is about to be formed for the purpose of extending railway communications from Portadown to Monaghan, with a view to further extension towards Longford and the banks of the Shannon in one direction, and towards Enniskillen and the west of Ireland in the other. We understand that arrangements have been made for proceeding immediately with the preliminary survey of the proposed new line.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

GRAND FIELD-DAY IN CHATHAM.—The troops of this garrison, consisting of the 1st division of the Royal Marines, the 58th Regiment, the four company depôts of the 23th, together with the provisional battalion, assembled in review order on Monday on Chatham-lines, under the command of Sir Thomas Willshire, Bart, K.C.B., attended by Brigade-Major J. Doyle O'Brien, and two aides-de-camp, Captain Valiant, of the 49th, and Captain Wade, of the 29th. The number of men under arms was upwards of 3000, and the day being extremely fine, the lines were covered with holiday folks, and most of the gentry of the towns and neighbourhood were present in carriages to witness the brigade exercise of the troops. For the first part of the review the troops, with their bands and colours, marched past the Commandant and his personal staff in slow and quick time. They were afterwards formed into three battalions. The first battalion consisted of the Royal Marines, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonels Ferguson and T. Peebles, with Adjutant Gascoyne. The second battalion was formed by the 58th Regiment, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel R. H. Wynyard, and Major C. Bridge, with Adjutant M'Leay. The 3rd battalion was comprised of the 23th, and the Provisional Battalion, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas G. Kelly, with Major Robinson of the 2nd Queen's. The three battalions were formed into eight divisions of 24 files each; and each division had two officers and three sergeants, exclusive of the officers and sergeants of the colours. The battalions having advanced from the right, changed front to left, and then formed a line, and changed again front to right. The company of each battalion, after undergoing many other military movements of all manner to brave recruits, and forming a line, broke into columns of companies left and front, and marched off the ground by sections, the 58th taking the direction of Brompton Barracks, the Marines to their divisional head-quarters, and the Provisional Battalion to their quarters in Chatham Barracks. The whole of the troops went through their evolutions with the greatest precision. It is the intention of Sir Thomas Willshire to hold these field-days every week during the summer months.

TORRES STRAITS.—Her Majesty's ship Fly has surveyed a passage hitherto little known. An island stands nearly in the centre, and thus there are two channels, one of three miles to the eastward, and four to the westward. Captain Blackwood, we understand, intends to recommend that a beacon light be placed on the island.

Her Majesty's surveying steamer Fearless, Commander Sherringham, commenced making an official survey of the Southampton river on the 2nd instant, on which day she was employed taking soundings on the bar between the docks and the opposite shore at Hythe, where the bar runs across, and renders the river so difficult of navigation to the large class steamers of the Royal West India and Peninsular and Oriental Companies at half ebb tide.

Major-General Charles Fraser will take the command of the Cork district this month; and Lieutenant Turner, R.A., will be his aide-de-camp.

Col. Napier, Assistant Adjutant-General at Belfast, is appointed Deputy Adjutant-General at head-quarters, vice Col. Wade.

Col. Mackintosh, from Enniskillen, is appointed Assistant Adjutant-General at Belfast, vice Napier.

The half-yearly inspections of the army in Ireland will not commence before May.

Insolvent debtor to be heard in Dublin, 1st May—Richard Samuel White Hackett, of Ship-street, Liverpool and of Glasgow, and formerly of Plymouth; engrain in her Majesty's 24th Regiment.

The Hibernian United Service Club, Foster-place, Dublin, had an accession last year of 11 permanent members and 191 temporary. The entire number of members is 601. The receipts, including profit on wine, &c., amount to £2469. Expenses, £1802, including club-master's allowance, £800; secretary's salary, £75; newspapers, sheet-music, and stationery, £197.

Four officers of the 16th Regiment were fined 2s. 6d. each, at College-street Office, Dublin, on Thursday, for being disorderly the night before in Clarendon-street.

The officers of the 6th Inniskilling Dragoons have recently caused to be erected in Rubbesford Church, near Bewdley, an appropriate and beautifully-executed monumental tablet, as a tribute of their affectionate esteem for the memory of Francis Edward Winnington Ingram, late a captain in that regiment, and eldest son of the Rev. Edward Winnington Ingram, canon of Worcester Cathedral, whose premature and much-lamented death took place in January, 1843. The design of this monument consists of a military figure of Victory, mounted by a canopy of the same metal, the whole richly engraved upon a slab of Purbeck marble.

The appointment of Masters of the Royal Navy to Greenwich Hospital is an arrangement which reflects much credit on the Government; and we trust that the consideration of the Lords Commissioners will now be directed to the claims of the officers of the Royal Marines, who, as they have fought and bled in the same field of glory, are justly entitled to the rewards bestowed on their companions in arms.

The Hecate and Stromboli have sailed from Tarbert. The Fox and Flamer are lying at Tarbert.

The body of the late Lieutenant-Commander Nicholls, of the Dwarf, has not yet been discovered.

DEAL NAVAL HOSPITAL.—This splendid building, which has been so long unoccupied (except one ward, which has been used by the men belonging to the coast guard), will, it is expected, be shortly appropriated to the reception of the men belonging to the army and navy. A gentleman has been down to survey and make a report, which, we hear, is highly favourable.

The Vernon, 50, frigate, Captain Walpole, arrived at Spithead on Tuesday morning, from Lisbon and the Mediterranean. It is not intended that she shall be paid off directly; she will be kept ready for ea service.

By private letters by the Dee we learn that the Cambrian sloops, Ringdove, Commander Sir W. Daniell, Kt.; Albatross, Commander R. Yorke; and Wasp, Commander Henry Bagot, were the force to be detached from the squadron under Sir C. Adam, for service on the coast of Africa. They were all at Barbadoes on the 1st ult, whence they sailed to Bermuda, whence, after a refit, they were to make the best of their way to the Island of Ascension, and be under the orders of Captain Jones, of the Penelope, steam-frigate.

The Scylla, 16, Commander H. Sharpe, left Bermuda on the 23rd ultimo, for Hx.

The Spartan, 36, Captain Hon. C. J. G. B. Elliott, was on her way from Carthagena to Port-au-Prince.

The Cambrian, 28, Commander Maclean, was ready to sail from Jamaica when the Dee left, with the 60th Regiment, to Halifax and Quebec.

The Griffon, 3, brigantine, Lieutenant-Commander Jenkins, was at St. Jean de Nicaragua.

Our accounts state that there was some sickness on board the Hermes, steamsloop, Lieutenant-Commander W. Carr, which vessel, with the Imaum, 72, receiving-ship, Commander Sharpe, C.B., were the only men of war left at Port Royal.

APPOINTMENTS.—Assistant-Surgeons—James Fisher (1840), to the Camperdown; James A. S. Addison, M.D. (1837), additional of the St. Vincent; G. H. Ryan (1842), of Haslar Hospital; and W. H. Bent (1840), additional of the Caledonia (additional) to the Illustrious, for service in the West Indies.

The Black Eagle, steam-yacht, Master-Commander B. Cook, with Right Hon. H. T. L. Corry and Hon. Sidney Herbert, has left Cork for Dublin.

SHIPPING INTELLIGENCE.

NARROW ESCAPE.—Between 12 and 1 o'clock on Friday night week, a Dutch East Indiaman ran foul of one of the Brighton mackerel boats, about twenty eight miles off Shoreham, and carried away her mainmast, mizenmast, mainyard, and her two lanterns. There were five persons in the boat, viz., J. Miles (master), and three other men, and a boy. Immediately the boat was struck Miles sprang to the Dutch vessel, and succeeded in getting hold of the bowsprit shrouds, and in a few minutes he was safe on board the Indiaman. He requested the captain to tack about and lower the ship's boat to save his companions, but the captain refused to do either one or the other, and poor Miles sailed away with a heavy heart for the fate of his companions, fully expecting the whole of them had perished. He was put on shore at Hastings on Saturday morning, and about six o'clock in the evening he arrived at Brighton with the news that the boat had been run down, and his companions lost. The greatest consternation prevailed among the fishermen on the beach the whole evening. About eleven o'clock, however, their grief was turned to joy by the unexpected appearance with their missing companions, followed by a pawnbroker's vessel, which they had rescued to save from sinking, and, by cramming tarpaulin into the holes produced by the collision, were enabled to get safe ashore. The name of the bark which struck the boat was the Gothen, Jacob Calderbeg master, bound to Famburgh. Damage to the amount of between £30 and £40 was done to the fishing-boat.

FALMOUTH, April 8.—We have had an arrival off port of a vessel, the Sam Slick, from Buenos Ayres, and a small was loaded of January 26; but three days later advices having been received via France, those now received are fully anticipated.

W. ROLE'S INSOLVENCY.

NEWCASTLE.—It appears by the official returns from the Customs of this port, to Dec. 31, 1843, there were registered at that Custom House 1360 vessels, 271,879 tons, and 14,361 men, being an increase, as compared with the preceding year, of eight vessels, 3232 tons, and 446 men.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

(Before Mr. Commissioner Evans.)

W. ROLE'S INSOLVENCY.

In this case the insolvent described himself as secretary and treasurer of the West Middlesex Assurance and Annuity Company, and applied, under the new act, for his interim order. His schedule exhibited debts and liabilities to the amount of £30,773, and he stated a deficiency of £17,077, as due to him from the trustees of the company, being for money lent to, and paid on, their account, secured by bond. This debt is returned as good.—Mr. Byng, solicitor, said he attended to oppose the insolvent, but it appeared Hole had not come forward. The insolvent's only object in filing his petition was to avail himself of the protection afforded by the Court, and defeat the object of his creditors. He (Mr. Byng) was fully prepared, had the case been gone into, to show the system of fraud carried on by the insolvent.—Mr. Commissioner Evans remarked, that the act was one of the most unmanageable ever passed, and he had no doubt that in many instances it was very advantageous to the insolvent.—Mr. Simpson, barrister, applied on behalf of the creditor, for the Court to make an order directed to the registrar, requiring an explanation from the insolvent of his non-appearance to-day before he was allowed to petition again.—Mr. Commissioner Evans said he thought it ought to be so.—The petition was then declared to be dismissed.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The above court met on Monday pursuant to adjournment. The Commissioners present were the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Kelly and Sir G. Marshall, the Sheriffs, Deputy Sheriffs, &c. There were 260 prisoners for trial.

Upon the court being opened, a conversation took place with regard to the admission of the public to the galleries of the court, and the illegality of demanding admission money.

The Recorder having addressed the Grand Jury, and the latter having retired, Mr. Under-Sheriff Anderton addressed the Recorder from the gallery, and said that although he had given directions that the doors of the galleries should be kept locked, some one had opened them, and several persons who were then in the gallery had informed him that they had paid money for their admission. The Recorder gave directions that the person who had received the money should be brought into the body of the court, and this was accordingly done. In answer to questions from the Recorder, this person said that he took the money under the authority of Mr. Dornton, "who stood at the galleries from the Sheriffs." The Recorder said there could be no doubt that he was taking the money at the peril of the person indicted. Mr. Under-Sheriff Anderton requested the court to give an order for the restitution of the money that had been received. The Recorder said he could not take upon himself to make such an order, but the parties who had paid it had their remedy. Mr. Under-Sheriff Anderton said he was informed that the doors of the galleries had been forced open by order of the Lord Mayor. It was impossible for the Sheriffs to keep order in the court if they were not prevented to adopt their own measures for that purpose. The Recorder thought it would be better not to enter into the matter any further at that moment, particularly as the Lord Mayor had left the court. All that could now be done was to place an officer in the gallery to preserve order, and the public would be admitted without interruption.

(Before the Recorder.)

On Wednesday Ann Elizabeth Earnshaw, aged 34, married, and Emma Rose, aged 20, single woman, were indicted, for stealing a silver knife, value 6s. 6d., the property of Mary Anne Rose. The circumstances under which the present and several other charges of a similar character were made against the prisoners having been very recently given in our police reports, it will be unnecessary to repeat them at any length on the present occasion. The prisoner Earnshaw, who is respectably connected, accompanied by the other woman named, had formed the habit of going to the shops of different jewellers and asking to look at various articles, such as watches, rings, &c., and taking that opportunity to steal any article that came in their way. In the present case they went to the shop of the prosecutrix, in Farringdon-street, and asked to look at some silver fruit knives. A great many were shown them, but they did not purchase any, and immediately on their leaving the shop a silver knife was missed. They were soon followed to a pawnbroker's shop and taken into custody, and upon Wells being searched, a silver knife was found in her possession, which the prosecutrix identified as her property, but it appeared that it had not been paid for. Several witnesses were called, who gave the prisoners an excellent character, and it was stated that Earnshaw was in the receipt of a considerable income, and that the other prisoner lived with her as a servant. The jury, after a short consultation, found them "Not Guilty" and convicted Wells, but at the same time recommended her to mercy.—The prisoners were then indicted for stealing two diamond rings, value £3 7s. 6d., the property of Thomas Hutchinson. The case was a similar description to the last, and the jury returned the same verdict; acquitting Earnshaw.—The prisoners were then charged with stealing a gold watch, value £30, the property of John Smith. The jury in this case found prisoners "Guilty."—The prisoners were then indicted for stealing a gold locket, the property of George Smith. The case was clearly made out, and the jury again returned a verdict of "Guilty," against both prisoners.—The Recorder sentenced them to be transported for seven years.

POLICE.

GUILDHALL.—Henry William Albert, a German, was finally examined at the Guildhall, charged with uttering two bills of exchange for 877 marcs banco and 878 marcs, knowing them to bear a forged indorsement, purporting to be that of Messrs. Bolte and Co., of Bremen, merchants. He was committed for trial.

FOREIGN PRISONER.—Joseph Gonzales was re-examined, charged with embezzling money, from the Boulogne steam-boat, under the command of Captain Tune, in September. The evidence previously taken brought home to the prisoner the passing of a 5l note as part of the money received, remitted from Calais at Boulogne to the Union Bank in London. The passing of three other notes by the prisoner was proved, but these formed part of a second parcel. He was again remanded.

CLERKENWELL.—William Burton Newnham, charged with the abduction of Miss Frances Louisa Worthum, was placed at the bar for further examination. Mr. Ballantine, on the part of Mrs. Worthum, attended, and stated that, since the prisoner was then again remanded, for the production of certain documentary evidence.

WOOLWICH.—ATTEMPTED MURDER.—George Moore, aged 20, was brought up in custody of Gladwin, of the detective force, 122 R, and charged before Mr. Jeremy, with having attempted to murder Eliza Arnold, aged 19, by cutting her throat with a knife. The offence was committed on Tuesday last, but the prisoner had eluded the officers until Gladwin apprehended him at Poplar. The prosecutrix, who appeared in a very exhausted state, deposed that she resided with her mother at Rope-yard Rails, Woolwich, and on Tuesday last, met the company with her for some months, but had been away for some time. On Wednesday last he called to see her. Having heard something of his conduct which she disapproved of, she treated him rather coolly, and he went away. He came to her at the door, and asked her if she had got a fresh young man, and she replied she had not, but she intended to give him up, as his conduct was very bad. She let him go out by at the door, and he went away, but returned in a few minutes —and on the door being opened by prosecutrix's mother, prisoner said he wanted to see Eliza. Prosecutrix went to speak to him, and he put his arm round her neck, and said, "Then, Eliza, you really mean to give me up?" She said she did; and in a moment after he drew a knife across her throat, and she fell backwards. Mrs. Arnold, the mother, deposed that when she answered the door to the prisoner, she invited him in, but he said he only wished to speak to Eliza. Prosecutrix went to the door, and in two or three minutes witness heard her call in a faint voice, "Oh, mother, mother!" Witness ran to the door, and her daughter fell into her arms, bleeding from a wound in the neck. Witness asked, "Oh, George, you have stabbed my girl." Prisoner made no reply, but walked away. Mr. Downe, surgeon, of Beresford-street, Woolwich, deposed he was called in to attend the prosecutrix, and found she had received a wound on the neck, under the left ear; it was two-and-a half inches in length, but not deep. The knife must have been blunt. It was a drawn cut. The prisoner was fully committed on the capital charge.

FALL FROM A WINDOW.—Mr. Higgs, the Coroner for Westminster, held an inquest on Wednesday at the Three Crowns, Richmond-street, Rupert-street, on the body of James Ingles, aged 35, a sailor, who lost his life on sunday night last by falling out of window. Deceased had been out on Easter Sunday, and returned home shortly after midnight in a state of intoxication. He scrambled up stairs to his room on the third floor, and at five o'clock in the morning he was found lying in the yard bathed in blood, which had flowed from a wound at the back of his head; he was quite dead. It was evident that deceased had fallen out of the staircase window on the second floor, mistaking it probably for the door in an attempt to get out again instead of going to bed. Verdict—Accidental Death.

THE WILLS FORGERY TRIALS.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.—THURSDAY.
OLD COURT.

Before Mr. Baron Gurney, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Maule.)

Shortly after ten o'clock, their lordships took their seats on the bench, and William Henry Barber, Joshua Fletcher, and Georgiana Dorey, were then placed at the bar for trial. The trial had been postponed from the previous day, at the request of the prisoners' counsel, owing to the absence of a material witness for the defence.

The Attorney-General, Mr. Clarkson, Mr. Bodkin, and Sir John Bayley, were the counsel for the prosecution.

Mr Wilkins and Mr. Parry appeared to defend Barber: Mr. Graves and Mr. Ballantine for Fletcher; Mr. Stone and Mr. Phinn for the Sanderses; Mr. James for Mrs. Dorey; and Mr. Doane to watch the case for Griffin.

Before the indictment was read over,

Mr. Wilkins said he had an application to make to the court, on behalf of the prisoner Barber. Although he had pledged himself not to challenge the jurors, he had now an affidavit which stated that justice could not be done to the prisoner unless he had a separate trial. In case the Court granted this, Barber would call the other prisoners as witnesses on his behalf, and their evidence would be very material to his defence.

Mr. Baron Gurney asked the Attorney-General whether he had any objection to the proposed course?

The Attorney-General could not consent to it, he believing that it would greatly embarrass the prosecution.

Mr. Parry (who was with Mr. Wilkins) referred to the trial of

MR. WILKINS, COUNSEL FOR BARBER.

MR. CLARKSON, COUNSEL FOR THE PROSECUTION.

Hardy and others, as affording a precedent for the application.

Mr. Baron Gurney said he thought the application could not be made as a matter of right.

After some discussion, the application was refused.

The indictment having been read over at length,

FRIDAY.

At a few minutes before ten o'clock the judges—Mr. Baron Gurney, Mr. Justice Williams, and Mr. Justice Maule—entered the court.

The names of the jurors having been called over,

Mr. William Smee, the chief accountant of the Bank of England, was called, and examined. He deposed to the transfer of certain Long Annuities referred to in the indictment.

After a number of other witnesses had been examined,

The Lord Mayor was called to prove that he had had no private interview with Mrs. Dorey at the Compter.

Several objections were then taken that the indictment had not been properly set out, but they were all overruled by the Court.

The case for the prosecution closed at half-past five o'clock.

We have given portraits of the three leading counsel in these important trials; there has seldom been a case which on both sides has called more legal talent and acuteness into exercise. But while the result is pending we would avoid expressing any opinion. A portrait and biography of the Attorney-General has been already given. This is probably the last case in which he will be engaged as the prosecutor for the Crown, as it is hourly expected he will accept the office of Chief Baron of the Exchequer. He is assisted in the prosecution by Mr. Clarkson, one of the most eminent of the criminal lawyers of the day. He is acute, energetic, and industrious; and, as a result of the combination of these qualities, successful. We believe that almost the whole of the task of collecting the evidence in these complicated cases has devolved upon him. Mr. Wilkins appears for the prisoner Barber. His name has not been so long before the public as that of Mr. Clarkson, but he is rapidly rising in his profession. Mr. Ballantine is retained for Fletcher. He is nearly related to the presiding magistrate of the Thames Police-office.

MR. BALLANTINE, COUNSEL FOR FLETCHER.

The Attorney-General rose to address the jury on behalf of the prosecution. He entreated the patient attention of the jury while he stated the facts which were necessary to enable them to understand the evidence which would be brought in support of this charge. The accusation was connected with an offence of a novel description, and it affected persons who had hitherto moved in good society, and maintained a creditable name. It would be idle to conceal that the matters to be brought before them had already been the subject of much publication, but he trusted that they would forget all that they had either heard or seen with reference to the transactions which were to be the subject of inquiry that day, and he had no doubt they would faithfully and fearlessly discharge their duty. The case was this. One of the prisoners was charged with publishing a forged bond, and the others were charged with being accessories before the fact. To speak in more popular language, the offence charged was that of procuring, by false and fraudulent means, the transfer of a sum of money from the unclaimed Stock which was transferred to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. He desired to state, with as much calmness and simplicity as possible, facts which would undoubtedly be proved in evidence, and he should abstain from any comments, except such as were necessary to enable the jury to understand the bearing of the entire case as respected the individuals charged.

The learned gentleman then proceeded, in his usual calm and temperate manner, to lay before the Court and the jury a succinct statement of the facts, which, as they have been so fully detailed during the several magisterial investigations at the Mansion House, it is unnecessary to repeat them here. Several witnesses were examined on behalf of the prosecution, but no new facts were elicited.

The Court at its rising adjourned until next day.

THE INDIAN MARRIAGE AT ST. MARTIN'S CHURCH.

This sacred edifice was on Tuesday last the theatre of one of the strangest scenes that has probably ever been witnessed within its walls, namely, the marriage of Alexander Cadotte, otherwise Not-cun-a-kam, or "the Strong Wind," interpreter of the Ojibbeway Indians, now in the metropolis, to Miss Sarah Haynes, aged 18, daughter of Mr. Haynes, a respectable carver and gilder, residing in Great George-street, Hampstead-road.

In order to prevent public curiosity as much as possible from making the sacred ceremony a mere sight, Mr. Rankin, with very good taste, had arranged that the marriage should take place at the early hour of nine o'clock. His precautions, however, were ineffectual; for long before that hour not only were the windows and balconies of every house in George-street (where the Indians reside) filled, but the street itself crowded by hundreds of people anxious to catch a glimpse of this singular bridal party. The Indians themselves occupied a spring carriage drawn by four horses, in which also rode Mr. Anderson, the manager and secretary of Mr. Rankin, Mr. Hughes and Mr. Hind, also in the service of that gentleman. The remainder of the party, including the bride and bridegroom, Mr. and Mrs. Haynes (the parents), and a sister of the bride, together with Mr. Rankin, occupied four private carriages. On arriving at St. Martin's church, the whole of the steps and large area under its noble portico was so densely crowded that it was with the greatest difficulty a strong body of the A division of police could obtain an opening for the wedding procession. Indeed there could not have been fewer than from 2000 to 3000 persons assembled. As early as seven o'clock in the morning, indeed, so great was the anxiety of the public to view this unprecedented union, that a large concourse of persons, the greatest portion of whom seemed to be of a superior rank in society, had assembled to obtain admission to the church, and long before the hour appointed for the ceremony the sacred building was crowded. The officiating clergyman, the Rev. Septimus Ramsay, took his seat by the altar precisely at nine o'clock, and at half-past nine o'clock the tinkling of the Indians' bells, and the buzz of the crowd without announced the arrival of the party at the church porch. At this moment curiosity was so intense that the usual decorum observed in a place of worship was simultaneously, though unintentionally, forgotten, the whole of the spectators rising on the seats. The first to enter the aisle, accompanied by a young gentleman, one of the wedding party, was "the Boy Chief, aged 75, Ah-que-we-zainte," attired in his full Indian dress, wearing a large wedding favour with streamers from the left side of his head and breast. He was followed by "The Diving Cloud," war chief, aged 51, "Pat-an-ba-quotta-wee-be," accompanied by a youthful associate, the chief attired in his full war costume and wedding favours, "The Flying Gull." We-nish-ka-wee-be, and Mr. Sanders, a friend of the bride's father; "The Moonlight Night," Gush-wee-kush-e-ghee, and Mr. Hughes; "Tobacco-sah-ma," and Mr. Anderson; and lastly, "The Squaw of the Moonlight Night," Wos-see-ah-e-neuh-qua, accompanied by Mr. Rankin.

They walked up the aisle in pairs, and, on their arrival at the communion-table, they were ranged on either side by the verger. As the Indians walked up the aisle in the order described, their dignified demeanour and placid appearance were the theme of general admiration, and though one of the attendants on them assured the reporter that they had never entered a Christian church before, they exhibited throughout the entire ceremony a devotional observance of all that passed around them that spoke much in their favour.

Two or three minutes elapsed, and expectation was at the greatest stretch, when the bridesmaids, Miss Emma Haynes (sister to the bride) and Miss Edmonds, accompanied by two other ladies, attired in white, approached the communion, followed by the father and mother of the bride, with the happy couple. The bride presented a most interesting appearance. She is a delicate-looking young lady, of pale complexion, with dark hair. She was attired in flowing white, with a veil which reached from a wreath of orange blossoms encircling her hair, to the bottom of her dress. The bridegroom was habited in a robe of blue cloth, handsomely trimmed with shells and Indian needlework round the neck, arms, and edges. He also wore a rich head dress, but somewhat different from those worn by the Indians, and over his surcoat a scarlet shawl of the brightest colour, and his feet were clothed with a pair of moccasins, presented to him by the war chief, adorned with the most curious needlework, made of the skin of the moose deer. On taking his place at the rails of the communion he divested himself of his head dress and shawl, and handed them to Mr. Anderson, and, having gracefully placed his intended bride on his left hand, the clergyman proceeded to unite them in bonds indissoluble. The anxiety of the spectators to catch a glimpse of the features of the wedding pair, more especially the bride when she unveiled, cannot be described. During the performance of the ceremony, the bridegroom answered the responses in a low tone of voice, though, as it would seem, with the greatest solemnity of manner. The same observance was given on the part of the bride, and when the clergyman came to the words, "Wilt thou take this man to be thy wedded husband," &c.? she answered, "I will," with an emphasis that appeared to show how thoroughly she understood the nature of the obligation she was taking on herself. The father, Mr. Haynes, gave his daughter away, and, at the conclusion of the ceremony, which was performed throughout by the Rev. Mr. Ramsay, with an earnestness rarely heard on similar occasions, the rev. gentleman cordially shook hands with the new man and wife, and the bridegroom instantly, and with much grace, imprinted on the lips of his bride, in the presence of the entire congregation, the hymeneal salute. The entire proceeding was characterised by an interest almost without parallel in the annals of wedlock, and the requisite forms and signatures having been gone through in the vestry, the wedding cortège took their departure in the order they entered

The intention of Cadotte (who is a half-caste, his father being a French Canadian, who was confidentially employed at the period of the late war, and his mother, a full-blooded Indian woman) is, after having completed their arrangements in this country, to return to his own soil, accompanied by his wife, to whom he has, contrary to the usual customs of the Indian nation, promised to devote himself entirely. On quitting the church the crowd, who were unable to obtain admission, set up a loud cheer as the bridal party entered their respective carriages, and the curiosity of the public was so great to catch a glimpse of the married couple that it was with the greatest difficulty the police were enabled to clear the way for their progress homewards, where a breakfast for a large number of friends had been provided.

COLONEL STODDART AND CAPTAIN CONOLLY.

Captain Grover has received Dr. Wolff's journal up to the 6th of February. He left Tabris on the 30th of January, and after a perilous and painful journey, reached Teheran in perfect health on the 4th of February. Fifty-six miles from Teheran he was obliged to write to Colonel Sheil, petitioning that five horses might be sent to his assistance. Colonel Sheil instantly sent the required horses, and wrote in the kindest terms, inviting the Doctor to take up his quarters at the British Embassy, and promising every assistance. The Doctor says—"Could anything be more kind than this? He (Colonel Sheil) has also detained in his house Mesheede Rajah, who was three years servant to Colonel Stoddart, and by whom he (Mesheede Rajah) was sent to Cabul. He had been imprisoned at Bokhara. I have taken him into my service, and he is to accompany me to Bokhara in about ten days time. I have met with the greatest kindness and hospitality from Colonel Sheil and the gentlemen attached to the Embassy, and I wish this to be understood in the strictest sense of the word."

Dr. Wolff further says—"Colonel Sheil told me that he had seen the Ambassador from Bokhara, who told him that he did not believe that Colonel Stoddart and Captain Conolly had been killed, but that they were kept in prison."

Doctor Wolff had seen Count de Medem, the Russian Envoy, and received from him an account of his interview with the Ambassador, which differed but litt e from that published some time ago in the papers. The Doctor has not been to visit the Bokhara Ambassador, as he wishes previously to be presented to the King of Persia.

Dr. Wolff says Colonel Stoddart's servant told him "that people had been frequently detained for five years in prison at Bokhara, and believed by all the inhabitants to have been killed, and then suddenly had made their appearance again."

The Doctor then says—"So much is certain, that no one at Bokhara has witnessed the execution of Stoddart or Conolly; and my determination, therefore, of going straight to Bokhara is unshaken and unabated. I shall now begin to draw money on Drummond's in good earnest, for I must appear respectably at Bokhara as the great Mullah from England described by the Sultan and the Sheik-el-Islam; but as the Mullahs among the Mahommedans live with great simplicity, I shall do the same. I shall not neglect to make search for the other British officers at and near Bokhara, and every sepoy I might pick up."

The King of Persia evinces the kindest zeal: he has already written to the Ameer of Bokhara, claiming these unfortunate men, as British officers of distinction, and urging the Ameer to send them immediately to Tehrean, with all the honours due to their exalted rank. His Majesty has also ordered a Mehmandah to accompany Dr. Wolff to the Bokhara territory.

Such is the result of the powerful aid so kindly afforded by the Earl of Aberdeen: without that aid Dr. Wolff never could have reached Teheran; and we may now confidently expect that the fate of these officers will not long remain a mystery.

The Tartarus, steam-ship, Commander Wolfe, R.N., is now engaged in the survey of Hanly Bay.

NARROW ESCAPE OF A STEAMER.—On Friday last the steamer St. Columb left Glasgow for Londonderry; after landing some passengers at Campbeltown, she left that port about five o'clock, p.m., and proceeded along shore on her voyage. About half-past seven, the weather being very hazy, she struck on a sunken rock near the Sanda Isle. The passengers were thrown into the greatest consternation, and much noise and confusion prevailed. The captain proceeded to back her off, but the crew, remembering the fate of the Pegasus, remonstrated, and prevailed on him to keep his engines slowly going, to keep the vessel on the rock, lest he should surge off, and sink in deep water, there being seven and a half fathom water astern, while her bow was on the rock. The small boat was then lowered to convey the passengers and crew to Sheep Isle, about ten minutes' pull distant. This was a tedious operation, as she could only take eight or nine persons at once, while there were in all about seventy souls on board. The females and children were first sent off, and afterwards the rest of the passengers and the crew, and all were safely landed on the islet, some of them, however, drenched to the middle in landing. Here they passed a most uncomfortable night, without fire, shelter, provisions, or change of raiment. Next day they obtained some provisions from the steamer, which allayed their hunger a little. In the course of the forenoon the whole party were ferried over to the island of Sanda on which there is a farm-steading, where some shelter and scanty refreshments were received. During the day the steamer St. Kieran came to their relief. She lightened the St. Columb, towed her off the rock, and taking all her passengers from the island, conveyed them back to Campbeltown. The St. Columb, which does not appear to have received great injury, returned to Greenock, and subsequently, we are told, to Glasgow, for repairs. Among the passengers by the St. Columb, there was a Captain Tilden of the Marines, with his lady and family, and a party of thirty marines. The conduct of this lady is very highly spoken of.

EMIGRATION TO SYDNEY.

TOWING OUT.

THE EMIGRANT SHIP.

Thou semblance of the Angel Death,
With thy dark dismal shrouding wings,
Whose fluttering seems to catch the breath,
The very latest breath that wrings
The soul from body, thou art there
Like Hope half soothing wild Despair!

In thee is promise that thou'lt bring
A change of season to the mind
Of those who chance a distant spring
For the dull wintry waste behind!
Yet—what's the wintry waste they leave?
Alas! all hearts with theirs must grieve!

They quit their Native Land for life,
A land they'll weep for when away,
Sister and Brother—Husband—Wife
May never meet another day!
The living Death of absence, quite
Obscures the gloom of endless night!

Perchance to some hope will be true
And lead them on to riches—fame—
But all they lov'd, and all they knew
Is in early days, just like a name
Upon a tombstone will appear,
And mem'ry vainly wish them near

Some may return with pow'r to bless
The weeping wretches left behind—
And see that home all loneliness
Where they expected them to find!
The son for mother look in vain,
Then, seek the wide—wide world again!

The signal's given—away to shore—
Break ties of every dearest kind!—
One parting kiss—one look—one more
Farewell to those now left behind!
Divorcer Ocean! thou dost make
Many a gentle heart to ache!

Oh! Emigration! thou'rt the curse
Of our once happy nation's race!
Cannot our Fatherland still nurse
Its offspring without taking place
Of dislocated men to make
More cause for thy disturbing sake?

Thou art an enemy to peace,
Thy restless hope but ends in grief—
Where comforts in the mother cease
How can we hope step-dame's relief? *
"Better to bear the ills we have'
Than seek in foreign climes a grave!

W.

* "Dulcior mater quam noverca!" is a maxim which it ought to be our native land's endeavour to instil into the minds of those discontented with home.

It will no doubt be in the recollection of our readers that a Government grant was made to assist families and single men, agricultural labourers, shepherds, carpenters, smiths, wheelwrights, bricklayers and masons, being of good character, to emigrate to Australia, limiting the number, we believe, to five thousand. Amongst these were to be included a certain portion of single women and girls, between eighteen and thirty years of age, who had been in domestic or farm service. Her Majesty's Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners entrusted this important undertaking to Messrs. Carter and Bonus, of Leadenhall-street, who have been engaged for several years in the management of emigration to Australia, Canada, &c., and from what we have witnessed, it could not well be in better hands. The trust is certainly most onerous as it respects the selection of individuals to be sent out, for it must be obvious to every one that the future well-being and respectability of the colony mainly depends upon the good conduct of the working classes. There is, perhaps, something extremely melancholy at the idea of quitting our native land—perhaps for ever; the ties of kindred, the bonds of locality, cling round the heart, and true it is that absence only serves to strengthen the links that unite us to HOME; for in whatever part of the world an Englishman may be, he still looks with ardent affection and longing desire to the spot of his nativity. But with all these feelings, dear and precious as they are on second consideration, there is not so much to excite painful sensations in emigration as at first there seems to be. A large field is opened for skill and industry; there is a prospect of gaining a competency which promises a "welcome return;" and unhappily there exists in England so much real distress, that anything in the shape of improving the condition must be grateful to the feelings. It is true the voyage is long, and no one who understands the nature of the feeble elements but must be sensible of the many unpleasantnesses attendant upon a tedious passage in a crowded ship; but when these are overcome, and there is health and strength, and a willingness to labour, they are soon forgotten in the quiet of occupation on shore.

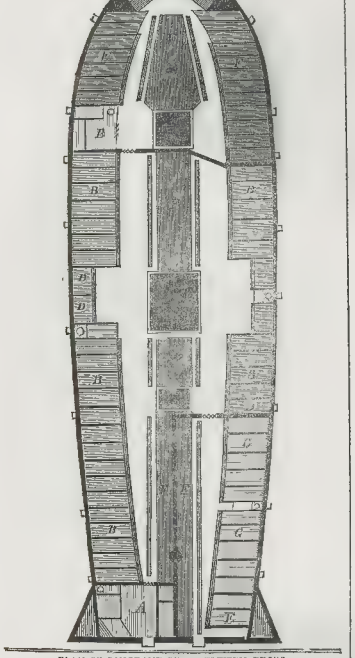
Several emigrant ships, under the direction of Messrs. Carter and Bonus, and superintended on the part of the Commissioners by Lieutenant Lean, of the Royal Navy, have already sailed—some for Sydney and others for Port Philip—and on Monday, one hundred and sixty-five souls, men, women, and children, embarked from the depôt at Deptford, on board the St. Vincent, Captain John Young, of 629 tons (registered), preparatory to sailing on the following day for Plymouth, where she will receive all who may be assembled there from the western part of England; from thence she will proceed to Cork, and take in emigrants from Ireland, quitting the last-mentioned port on the 16th of April, for Sydney.

The ships are expressly fitted out for the purpose in the London Docks, where an active and intelligent agent is in constant attendance, and persons desirous of obtaining the advantages of a free passage must address a letter to Messrs. Carter and Bonus, stating their name, age, and calling; whether married or single; and if married, the number of children. The name and address of the clergyman of the parish must also be forwarded; the period on which they will be ready to embark, and to which port of the two they are desirous of going. An answer is returned to the eligibility of the applicants, and if they are accepted under the bounty, a statement of terms for passage is given. Printed forms of application and testimonials are forwarded by the agents, which must be sent back for approval, together with a deposit of £1 for each adult, and 10s. for each child between one and 14 years of age, in payment for bedding (comprising a new mattress, bolsters, blankets, and coverlids), a small box, fifteen inches square, for clothes, a knife and fork, two spoons, a metal plate, and a drinking-mug—all of which become the property of the emigrants on their arrival at the colony. They have also the free use of water-breakers, and many necessary culinary articles. In the event of a passage not being granted, the deposit is returned. On being accepted, every male must provide himself with two suits of outside clothing, two pairs of strong boots or shoes, eight shirts, six pairs of worsted stockings, three towels, &c.; and each female, besides outward garments, must possess a cloak and a bonnet. Those who desire comfort will also supply themselves with sheets and many little articles or essential use.

The between decks of the St. Vincent are 124 feet in length, the breadth at the main hatchway twenty-five feet three inches, the height from the deck that is walked upon to the deck overhead six feet four inches. From the stern of the ship right away to the stem on the larboard side, and back again to the stern on the starboard side, the space is entirely occupied by a double tier (one above the other) of standing bed places, &c., according to the annexed plan.



PLAN OF EMIGRANT SHIP; BETWEEN DECKS.

A. The hospital for females, fitted up with six bed-places (one of which is prepared and devoted to accouchements), and containing necessary conveniences.
B. The hospital for males, with four bed places, &c.
Between A and B are forty-eight bed places, six feet by three each, for married people above, and for their children below, every one furnished with bedding, pegs on which to suspend their clothes being placed to every upright stanchion, and each bed place divided from the next adjacent by stout planks from the deck below to the deck above. From the men's hospital (B) a bulkhead goes across the ship to separate that part of the vessel forward which is appropriated to single men and youths, whose bed places range from the hospital (B) round the bows to the termination of the bulkhead on the starboard side at C. Of these the number is forty-six, and as every one sleeps alone they are six feet by two. Between C and D are twenty-four bed places for married people (as on the opposite side), a bulkhead then goes half way across the deck, and runs to midships to the stern, enclosing the apartment of the single females to F, and containing twenty-four bed places, each six feet by three, as two are required to sleep together.
FF are tables, the entire length of the ship, with fixed seats on each side of them, and beneath which are plate-racks and battens to hold the breakers (small casks) containing the daily allowance of fresh water, and hanging shelves are arranged for the females. Seats are also fixed at the outer extremity of every bed-place. The narrow interstices on either side are water-closets for females alone, as those for the men are upon the upper deck. It will be seen that the sleeping boxes are all athwart-ships, except the main hatchway (in the middle of the plan), where they are placed fore and aft, to afford more room. Numerous counties admit light and air, and the bulkheads are so constructed as to allow a free circulation of the breeze from windsails, &c.

Thus it will be considered that the single women have an enclosed apartment to themselves, and so have the single men—one abaft and the other forward; the married couples filling up the intermediate space.

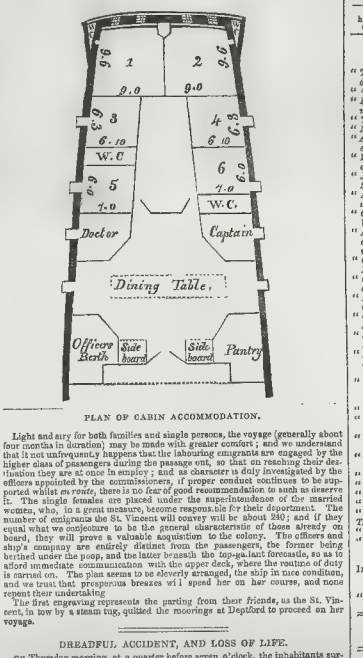
The depôt at Deptford is close to the main entrance of the Royal Dockyard. It is a building fitted up and arranged with bed-places, bedding, &c., in distinct apartments, separating the married from the single, and a large dining hall, where the emigrants get their meals. Here they continue collecting between the periods of sailing of the respective ships, and all are expected to be present two days before the day of embarkation. Provisions are supplied (which are paid for by themselves or by the parishes which send them), and are of very good quality.

On Monday (as we have already stated) the St. Vincent received her living freight on board from the depôt, and they were immediately counted off into messes of eight or ten each, and victualled for the day. It was between one and two o'clock that we witnessed the spectacle of taking the first meal (good mutton, beef, potatoes, and soup), and it certainly was a most interesting scene. The married people were very decently attired, though not so much so as the single, for in several instances, amongst the latter, both male and female, there were indications of gentility in dress and manners that caused surprise. Many had travelled a long distance to the depôt, and most of them had never before seen a ship; yet there was a display of cheerfulness that was remarkable—as if their minds were made up for whatever might befall, or that the novelty of their situation had produced an excitement which cheered them in the hour of parting from their own home, shores, and the friends they loved. Mothers were sitting giving nourishment to their infants—but they had their husbands with them; children were eating or playing, but they were not separated from their parents; and in no instance was a saddened countenance to be seen amongst them, and perhaps a more lively and happy set of boys and girls could not well be found. The principal portion of the single men and youths were also fine athletic fellows, generally well dressed, for their station, and apparently full of spirits for the enterprise.

The apartment of the unmarried females was rather dark, on account of the scuttles being shaded by the ship alongside of which the St. Vincent was lying, but still there was light enough to show several really handsome countenances and good figures, particularly four or five, whose departure from Old England seemed to cost a reflection upon the bachelors they left behind—really some pleased to be sorrowful, and she was in mourning. If there is any gallantry at Sydney, where, it is stated, there are 15,000 males, and not more than between 2000 and 4000 females, many that we beheld cannot be long after their arrival without husbands. There was not the remotest indication of want or pauperism amongst the whole. One married woman, extremely handsome, was rather elegantly arrayed; she was tall and graceful, and her fashionable apparel set off her figure to great advantage; her husband, a quiet, inoffensive-looking man, habited as a mechanic, but very neat and clean, had a cast of reflective thought upon his countenance as he sat near to her, contemplating the surrounding objects, and occasionally glancing at his wife with solicitude and anxiety. Here was ample scope for the speculative mind; but what their former history was there was neither time to inquire, nor would it have been delicate to have questioned if there had been opportunity. One of the cleverest marine artists in the kingdom being in company, he took the preceding sketch of the dimer scene in a midships—the space occupied by the married people.

Having thus far briefly described what we witnessed, we now give the following statement of weekly allowance, made to each adult during the voyage:—children being victualled at one half the scale, and of course the provision is served out in proportions daily:—4½ lb. of bread, 1 lb. beef, 1½ lb. of pork, 1 lb. preserved meat, 1½ lb. flour, ½ lb. raisins, 6 oz. suet, 1 pint of peas, ½ lb of rice, ½ lb. preserved potatoes, 1 oz. tea, 1½ oz. roasted coffee, ¾ lb. of sugar, 6 oz. of butter, 5 gallons and 1 quart of water, 1 gill pickled cabbage, ½ gill of vinegar, 2 oz. salt. This, taken singly, is adequate food, but when united in messes (say of ten) where appetites are not equal, is certainly not bad living, and we have not heard any complaints against the respectable agents on account of the quality of the victuals supplied. After the emigrants have arrived in the colony, they are allowed ten days free access to the ship, with all its advantages, should they not be hired or obtain employ before the expiration of that time.

The St. Vincent appears to be a fine vessel, well found, and may the Almighty prosper her voyage! Besides the passengers in the between-decks, there is also accommodation for cabin emigrants of a superior station in life, who, as a matter of course, defray their own expenses, and we give the plan of the various compartments beneath the poop.



PLAN OF CABIN ACCOMMODATION.

Light and airy for both families and single persons, the voyage (generally about four months in duration) may be made with greater comfort; and we understand that it not unfrequently happens that the labouring emigrants are engaged by the higher class of passengers during the passage out, so that on reaching their destination they are at once in employ; and as character is duly investigated by the officers appointed by the commissioners, if proper conduct continues to be supported whilst en route, there is no fear of good recommendation to such as deserve it. The single females are placed under the superintendence of the married women, who, in a great measure, become responsible for their deportment. The number of emigrants the St. Vincent will convey will be about 230; and if they equal what we conjecture to be the general characteristic of those already on board, they will prove a valuable acquisition to the colony. The officers and ship's company are entirely distinct from the passengers, the former being berthed under the poop, and the latter beneath the top-gallant forecastle, so as to afford immediate communication with the upper deck, where the routine of duty is carried on. The plan seems to be cleverly arranged, the ship in nice condition, and we trust that prosperous breezes will speed her on her course, and none repent their undertaking.

The first engraving represents the parting from their friends, as the St. Vincent, in tow by a steam tug, quitted the moorings at Deptford to proceed on her voyage.

DREADFUL ACCIDENT, AND LOSS OF LIFE.

On Thursday morning, at a quarter before seven o'clock, the inhabitants surrounding the neighbourhood of the Old Kent-road were alarmed by a sudden and loud noise, resembling that of an earthquake; and immediately persons were to be seen running in all directions towards the terminus of the new line of railway, the joint property of the London and Dover and London and Croydon Companies, where the air was literally filled with one dense cloud of dust. As soon as this had somewhat subsided, it was found that the iron roof in process of construction over the platforms intended for the reception of the luggage trains at that station, had given way, and had fallen in, burying beneath the ruins all the unfortunate workmen who happened to be employed underneath this erection. Messrs. Grissell and Peto are the contractors for erecting the whole of the necessary buildings at this terminus; but these gentlemen had contracted with Messrs. Fox and Henderson to construct the iron work. The roof was supported upon columns, at a width of 32 feet 6 inches, about 30 feet high, and the length fallen in seems to be about 200 feet. The roofing was constructed of iron principals, extending from side to side, resting upon the columns about four feet wide. These iron principals were covered with boarding, upon which was laid a strata of slates; and it is a curious circumstance that the injury terminated exactly at the place where the slaters were actually being employed, and left standing that part of the building where the slates had not yet been fixed. As soon as the accident occurred, the foreman of the works gave immediate directions that the window of the other labourers should be instantly set to work in removing the rubbish and fallen iron-work, which they did with great alacrity, when it was unfortunately discovered that two men, one a carpenter, the other a labourer, and awaiting for a great number were very seriously injured. Mr. Day, surgeon, of Cornbury-place, was immediately upon the spot, and rendered the most effective assistance to the wounded individuals, in which he was assisted by Mr. H. Jacobs, a country surgeon, who happened to be in the neighbourhood. Those who were most seriously injured were carried to the hospitals, some in cabs, and others placed on shutters, and conveyed to their respective dwellings. Thousands of persons were seen crowding to the spot from all directions, and the scene became one of the most appalling description; the wives and children of the workmen assembling, awaiting to ascertain whether their husbands or their fathers had become victims to the sad catastrophe. At eleven o'clock the removal of the rubbish had proceeded sufficiently far to ascertain with certainty that no more unfortunate individuals were buried beneath the ruins, although the most exaggerated reports were quickly put in circulation, such as that twelve or fourteen were killed, and forty or fifty wounded; but we are happy to have it in our power to contradict these statements, although the extent of the mischief has, notwithstanding, been extensive indeed.

Eight of these unfortunate individuals were taken to Guy's, and one to St. Thomas's, where the resident surgeons actively rendered them that temporary relief it was in their power to bestow.

The bodies of the two unfortunate men who were killed were carried, the one to the World Turned Upside Down, and the other to the Castle, to await the coroner's inquest.

"Nothing has occurred which need affect the intended opening of the Bricklayers' Arms station on the 1st of May next."

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844.

THE adjournment of Parliament has, of course, deprived political speculation of much of its usual interest. Still it has not been idle; there has been quite an agitation in the manufacturing districts, on the Factory Bill, and its provision for limiting the hours of labour. Public meetings have been held at Leeds and Bradford, at which Mr. Ferrand and Mr. Oastler have addressed the working people in speeches of rather strong language. The accommodating spirit of Lord Ashley, which led him to consent to the withdrawing of the bill, by the Government, has excited some misgivings as to his proceeding thoroughly with his measure in opposition to the Government. We believe these doubts to be entirely unfounded, and that the noble lord will only yield to the opinion of Parliament. Mr. Ferrand has on both occasions poured the most unmitigated abuse on the Government, of which, by his votes on general questions, he has been a supporter, if not a friend. Sir R. Peel is the "veriest humbug" of a statesman, and as for Sir James Graham, Mr. Ferrand can hardly find words sufficiently strong to express his antipathy to him. He says the Home Secretary is "too dead to the finer feelings of humanity, to think of anything but self;" he accuses him of procuring some official to make a "false report,"—that is to say that he made himself accessory to a lie, and he ascribes to him a "dogged stupidity." In the last charge he overshoots the mark, and throws discredit on all the others. We can imagine many who would believe some of the former charges, but cannot fancy any who would lend the least credence to the last. With some show of probability, Mr. Ferrand may accuse Sir James Graham of everything but "stupidity," but that charge totally fails. The universal impression is that the right honourable baronet is just the reverse of stupid, otherwise he would not be an object of active enmity either from Mr. Ferrand, or any one else. An unprincipled man may be feared, but never a stupid one; thus there are some charges that carry with them their own refutation. Mr. Oastler's addresses evince more feeling and better taste.

The other topic of the week has been the death of Lord Abinger, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer. He expired after a few days' illness, which struck him while entertaining the Magistrates at dinner at Bury St. Edmund's, where he was presiding as the judge on circuit. There has been considerable speculation as to who would be his successor, but general report gave his place to Sir F. Pollock, the Attorney-General. Sir W. Follett, one of the first lawyers of the age, and a most popular man with all parties, from his amiable and engaging manners, will of course be made Attorney-General. There then remains the post of Solicitor-General to be contended for by the legal aspirants for office under the Tory Government. The candidate most likely to carry off the prize is Mr. Fitzroy Kelly, who is known both in Parliament and at the bar. Mr. Thesiger is also mentioned as having put in a claim to the distinction.

While on the subject of promotions and appointments, we may allude to the manner in which Sir R. Peel has disposed of the office of the Lord Lieutenantship of the Counties of Westmoreland and Cumberland, vacant by the death of the Earl of Lonsdale. The vacant post was claimed both by Sir James Graham and Lord Brougham, whose claims, especially that of the former, must have been difficult to have refused. They are both Conservatives, and let us hope by conviction, since they joined the party by conversion. Sir James serves it by regular enlistment; Lord Brougham is as yet only a volunteer. But the preference that might have been difficult to have awarded by merit, has been avoided by a simple but effective expedient—a resort to the hereditary instead of the elective principle. The place that was held by the Earl of Lonsdale has been given to the Earl of Lonsdale's son.

We have elsewhere alluded to the gratifying fact that the Three per Cent. Stocks are considered so valuable as a security as to be quoted at par. They have since risen to 100¾, and there is even a prospect of their being yet higher, as the usual amount of stock brought into the market is not sufficient for the demands of the Government Broker, purchasing on account of savings banks, &c. Thus, with holders of stock showing no disposition to throw it into the market, and with an abundance of purchasers desirous to invest, the phenomenon in a stock bearing so low a rate of interest is accounted for.

The holiday week of Easter has been marked by several deplorable accidents, attended, we are sorry to say, with a sad loss of life. On Thursday a dreadful catastrophe occurred at a station of the London and Dover Railway, by the falling in of a roof, when the shed was filled by workmen; two were killed and many more maimed and injured. The falling of a scaffolding in the Haymarket, on which several masons were at work, caused another infliction of human suffering most sad to contemplate. In both these cases it appears that a proper degree of attention to the state of the fabrics on and under which the men were called to work would have prevented the calamities that occurred. In the account of the accident in the Haymarket, it is stated that the rotten and unsound condition of the scaffold-poles had been the subject of remark among the unfortunate men themselves previous to the accident; by one of them it is even said that the occurrence of some such mishap was foretold. Is human life so valueless among us, that it should be recklessly exposed to needless casualties, from inattention to physical defects in the materials by which labour is carried on, that would disgrace a colony of beavers? It absolutely seems as if the most awful lessons were insufficient to teach men that they cannot violate physical laws with impunity. Pillars and beams, too weak to support the weight of a roof, will, at some time or other, infallibly fall, and crush those beneath—whether one or many—which is all a matter of chance. If scaffolds are made insecure, there is, assuredly, the risk that they will fall; and, again, it is a matter of uncertainty whether any, or how many, or how few, lives may be the sacrifice. A heavy responsibility rests on those who have the power to control these things, and who are guilty of what cannot be designated otherwise than as the crime of negligence.

It appears by the foreign news of the week, that the anxiety of the Papal Government with respect to the insurrectionary movements in the Papal States, has not at all diminished. The people are enraged at the perverse opposition exhibited by the Government to improvements of every kind, and it is only the power of Austria that keeps down open revolt. So deep is the feeling, that individuals engaged in the service of Austria have deserted it to join the insurgents. Two sons of Admiral Bandeira, both officers in the Austrian fleet, had absconded for the purpose of joining the insurgents at Corfu, who, it seems, contemplate rising in conjunction with the malcontents of Corfu. The revolt is entirely against the Pope as a temporal prince; it involves nothing against his spiritual authority. They protest against his policy as Governor of the State, not as head of the Church. If he ride out the storm, it will be more due to the fear of the bayonets of Austria than to any wisdom of his own.

The news from Spain is so far satisfactory that it certifies a cessation of that butchery and bloodshed which was making the nation the disgust of the world. Carthagena has yielded, but the surrender has not been followed up by that vengeance which Roncali inflicted at Alicant. The leaders of the insurrection escaped by sea, with the connivance of the political chief, and on the subordinates it appears that Roncali would not "waste his bullets." We are glad to perceive that Christina shows at least a leaning to "mercy's side." She is reported to be favourable to an extensive amnesty, one that will include all except Don Carlos. She is opposed by Narvaez, who insists on excepting Espartero and others. The Queen Regent evidently retains some respect for the exiled general. At Aranjuez she rebuked a poet, who presented her with a congratulatory ode, because he had in it called Espartero a traitor and a coward.

THE COURT AND HAUT TON.

Windsor.—Sunday.—The Queen and his Majesty the King of the Belgians, the ladies and gentlemen of the royal suite and the household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. Leslie Courtenay officiated. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians attended divine service in the Roman Catholic chapel on Clewer-green. Her Majesty was attended by her suite, and after the service returned to the Castle. In the afternoon her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians took a carriage airing. The Earl of Dunmore and Captain Francis Seymour arrived on Saturday on a visit to her Majesty.

Monday.—Her Majesty, accompanied by the Queen of the Belgians, took her accustomed early walk in the vicinity of the Castle. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians and suite again attended divine service at the Catholic Chapel at Clewer-green. Her Majesty the Queen of the Belgians took a carriage airing in the park. The Countess of Charlemont and the Hon Misses Paget and Liddell were in a pony phaeton. Major-General Wemyss was in attendance on horseback. The King of the Belgians, attended by Le Comte d'Arg walked with the Hon. C. A. Murray, rode to Spital in the afternoon to witness the Windsor steeplechases. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent gave a dinner party at Frogmore-house. There were present Her Majesty, the King and Queen of the Belgians, the Earl of Morton, the Countess of Charlemont, Lady Anne Maria Dawson, the Hon. Misses Liddell and Paget, Madame de Hoogvorst, Le Comte d'Arschot, Hons. Van de Weyer, Mons. de Meeûs-Berlin, Chapi Dumonceau, Major-General Wemyss, Colonel Sir George and Lady Couper, the Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay, and the Hon. C. A. Murray.

It is rumoured that Sir Frederick Pollock has been positively appointed Chief Baron of the Exchequer in the room of Lord Abinger deceased.

The Royal Nursery.—While her Majesty and Prince Albert are inhaling the genial and invigorating sea-breeze, and radiating at Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, the royal progeny will be domiciled at the picturesque seat at Eaglehurst, which has been selected as the marine residence of the royal infants. The stately tower of Eaglehurst is not far from Calshot Castle, in the Southampton river, commanding beautiful sea views in all directions, and is surrounded with rich plantations. It was formerly the seat of the Earl of Cawdor, and originally built by the late Temple Luttrell. The lofty tower of Eaglehurst is well known to seamen as "Luttrell's Folly."

Gosport, April 1.—His Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived here yesterday afternoon, at three o'clock, for the purpose of spending a few days only with his family after their recent severe affliction; but the Prince's stay in Germany is to be of very short duration, for the day after to-morrow he will leave this place, in company with his brother, for Coburg, on his return to London.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

Fatal Accident on the River.—On Tuesday evening, between eight and nine o'clock, a boat, in which were four young men and two females, was upset a short distance from the Thames Tunnel, and two of the men, named Roberts, aged 23, and James Green, aged 26, were drowned.

Accident in the Haymarket. On Wednesday a scaffold, on which four men were employed in renovating the north colonnade of the Italian Opera House, gave way and fell to the ground with an immense crash. When the poor fellows were rescued, they were all found to have received serious injury. Hugh O'Neill, fractured leg and bruises; Timothy Callaghan, concussion of the brain and fractured patilla of the right knee; Thomas Downing, compound fracture of the left leg, fractured patilla of the right knee, and concussion of the right knee; and John Power, a youth, much bruised. The first three lie in Charing-cross Hospital, in a dangerous state.

Serious Accident.—On Wednesday evening, between the hours of seven and eight o'clock, a poor lad fell from the shaft of a cart, which, passing over his chest and face, produced severe injury and laceration. He was taken in a state of total insensibility to the surgery of Mr. Edward Johnson, 42, Carnaby-street, Golden-square, by whom he was promptly and kindly attended; and, having been greatly relieved, was conveyed to the Middlesex Hospital, where there appears to be every chance of his doing well.

Singular Death from Lock Jaw.—On Wednesday evening an inquest was held before Mr Higgs, at the Red Lion, Francis-street, Tottenham-court-road, on view of the body of Arthur Pethor, aged 17 years. It appeared by the evidence that deceased was an artist, and resided at York Cottage, Battersea. On the 31st of March last he was amusing himself by splitting a piece of wood with a sledge hammer, when the handle broke short off at the iron head. In his endeavour subsequently to force out the piece of wood which was left in the iron, he accidentally bruised the little finger of his left hand. From that time he felt considerable pain, and sought the advice of Mr. Bolton, a surgeon, under whose care he continued until Sunday last, when the symptoms became so alarming that it was deemed advisable to remove him to the Westminster Hospital. Mr. Bowen, house surgeon, said deceased was admitted to the Hospital about eleven o'clock. He complained of a stiffness of his jaws. It was then evident that deceased was suffering from locked jaw. The means attended upon the deceased rapidly increased, and he died from its effects on Tuesday morning. Locked jaw was induced by the accident to the finger of deceased. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

Tight Lacing. On Monday an inquest was resumed by Mr. Wakley, at the Black Lion, Church-street, King's road, Chelsea, on the body of Caroline Kohle, aged 33 years, a native of Baden Baden, in Germany, and a governess in the family of the Rev. Charles Kingsley, rector of St. Luke's, Chelsea. During her residence at the rectory-house with Mr. Kingsley's family, she appeared in the enjoyment of the most excellent health, and at all times in high spirits. All that she had ever been heard to complain of being, that if she hurried up stairs her heart palpitated, and that she was full of desire to see her mother. On Sunday week she got up at the usual hour, and appeared in health and spirits. She breakfasted with the other servants, and was subsequently found by Anne Plummer, the housemaid, lying dead in Miss Kingsley's room, with her face to the floor, by the side of the bed, and her shoes off. Medical assistance was at once obtained, but was of no avail. Mr. R. C. Gardiner, surgeon, of 26, Cheyne-walk, Chelsea, stated that he had opened the body, which was in a perfectly healthy state, with the exception of a slight thickening of the membrane of the heart, which had been caused by the tight lacing of a pair of stays, which had produced curvature of the spine, and thrown the heart out of position. The practice of tight lacing by women was a most baneful practice. The system pursued at ladies' schools in this country was the most pernicious that could be conceived. Mr. Gardiner said he had never seen in England woman without some slight curvature of the spine. The coroner observed, that a few might be found amongst the dairymaids and the daughters of the older farmers in the country, who wore no stays. The jury immediately found a verdict of "Natural death."

Collision on the River.—On Monday night, at a late hour, a collision of a most serious character happened on the river, between Greenwich and Blackwall, by the Coquette steamer, the property of the Blackwall Company, and running into the schooner Hibernia, belonging to Guernsey, lying at anchor in Blackwall Reach. The steamer, which is iron built, plies between the Greenwich and Blackwall piers. She left the former at a quarter to nine o'clock, with about 150 passengers. The night was hazy. The first thing that attracted the attention of the passengers was those forward shouting out "There is something ahead." In an instant a collision took place, by the bow of the vessel striking amidships the Coquette, carrying away part of the larboard paddle-box and the paiform on which the captain was standing. The scene that followed the dreadful crash was one of a most agonising description. The cries of the women, and the loud cries for assistance, could be heard on each shore. The captain manifested much presence of mind, and implored the passengers to remain quiet, but for ten minutes he was unable to pacify them. At length the vessels were disentangled, and it having been ascertained that the hull of the steamer was not materially injured, she proceeded to Blackwall, where she arrived about half-past nine.

Fatal Accident at the Old Shades Pier.—On Monday night, at nine o'clock, the Fairy steamer from Greenwich, came up with a large freight of passengers to Old Shades Pier, London-bridge, and the vessel was just moored alongside, when Mr. Foster, the mate and money collector, jumped out in advance of the people on board, with his ticket-books in his hand, for the purpose of taking the fares of those persons who had not paid on board. In doing so he fell between the wharf and the vessel into the water, and was drowned.

Fire in Whitechapel.—On Tuesday afternoon a fire broke out in Colchester-buildings, Whitechapel, in a first floor, in which three or four children had been left during the absence of the mother. It appears that some lucifer matches had been put on the mantle shelf, adjoining to a cupboard which contained a quantity of hay. The children had got playing with them, and accidentally ignited the whole, and the place, in a short time was enveloped in flames. On the alarm being given it was found that an old lady, upwards of ninety years of age, who resided on the second floor, was in imminent danger, but owing to the immediate of some neighbours, she was rescued, and conveyed to a place of safety. The brigade was promptly in attendance, but the fire was extinguished before their arrival.

Fatal Affray at Horsledown.—On Tuesday evening, between the hours of six and seven, a quarrel ensued in front of the bar of the Coal-Smack public-house, Horsledown, between two per-ons of the names of Dan and Cornelius Fahey, which has resulted in the death of the former. From the few particulars that could be obtained, it appears that Dean, who was the son of a coalmeter, was standing in front of the bar, using obscene language, when Fahey remonstrated with him on his impropriety. This caused high words to pass between the parties, and from words they came to blows. They then retired into the street, where several rounds were fought; Dean, it seems, was severely beaten, or else he received some serious injury by being thrown down. Finding what state he was in, he immediately repaired to a neighbouring surgeon, who recommended him to go to the hospital. The poor fellow started off for that purpose, and had just reached the entrance of Guy's Hospital, when he was suddenly observed to stagger, and then fall to the ground. He was picked up in an insensible state, and carried into that institution, and the house surgeon was promptly in attendance; but he laboured, but in vain, to restore him to consciousness, the vital spark having for ever flown. Information of the melancholy occurrence was forwarded to the police, who apprehended Fahey on the same night, shortly after ten o'clock.

Miraculous Escape.—About half-past four o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, as the Queen, Greenwich steamer, which had embarked about four hundred persons on board, was clearing from London-bridge wharf, the swell of another steamer, the Sylph, which was passing, caused the Queen to roll considerably; many of the passengers shifted themselves on one side, and nearly upset the vessel; and but for the strength of mind of the captain, the vessel must have been upset, when the loss of life would have been frightful. Many of the passengers disembarked, almost frightened to death.

Extensive Robbery in Dublin.—Information has been received by the police in London, that on the 1st instant a lady was robbed, in George's-street, Dublin, of £207 10s. in Bank of Ireland notes, one £100 note, 36,166, July 13, 1843; one £50 note, 73,605, August 17th; two £20 notes, a £10, £5, and £1, and a 30s. note. An Englishman, who gave his name Henry Cohen, has been taken for the robbery; but it is stated that he contrived to pass the money to a companion, who escaped. Cohen is described as twenty-three years of age, of dark hair, middle height, and rather florid complexion, with scorbutic pimples, and wore a black frock coat, &c.

Fatal Accident.—On the evening of Monday last the following fatal accident occurred at Turnham-green, which is the third that has taken place in that neighbourhood within the last fortnight. Between seven and eight o'clock, as a man named John Shorey, eighty-five years of age, in the employ of Mr. Adams, of the Bricklayers Notting-hill, was proceeding along the high road, in the direction of town, just as he had passed the Park Horse inn, he fell off the top of the cart on which he was riding, when, before the horse could be stopped, the wheel passed across his chest. He was immediately picked up and carried into the house of a person named Hicks, where, although medical assistance was promptly obtained, he shortly afterwards expired. It was stated the deceased was in a state of intoxication at the time, as I had previously fallen off about a mile further up the road, when he was assisted by a lamplighter to resume his seat.

Thursday.—Her Majesty and the Queen of the Belgians took their accustomed walking exercise, and in the afternoon Her Majesty rode out in the Park in a pony phaeton. The King of the Belgians walked out in the royal pleasure grounds. The Hon. Misses Liddell and Paget left the Castle, and were succeeded by the Hon. Eleanor Stanley and the Hon. Clementina Hamilton as the Maids of Honour in Waiting on her Majesty. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent visited her Majesty and the King and Queen of the Belgians at the Castle during the afternoon. His Royal Highness Prince Albert, accompanied by his Serene Highness Prince Leiningen, and attended by Captain Francis Seymour (Groom in Waiting to his Royal Highness), and Mr. G. E. Anson (Secretary), arrived at the Castle at half-past six o'clock, having travelled from Paddington to Slough by the Great Western Railway. The Duchess of Kent, Lady Anne Maria Dawson, and Col. Sir G. Couper joined the royal dinner-party.

His Royal Highness Prince Albert arrived at Dover from Ostend at half-past two o'clock on Thursday. A guard of honour of the 95th and 77th depôts were drawn up on the Quay while the naval and military officers of the place were also in attendance. His Royal Highness landed under a salute from the guns of the Western Heights. The Prince, on stepping on shore, was received by Col. R. Jones Commandant of the garrison, who rode on horseback with his Royal Highness to the railway station. Here the Prince remained for a few minutes, and, while the train was getting ready, walked about the station, surveying the extensive works of the Dover terminus, in the company of Baron Stockmar, Colonel Wemyss, the Hon. Mr. Anson, and Colonel Jones. The Prince seemed in excellent health and spirits, and looked a little sunburnt. All having been got ready, the Prince entered the state carriage, and two others being filled by his suite, the train started at a quarter to three o'clock, amid the cheers of the populace, and under a parting royal salute from the garrison.

On Dits.—Rumours of Sir James Graham's early retirement from the Home Office are prominent in well-informed circles, in which they are also confirmed. The appointment of Sir James Graham to India, as successor to Lord Ellenborough, is revived in connect on with the report alluded to. Others refer the split from Lord Stanley's reported early retirement from the Home Office to some—partly because of the difficulty in which the Government has been placed by his unfortunate Factory Bills; but principally to the refusal of Sir R. Peel to recommend him to her Majesty for the Lord Lieutenancy of Cumberland, which has been conferred on Lord Lonsdale in conjunction with that of Westmoreland. It is affirmed that Sir James Graham was so confident of obtaining the Lord Lieutenancy of Cumberland, as to have spoken of his appointment as a matter all but determined on.—Globe.

By the death of Mr. Speer, one of the retired chief clerks of the Treasury, a pension of £70 per annum is saved to the public.

Police.—Marlborough street.—Lord Huntingtower summoned before Mr. Maltby a horse dealer, named Alexander, for using menacing language and for assaulting him. The dispute arose out of some pecuniary transactions, apparently of a trifling nature. The assault having been proved, the magistrate held the accused to bail, himself in £71.0 and two sureties in £50 each, to keep the peace for six months.

Queen-square. Extensive Robbery of Plate and Jewellery.—A youth named Thomas Pyott was placed at the bar for re-examination on a charge of being concerned in stealing plate and jewels to the amount of £186, from the residence of Major Shadwell Clerke, 4, Brompton-row, in whose service he had lately been as page, on the 29th ult. He was again remanded until Wednesday next.

Deptford.—Dickenson, the husband of the unfortunate lunatic who lately murdered her two children at Deptford, was found dead on Thursday morning, having hung himself to his bedpost. Before doing the deed he wrote letters to several friends, from which it plainly appears that his misfortunes had upset his reason. He appears to have swallowed poison previous to hanging himself, and a phial was found under his pillow.

Destruction of a Naphtha Distillery.—At a late hour on Thursday night considerable excitement prevailed amongst the inhabitants residing at Bow and Bromley, Middlesex, in consequence of the outbreak of an extensive fire on the premises forming the pitch, tar, and naphtha distillery, the property of Mr. Bethell, on Bromley-common, adjoining the new cut of the river Lea. The quantity of tar, naphtha, and spirit, in a state of manufacture on the premises, being very great, the fury of the fire was terrific, and frequent explosions taking place, led to a supposition that there was gunpowder in the place, but which, on inquiry, proved to have emanated from the bursting of the pitch and tar barrels, of which there still remained many in different parts. At the height of the fire it was fully expected that the flames would extend to the tar and pitch wells in the grounds connected with the works, wherein there were between 4000 and 5000 gallons of those inflammable liquids, and it was not without the most energetic exertions of the brigade men that they were prevented being fired. Within the hour of the discovery the whole of the premises and sheds were totally consumed, together with some outbuildings, where there were several carts and a pleasure waggons housed. It was not insured, the factory being of such a hazardous character.

Horrible Murder.—On Monday morning last the parish of Whitwell, Norfolk, was thrown into a state of excitement and consternation in consequence of a man generally accounted honest and respectable, named William Frost, having murdered four of his children in his cottage. He is a journeyman farmer, and has resided for Harnon, of Whitwell, for the last thirteen years. He had killed his three eldest children by beating them on the back of the heads with a large heavy hammer. The youngest, an infant, he put head first into a large earthen pan full of water. The murderer is only about thirty-six years of age, and he was taken into custody immediately after the horrible occurrence by Samuel Parker, an inspector of police, residing at Reepham. On the following morning the coroner arrived and held an inquest. The jury having assembled and been sworn, proceeded to the cottage to examine the bodies. After a good deal of evidence was adduced, the jury almost instantly returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against William Frost, the father of the children. The coroner having assured his warrant for the committal of the prisoner to the county gaol, to take his trial at the assizes next ensuing, he was conveyed to Norwich Castle by the police, singing psalms by the way. He has lately belonged to a new sect called the "Revivalists," and been very active among them as a preacher. Formerly he was a Methodist Ranting preacher. It is generally believed in Whitwell and the neighbourhood that he committed the above series of horrible murders on his own children under the influence of fanaticism.

FOREIGN.

The French Government, it is said, has determined on abolishing slavery in its colonies. A sum of two millions sterling is to be appropriated, in imitation of the English plan, in purchasing from the masters the liberty of their slaves. The plan is not yet matured, but we may expect to hear something decided on the subject before the close of the session.

America.—By the arrival at Liverpool on Thursday, of the St. George, from New York, whence she sailed on the 23rd ult., intelligence one day in advance of the previous arrival has been received.

When the former accounts left, the Senate was engaged in discussing the question whether the President should give notice to Great Britain that it was the desire of his Government to terminate the convention by which both countries hold joint possession of the Oregon territory—which oh, if carried, would have amounted to a threat on the part of the United States to seize the territory in dispute at all arms. The debate was marked on the part of some of the speakers by great acrimony towards this country. Mr. Buchanan was, as usual, foremost in his rancorous hostility, and in the course of his speech he asserted that the citizens of the United States were influenced by a deep seated hostility to England. The result of the division was favourable to the continuance of pacific relations. Twenty-eight to eighteen voted against the motion. The minority was composed exclusively of the democratic party; the majority consisted of twenty-five Whigs, and three supporters of Mr. Calhoun.

THE FIRE IN OXFORD-STREET.

DREADFUL FIRE IN OXFORD-STREET.

On Thursday night week, shortly before 12 o'clock, a fire, attended with great destruction of property, and fearful loss of life, broke out in the extensive range of premises belonging to Mr. Williams, 287, Oxford-street, the corner of Gilbert-street, and known as the Crown and Cannon, wine vaults. The building was four stories high, and had a considerable depth and frontage. The fire began in the counting-house, adjoining the bar, in which was deposited a large quantity of spirits.

Police constable 98 C, who was on duty near the spot, had his attention directed to the house by hearing a loud cry of "fire." Upon gaining the front of the building, he perceived that the counting-house was one complete burning mass. The officer immediately sprung his rattle, which brought assistance, and then started off to the various engine stations. At that time, three children were sleeping in the upper part of the building. There were also two female and three male servants in the place, as well as Mrs. Williams and her sister.

Such was the fury of the flames, that in a very few minutes they had extended to the bar, amongst the spirits, which, once on fire, spread with the most surprising rapidity up the staircase, to the upper apartments. The excitement which followed was the most painful to witness. At the second floor front, a young female, named Pritchley, made her appearance, and before sufficient time had elapsed to procure a ladder, she was compelled to throw herself to the ground, to escape suffocation; fortunately, the only injury she received was a few burns about the knees. By this time, the St. Marylebone parochial engine arrived, and was drawn in front of the blazing premises; and an abundant supply of water was flowing from the waterworks belonging to the Grand Junction, from which the engine was set to work. No sooner had the firemen got this engine into operation than one of the vats of spirits burst, and the liquor becoming ignited, the flames rushed through the windows with terrific violence, burning Mr. Bridge, the engineer, about the face very badly. The King-street brigade engine was the second to reach the spot, followed by others from Wells-street, Baker-street, the County station in Regent street, with the Chandos-street, Crown-street, and Holborn stations. The West of England fire brigade engine next reached the scene. As the engines arrived they were taken to the best positions, and were all set to work, those of the London Fire Establishment, under the direction of Mr. Fogo, the foreman of the district. By the time, however, they were got into full working play, the flames had reached nearly every room in the building, causing great apprehension for the safety of the contiguous buildings; in fact, it was feared that the whole of Grosvenor Market would have been destroyed. Three fire escapes, belonging to the Royal Society for the Protection of Life, were remarkably quick in arriving at the scene of conflagration. The fire continued to blaze most fiercely until a quarter past one o'clock.

At three o'clock, the firemen ascertained that Mrs. Williams and five other persons had perished in the flames; but, from the dreadfully blackened and mutilated state of the remains, it was hardly possible to recognise any traces of humanity.

The following are the names of the sufferers:—Mrs. Eliza Williams, Eliza Williams (between four and five years of age), William Williams, an infant in arms, Sarah Hudson, and Charlotte Fish, female servants, and the potboy, Jacob.

It appears that the premises had been but recently erected, and were fitted up by Mr. Williams in a most gorgeous style, and at a vast expense, for what is generally termed "a gin palace." The bar occupied nearly the whole of the ground-floor of the building, and was handsomely appointed. A number of large vats, supported by stone columns, extended almost to the second floor, and were well stocked with spirits of every description.

At the time of the alarm being first given, Mr. Williams was from home, he having left the premises in charge of two of his barmen, of the names of Charles Goodman and William Robinson. Mrs. Williams, with her two children, one of the age of four years and a half, named Eliza, the other named William, and aged about eight months, with the female domestics, one named Charlotte Fish, the other Sarah Hudson, and a sister of Mrs. Williams (Miss Pritchley), had retired to rest at the time. The other inmates were the porter, named Henry Parker, and Jacob, the potboy. It seems that some of the customers, of whom there were a great many standing in front of the bar, observed a body of flames to break out sudden by from the top of one of the gin vats, containing a large quantity of that spirit.

Many of the persons tendered their assistance, but before many seconds had elapsed, every soul was obliged to make a precipitate retreat into the street. The spirit in the vats ran over in a flaming stream, setting the whole of the bar, counting-house, and spirit stores in a general blaze.

The scene that followed was of the most heartrending character. It having been ascertained from the barman that his mistress with her two children and the rest of the domestics, were in the upper part of the building, the most bitter lamentations were raised, accompanied with loud cries of "For God's sake save them," and "Send for ladders." One or more humane persons volunteered to rush into the house to rescue them, but no sooner did they enter the premises than they were driven out by the heat of the blazing spirits, which poured forth from every quarter of the building, and ran down the pavement into the gutters and carriage-way in a river of fire.

The only person who was observed to leave the premises was the sister of the unfortunate Mrs. Williams, and she escaped from the counting-house window. Her preservation is considered truly miraculous, for she had hardly gained the pavement before the whole building, from the bar to the roof, became enwrapped in one complete vivid sheet of flame, whilst at the same moment the sky was illuminated to such an extent that the fire was discernable from all parts of the west of London.

THE INQUEST.

Shortly after four o'clock on Saturday, Mr. Higgs, Deputy-Coroner for Westminster, and a respectable jury, assembled at the Malpas Arms, Charles-street, Grosvenor-square, for the purpose of inquiring into the circumstances connected with the deaths of the unfortunate sufferers in the above calamitous fire. Several witnesses, after the jury had viewed the bodies, were examined. The appearance of each body was of a most fearful description, each of the unfortunate individuals being severely burned, and leaving on their bodies contusions and lacerations which occasioned involuntary shudders in all who beheld them. The first witness examined was police-constable William Fluke (98 C), who deposed to the facts connected with the calamity. It appeared that the constable on hearing the alarm given, immediately proceeded to call the engines; on the arrival of which, the premises were in flames. (A gentleman present observed that had the constable alarmed the inmates instead of proceeding so rapidly for the engines, some of them, at least, would be now alive) Police constable 83 C, and others having given their testimony, the inquiry concluded, and the coroner having made a few remarks, a verdict of "Accidental death," in accordance with the evidence, was returned. The cause of the fire was thus stated by Goodwin:—He had been pumping gin into a vat, when a considerable quantity overflowed; the gin, on his taking down the shutter, fell on the gas, and set light to the gin on the floor.

STRELITZIA REGINÆ, IN FLOWER, AT KEW GARDENS.

LAUNCH OF "THE WELLESLEY," AT BLACKWALL.

LAUNCH OF "THE WELLESLEY" INDIAMAN.

On Thursday, the 4th instant, this splendid vessel was launched from the yard of Mr. Green, the great ship-builder, at Blackwall. The Wellesley is of 1150 tons burden, built with all the improvements of naval architecture, and has only been on the stocks twelve months; nevertheless she is complete, and is one of the finest of her class. At half-past two o'clock, she glided into the river, amidst the cheers of an immense number of spectators, both in the dockyard and on the water. She was then taken round to the East India Docks, and was visited during the course of the day by those who had an interest or curiosity in examining her proportions and build. She was named with the usual forms by Lady Hayes. The appearance of the river, the dockyard, the terrace at Blackwall, was one of the most animating that has been witnessed on an occasion of this sort for many years. The numerous vessels lying off Blackwall were all ornamented with flags and streamers, and the sight was rendered doubly brilliant by the fineness of the day. It appeared as if an immense aquatic festival was being held on the river; and the artist Mr. J. H. Allan, has vividly sketched the busy scene.

Mr. Green, with his usual hospitality, invited a large company to a déjeûner at the building in the East India-road, called the Seaman's Home, in which upwards of 400 ladies and gentlemen were entertained in a sumptuous manner, Mr. O'Toole, the toast-master, giving out the toasts, &c. The taverns in the neighbourhood were also all filled with parties. There is now on the stocks, close to the spot just vacated by the Wellesley, another very fine Indiaman, the Monarch, being built. She will, it is understood, be shortly completed, and will be launched in June next.

STRELITZIA REGINÆ.

This magnificent specimen of the Strelitzia Reginæ is now in flower at the Conservatory, in the Royal Gardens at Kew. The petals are of a rich chrome yellow; the stamens are dark purple, with a light yellowish point; and the pod is of greyish purple, tinged with crimson; the leaves are from four to five feet high (including the stalk), and measuring from the top of the tub.

The Strelitzia Reginæ, or Queen's Strelitzia, was introduced at Kew, from the Cape of Good Hope, in 1773; and was named after the house of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, in honour of the Queen of George III. It is an evergreen, herbaceous plant, of ornamental character; it grows to the height of eight feet, and flowers in April and May; it is cultivated by suckers, loves peat and loam, and is reared as a bark-stove perennial. Redouté, in "Les Liliacées," planches 77 and 78, has figured and described this fine plant at length.

BANK OF ENGLAND.—On Tuesday a special meeting of the proprietors of Bank Stock was held in the Court-room of the Corporation, for the purpose of electing a Governor and Deputy-Governor for the year ensuing. Mr. William Cotton, the Governor, presided, and the Court having been opened in the usual form, the ballot was commenced. Pursuant to a request expressed in general court last month, Mr. W. Cotton and Mr. J. B. Heath were placed upon the house-list to serve in the following year, as many important negotiations already commenced would have to be continued, relative to the charter, the consideration of which must soon be brought before Parliament. At four o'clock the glasses were closed, and after an investigation the scrutineers announced that there had been given for Mr. William Cotton to be Governor, 99 votes; for Mr. John Benjamin Heath, as Deputy-Governor, 97 votes; and for Mr. John Cooke, whose name was put up for the latter office, one vote. The Governor and Deputy-Governor then took the usual oath on their appointment to their respective offices, and the court adjourned.

EASTER AMUSEMENTS.—THE GREENWICH PENSIONERS.

In a quiet old cottage here seated are we,
The remnants of war and the turbulent sea;
Safe anchor'd at last in a harbour that seems
The haven of all that we long'd in our dreams!
Sing for old England! the Land of the Free—
The Mistress of Nations, and Queen of the Sea!
We left her in youth, and in age have return'd,
With the spirit the same in our bosoms that burn'd
When the foe would invade us, but fore'd was to fly
From the flag that waves proudest beneath the blue sky!
Sing for old England! the Land of the Free—
The Mistress of Nations, and Queen of the Sea!
Our stiff wooden legs! they are monuments all,
To prove that, though crippled, we never would fall;
And while heart and hand to a tar can remain,
All foreign invasion we'll treat with disdain!
Sing for old England! the Land of the Free—
The Mistress of Nations—the Queen of the Sea! W.

"The Old Pensioners," as they are somewhat irreverently termed by light-hearted holiday folks, are great personages in the amusements of Easter Week at Greenwich. We have, accordingly, chosen the present as the fittest opportunity for introducing to our readers the portraits of a few of these veterans of the service.

Hurrah for the sons of the ocean, the old boys who are fond of their jacket to the last! hurrah for the gallant heroes who led them on from victory to victory! and hurrah for our naval fame, that stands pre-eminent over that of all the nations of the earth! Honoured be the British flag wherever blue water shall roll its billowy course; whether floating with triumphant supremacy in the presence of an enemy, or bearing beneath its influences peace and good-will to all the nations of the earth; and although the latter is infinitely preferable to the former, inasmuch as harmonious quiet is more to be esteemed than the noise and turbulence of war, and a tranquil death to a bloody grave; yet when the safety, honour, and security of our country is threatened, requisite it is that the ensign of hostility should be unfurled in vindication of our rights, and in defence of our own home shores. And who more nobly performed this duty than our gallant tars, who with the flag that they loved, were ever ready to brave "the battle and the breeze!" A time-honoured band are the veteran pensioners of Greenwich, who fought and shed their blood to maintain inviolate the freedom of their native land against foreign aggressors, and vindictive foes. Three cheers in remembrance of our naval chiefs of other days, and one cheer more for the living memorials of our proud achievements on the ocean! Hurrah for Lord Nelson, and his glorious deeds! No man deserved better of his country; it was chiefly his conquests that first humbled, and then annihilated the naval power of France; the seamen were hearts of oak when under his command, and few there were who did not firmly believe that the floating castles of Old England took delight in complying with his orders.

A sailor's all one as a piece of his ship, was never more strongly exemplified: every man, fore-and-aft, claimed the privilege of a timber-head, and no one knew better than Lord Nelson in what way to humour their peculiarities so as to ensure their best and most arduous services. But the veterans of the old school, who rattled away aloft to make sail in chase, or, biting their quid, stood firmly at their guns as they laid alongside of the enemy—of these very few remain; chimnies have superseded masts, and "all hot and no mistake," have rendered canvass useless. A change has come over the whole spirit of naval warfare; but we trust English hearts will always be found the same. Let not, however, the memory of the bold mariners who so undauntedly stood forward in the hour of peril to defend the hearthstone from invaders, and to protect the pillow of rest from molestation, be forgotten by Ye gentlemen of England who live at home at ease.

Hurrah for Greenwich Hospital! Monuments have been erected to the memory of departed greatness—statues dedicated to dead heroes hold a prominent situation in the great temples of the land—but the proudest testimonial of national gratitude to the living, stands on the Thames Bank, at Greenwich—and a permanent bank it truly is; no draught is ever dishonoured there—it is a joint stock company of members, dwelling in a royal palace, and enjoying unlimited credit amongst their customers.

Greenwich furnishes nearly the last relics of the ancient race—pigtails are cut off, 'bacca boxes are passing away in smoke, and the stiff "nor'-wester" glass of grog is evaporating in steam. Wood is not to be required in building—every ship is to be clapped in irons and cables put together after the fashion of ladies' necklaces. An old seaman mourns over these innovations, but still he knows that

Where Britain's flag is waving free
England is mistress of the sea.

A proud period was that for Albion, and the peaceful inhabitants of these realms

When Nelson led the way,
His ship the Victory named;
Long he that Victory famed
For Victory crowned the day, when the Spanish coast re-echoed the thunders of broadsides, as the walls of Alexandria had done before, and hallowed is the spot in which a grateful country treasured the shattered remains of those intrepid men who so nobly did their duty. Nelson's name is imperishable. Cape Trafalgar will always occupy a prominent page in the records of naval history; and now be it our task to rescue humbler, though not less brave individuals, from obscurity, by presenting the portraits of seven who fought on the memorable occasion (when England triumphed, but Nelson fell,) in the same ship as the commander-in-chief. The first we give is—

JOSEPH BURGIN. JAMES CONNELL. GEORGE FRENCH

DANIEL FEARHALL.

This gallant veteran, now seventy-two years of age, is a native of Lewes in Sussex, was sergeant of marines in the Victory at Trafalgar, and nobly responded to the last telegraphic signal of her chief; he aft rwards served in the Milford at Trieste; has been engaged in numerous boat actions and cutting-out the enemy's vessels from under batteries; but though repeatedly in the thickest of the fight never received a wound. After fifteen years in various ships he retired upon a pension of £17 4s. per annum; is still hale and hearty, and well remembers incidents in which he bore a prominent share.

HENRY STILES

was born at Thame in Oxfordshire, is about seventy years of age, and was in the Victory at Trafalgar; he was employed generally as a writer in the office; was slightly wounded, but not mentioned in the returns. He served altogether thirteen years, and bore a very fair character.
